body could have supposed that I was really in earnest in what I said."

Pale with apprehension, he started for the quarters of Colonel Villiers. Meeting Westover on the way, he thrust the note into his hands.

"I entreat you, sir, to read it," he exclaimed. "Is it not atrocious to single me out for such a commission?"

"Why, sir," answered Westover, at the same time returning the note, "it would appear that you have virtually offered your services; so that, when thus taken at your word, there can no one be blamed but yourself."

"I protest against it," exclaimed Merritson. "It is rank murder!"

"Adieu!" replied Westover, with a mischievous glance as he turned away. "I am sure we shall all wish you success in your undertaking."

Merritson found the colonel surrounded by several officers, who were evidently anticipating amusement at the expense of the boaster. Merritson stammered out a disavowal of the declaration imputed to him.

"Sir," said the colonel, with an air of astonishment, "I am surprised! It is strange that I should have been so mistaken. Captain Hartley," he continued, turning to one of the by-standers, "did I understand you rightly as reporting the desire of Lieutenant Merritson to be employed on the service mentioned?"

Captain Hartley made a ceremonious bow.

"Certainly, colonel," he replied. "The lieutenant expressed himself to me and others as being particularly desirous of the honor."

Merritson's spirit was roused. After all, he scarce deserved to be thought a coward; and the scorn which he saw in the faces of those around him, stung him to the quick. Turning to Captain Hartley, he said:

"Sir, you deem yourself safe in making me the butt of your malice. I hope to show you that you are mistaken. Gentlemen," he added, in a louder tone, "I perceive that my presence is not particularly desirable just now. I beg leave to wish you good evening."

"Who would have thought it?" exclaimed Hartley, as soon as the lieutenant was gone. "I would not have believed that the fellow would have shown so much spirit."

"Will he fight?" asked the person whom he addressed.

"He fight! Pooh, pooh! His courage will be a mere flash of the pan—all extinguished by this time."

Hartley was in error; for he soon received a challenge from Merritson requiring an immediate meeting. About half an hour afterwards, the latter was conveyed to his lodging with a sword-wound through his arm.

"Egad!" exclaimed Hartley, on being questioned about the affair. "He was really savage, and would not be satisfied! I was actually obliged to wing him in self-defence."

"They tell me that the thing has set him up again with Miss Barton. He is again in her favor. She cut him dead the other day, and now, in a fit of repentance, looks on him as a brave and injured man, and goes just as far the opposite way. You could not have done him a greater service."

"A plague on it! I wish that we had let the fellow alone in the first place. But hark there!"

A flash of joy overspread the countenances of the conversants, as a scattering report of musketry became a quick, continuous fire circling around the fort. Yells and whoops, intermingled with the steady cheer of English voices, proclaimed a most welcome change in the aspect of the siege. Every one hastened to quarters; and all the available force which could be spared from the garrison, sallied from the fort just as the front of the reinforcement hove in sight, driving before it a rout of hideously-painted savages. At once a shout broke forth from the garrison party.

"George Wytherly! Wytherly forever!"

The latter waved his hand in answer, and the inspiring recognition added more than their olden vigor to the just now enfeebled defenders of the fort. Hip and thigh they smote the red-skins; and such was the slaughter of that day, that the field was ever after known among the Indians by the name of the Bloody Ground. Wytherly entered the fort amid the congratulations of its inhabitants, who regarded him as their saviour. His story was soon told. He had been bound to the stake, and had nearly suffered the fate of Dixon, when, at the last moment, a warrior dashed through the flames, cut the thongs which bound him, and claimed him as his own property. Escaping from his captors the second night after, Wytherly made his way through the wilderness to the next post, more than three hundred miles distant from his starting-place. After much exertion, being compelled to visit several auxiliary stations, he succeeded in raising a reinforcement sufficient for the relief of Fort Hamilton.

"It was a gallant thing, my boy," said Westover; "enough to set you up for a hero during the rest of your days. But I won't shock your modesty too much; I dare say you have already had your fill of praise. The women, George—bless me, you should hear them run on! Well, well, none but the brave deserve the fair; and, by the way, I hope that our friend Louisa will at last be able to yield her heart to its rightful owner. I must own that I have a strong desire to bring you two together. Go then, my boy! assault the defences. Nothing like a bold front, before man or woman!"

Wytherly seized the first opportunity to pay his respects to Louisa Barton. But, doomed to continued disappointment, he encountered Merritson plainly established on favorable terms with the mistress of his affections. Convinced that the latter was a successful suitor, Wytherly was scarce able to restrain himself within the bounds of decorum.

"Excuse me, madam," he exclaimed, with sparkling eyes; "and you also, sir! I had not thought you recovered from your honorable wounds. I will not intrude on your mutual endearments."

"Stay, sir!" said Merritson, hastily advancing and detaining Wytherly. "It is but just that I should undeceive you. Miss Barton deigns to honor me with her friendship; and I hope that my conduct hereafter will be such as to merit that regard, at least in some degree. But I know, only too well, the limits of that regard; and, if you desire to be more fully informed, I will give you opportunity to make inquiry of the lady herself." With these words, he retired.

Wytherly, as soon as he was gone, said to Louisa: "Can you desire to torture me with doubt? One word from your lips can decide the whole. And yet I scarcely dare to ask the question."

A glance from her eyes removed every doubt from the bosom of Wytherly. He clasped her to his breast, and heard her avow, with many tears, her former want of self-knowledge, her deep sorrow for his supposed death—in short, a complete confession of her heart.

"And now," she said, raising her head and looking him full in the face, "dare you join your fate with the Coquette of Fort Hamilton?"

Wytherly gazed into her eyes with a smile which betokened a full and hearty confidence.

"When the Coquette of Fort Hamilton," he said, "has said the word which makes her mine, I will trust her faithfulness against the world!"

EARLY MEMORIES.

Too oft the light that led our earlier hours
Fades with the perfume of our cradle flowers;
The clear, cold question chills to frozen doubt;
Tired of beliefs, we dread to live without;
O then, if Reason waver at thy side,
Let humbler Memory be thy gentle guide;
Go to thy birthplace, and, if faith was there,
Repeat thy father's creed, thy mother's prayer!

NICELY DONE.

At a certain eating-house, a day or two since, a very lean, cadaverous-looking mortal was so allured by the inviting looks of a ten pound turkey, all done up in "fixings," that he unconsciously uttered the ejaculation that he could eat it up in ten minutes.

"What'll you bet you can?" asked a snob, standing at the door.

The "lean and hungry Cassius" immediately responded:

"Will you pay for it?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, I'll bet you a drink."

"It's a bet," said Snob.

The lean man immediately set to. The choicest parts of the fat and savory monster were consumed with a most enviable relish; but upon the expiration of ten minutes he found himself up to the brim, and the turkey not a third demolished. Rising very coolly, he acknowledged that he couldn't go it, and quite as coolly forked over twelve and a half cents for two whiskey toddies—lost wager. Snob looked blank upon being suddenly struck with the idea that he had been done up in a decidedly cheap package, paid down two and a half dollars for the turkey, and left his friend enjoying digestion and a prime smoke by the stove, considerably better for a first rate dinner for a shilling.—Picayune.

A QUEER WAY TO KILL A BEAR.

A thick and strong piece of whale bone, about four inches broad and two feet long, is rolled up into a small compass and carefully enveloped in blubber, forming a round ball. It is then placed in the open air at a low temperature, where it soon becomes hard and frozen. The natives, armed with their knives, bows and arrows, together with this frozen bait, proceed in quest of Bruin. As soon as the animal is seen, one of the hunters deliberately charges an arrow at it. The monster, smarting from the unprovoked assault, pursues the party, then in full retreat, until meeting with the frozen blubber, dropped in his path, he swallows it, and continues the pursuit, doubtless fancying that there must be more where it came from. The effects of the chase and the natural heat of the body cause the blubber to thaw, when the whalebone, thus freed, springs back, producing great mischief, and obliging the beast to discontinue the pursuit—he falls down, helpless, writhing in agony, and his existence is soon terminated.—Lieutenant Armstrong's Expedition to the Arctic.

ACTIVE PIETY.

The stoutest timber stands on Norwegian rocks, where tempests rage and long, hard winters reign. The muscles are seen most fully developed in the brawny arm that plies the blacksmith's hammer. Even so the most vigorous and healthy piety is that which is the busiest, which has difficulties to battle with, which has its hands full of good works, which has neither time nor room for evil, but, aiming at great things both for God and man, promptly and summarily dismisses temptations with Nehemiah's answer, "I have a great work to do, therefore I cannot come down."—Guthrie.

MYSELF.

BY ESTHER BERNE.

THERE it stands, a truly funny title to be sure. But then how could I help it, I should like to know? People, even the least selfish and the most enduring, must sometimes speak and write of themselves. And though I lay claim to neither of the above qualities in any great degree, yet must I also write of myself.

And what about myself? I possessed neither riches nor poverty; therefore, I had what Agur prayed for. I was not handsome, but on the contrary decidedly plain. At the time I write of I was quite young—a mere child, in fact—and lived with two maiden aunts in the country.

There is nothing wonderful in all that, neither is there anything wonderful in my history. I was not a prodigy, according to my aunts' ideas, for I could neither sew nor knit well. I hated both occupations, and I hate them now as cordially as I hated them then. But then I was not ruled with a rod of iron. It was lucky I was not, else I should have rebelled speedily. At stated times each day, I was at liberty to wander at my own "sweet will." And sweet indeed it was to race unseen down those long, green lanes, and to rest under the shadow of some tumble-down wall.

I was neither a quiet child nor a very active one. But I was wonderfully reserved and disliked companionship. The air castles that I built were sufficient companions for me. If there was a childish longing that possessed me more than any other, it was that of travelling. I constantly dreamed of and thirsted to see the lands that my aunts talked of. Therefore the greatest pleasure of my life was to examine and re-examine the curiosities in an old cabinet that stood in what I jestingly called the library. These curiosities came mostly from distant lands, and a great part of them had been collected and brought home by my father, who had been a sea captain.

There were some presented by other travellers to my aunts, which I prized very much. A portion of a cedar of Lebanon from the Mount of Olives, and a piece of the ruins of ancient Carthage interested me more than all the rest. Those had been presented by Captain Dana, a gentleman who was under everlasting obligations to my aunts, at least according to their statements, for some favor or favors received a long time ago. In my secret heart, I envied Captain Dana, for having stood in such sacred places. I would have given ten of the best years of my life to have stood where he had stood, and seen what he had seen.

I had long ago drawn his portrait in my mind. I fancied him a tall, weather-beaten man, with slightly gray hair, and a frank, good-natured face. All sailors, I thought, are good-natured. And in general I had quite a reverence for those who "go down to the sea in ships," a reverence that had grown with my growth. And this is not strange, when it is remembered that my father was a sea captain.

I was racing down the long, secluded lane, that led to our house, one day, when suddenly, to my extreme dismay, I encountered in a turn of the road, a gentleman on horseback. I was entirely unprepared for any such apparition, and stood for a minute with my bonnet swinging in my hand, gazing earnestly at it. The next moment I had turned and was speeding swiftly down to my favorite hiding-place amongst the alder bushes.

Then I had a chance to wonder who the gentleman could be. It was no one that lived in our vicinity, or that I had ever seen before. It was not Captain Dana, I was very sure of that. So I finally concluded that it was some one come on business, who would go away very soon. But though I watched long from my hiding-place, I saw no one leave the house. What should I do? I was getting more and more hungry every minute, and it was most dinner time. Go in I must, and meet this man, and see him stare ludicrously at me. Well, no matter, I would make the best of it.

I crept up stairs to my own little room, smoothed my hair, and then crept softly down again, not into the parlor, but into the library as I called it, but which was in fact a mere lumber-room for all the old books and old things in the house. I softly opened the door and went in, and lo! there stood the stranger with his face turned from me, coolly overhauling the things in the little cabinet. The bit of cedar I had so much prized was carelessly handled as if it was a mere plaything. I could not bear to see something almost sacred treated so lightly. Still less to think that my father and Captain Dana had collected these things with so much toil and trouble, to be touched by strange hands.

I went softly up to the intruder, and still unnoticed watched him indignantly. I longed to push him away fiercely but did not dare to. He dropped something, stooped to pick it up, and observed me.

I never shall forget that look of confused wonder that rested on me for an instant, and the smile that immediately followed. I liked that smile, and it was a young, handsome face that was turned towards me.

"Well, little girl, how do you like me?" asked the stranger, coolly.

I was amazed and indignant at this speech, and at the self-possession displayed. The smile and the face were quite forgotten, and I spoke quite the truth when I said, "I do not like you at all, and I wish—"

"Wish what, oddity?"

"That you wouldn't throw those things about so," said I, growing more fearless every minute. "They are curiosities that father and Captain Dana brought home."

"Captain Dana! is he a friend of yours?"

"No, I never saw him, but he knew my father, and he knows my aunts, and I can imagine just how he looks."

"How do you think he looks?" asked the stranger, with an expression that puzzled me.

Unconsciously I was drawn into quite a conversation, and enlarged with some warmth on the supposed cheerful appearance of Captain Dana. I had got so far, when the stranger burst into a loud laugh, but seeing that I was much annoyed, he stopped short.

"I beg your pardon, child, but your description of the old gentleman was so amusing."

Again was my childish heart almost won by that beautiful smile, and the fresh, handsome face. I was just a little sorry when the dinner was announced, even though I had been quite hungry before. I sat down in my usual seat at table, and watched the handsome stranger, as he took his place with the air of an old friend.

"Alice, dear," said Aunt Elizabeth, suddenly, "this is Captain Dana, the friend you have often heard us speak about; he sailed with your father when he was alive."

Was this indeed Captain Dana? What a mistake I had made! Visions of the ludicrous figure I must have cut in his eyes rose constantly in my mind. However, it could not be helped. I was about to escape from the room after dinner, but was recalled by my aunts. Captain Dana was obliged to go away immediately and I must stay to bid him good-by.

I stood looking gloomily from the window, hearing only a confused murmur of voices in the room.

"Good-by, Alice," said Captain Dana, suddenly, as he joined me at the window. "That was quite a bitter but wholesome pill of yours about not liking me. I am sorry you don't, for I like you. I shan't forget that old gentleman. By the way," said he, suddenly, as he reached the door, "do you like curiosities?"

"Yes, very much indeed," I answered.

The next moment I caught a glimpse of that handsome face, as Captain Dana rode slowly down the lane, and then he was out of sight. That face and the smile lived in my memory for years.

And the years went on, bearing my childhood with them. They had been tranquil, pleasant years, but not such as I should look back upon with any feeling of regret. 'Tis a mistaken idea with some, that childhood is the happiest period of one's life. True, pure happiness comes only in later life, when one comes into a knowledge of the realities of living.

Never once through all the years that had passed had I seen Captain Dana. Though often memories of him in the shape of curiosities from distant lands came to me, that showed I was not entirely forgotten.

Time had certainly not improved my beauty; but then that troubled me none, and I wasted no regrets over it. It was one of the subjects, like my lost childhood, that I never spoke about. I was now twenty-one years old, and I resolved to lead a more active life than I had been doing. My old desire for travelling had returned tenfold, but I could not gratify it as yet. It could be only after years of patient industry. And my profession was already chosen, a profession that fascinated me with its brilliancy and its power, and one in which I felt I should succeed.

A few approved and many discouraged. But I was independent of approvals or discouragements. My aunts, who were thoroughly proud of me, found no objections to my course. And so my destiny was fixed, I should become an actress.

Yes, an actress, not for the fame or wealth I should gain, but it was the profession itself that I loved; loved with all the fervor and the power with which I was capable of loving anything. I studied earnestly day and night. My art became a mighty, all-absorbing passion, that left room for nothing else. I must either succeed gloriously, or fail miserably; there could be no medium.

One memory, as I have said, I always bore in my heart. Captain Dana's face was one not easily forgotten, else I should have forgotten it long ago. But I was not romantic enough to suppose that the real, living face would ever come before me again; or if it did, it could be nothing to me.

The evening had come when I should make my entrance into public life. One of the principal characters in a lifelike tragedy was the part assigned to me, a part which required a deep, calm, concentrated passion to give it its due effect. For the first time in all my life, I stood before an audience, assembled to judge me according to my merits. Calm and self-possessed, I glanced around at the sea of upturned faces. My eyes rested upon one that was not unknown to me, a frank, handsome face, that was for an instant lighted up by a smile apparently at some remark made by a friend. The smile made the picture complete; I should have known Captain Dana's face among thousands.

Now was the time to play my part. I threw a life and soul into my acting, that surprised even myself. It was like a scene in real life to me, and all the passion and the agony I displayed were real. As I ended, applause burst from every part of the house; applause that almost deafened me. Yet my eyes rested only upon one spot in that living mass where a face upreared itself, upon which an expression of unbounded wonder was apparent.

I had succeeded wonderfully, even where I had feared most to fail, and I was safe. A hundred solicitations for new engagements overwhelmed the new star, that had appeared so suddenly in the firmament. But my refusal of all offers only increased the wonder of the world. I would be free a few days longer before I made a second appearance. Like many another I had wakened in the morning and found myself famous, and like those others also, when the novelty of the thing wore off, I was satisfied with the fame I had so suddenly acquired.

I was making such reflections two days after my appearance, when a card was brought to me with the name "Captain Alfred Dana," inscribed upon it. If I had been romantic, I should have liked that name very much. As it was I went down gladly to meet my old friend. I found him standing at the window, gazing thoughtfully out, so thoughtfully that even my step failed to arouse him. He was older-looking, certainly—but then everybody grows old with time; but there was a care-worn expression upon his face, that was new to me. Still I liked the face full as well as I had ever done. He turned round and encountered me.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Earle," said he, holding out his hand, "I was not aware of your presence."

There certainly was no affectation in this; neither had he called with any selfish interest in view, as most of the people who had called to see me lately had done. Therefore I was sincere when I said I was glad to see him.

"I left you a child," observed Captain Dana,

"and I find you a woman, and a very wonderful woman, too. Did you know I had the pleasure of witnessing your triumph the other evening?"

I could not but be sincere. "Yes, I had seen him there."

"Indeed!" was the only reply.

We talked and laughed over his first visit so many years ago, and I seized the opportunity to thank him for the curiosities he had sent me at different times.

"You know I told you that I shouldn't forget you," said Captain Dana, laughing; "I suppose you forgot me long ago."

"No, I remembered you," answered I, quietly.

He looked up instantly and smiled; that same smile had won my childhood's heart. Was my woman's heart insensible to it?

That evening it rained violently. I stood at the window and looked out, but I could see nothing; all was darkness. I was thinking how a love that had lain smouldering in my heart for years, had suddenly burst forth, superseding even the love for my art, which I had considered an all-absorbing passion. People who said I had no feeling for anything but my art, wronged me. I was capable of feeling deeply, but I had self-control enough not to display what was unnecessary. Therefore, this love of mine, which I believed unreturned, my proud heart would thrust back, lest it should interfere with the life I had marked out for myself.

My old habit of building air castles had not quite deserted me. It was a good and glorious life that I had marked out for my feet to tread, and Heaven knows I meant to tread it firmly and unshrinkingly. I had carefully counted all the pain, and the bitterness, and the weary longings that would be likely to beset such a lonely life as I had chosen. Every life has an unwritten record of them. Mine, at least, the world would never know. I thought how often in coming years, I should long to lie down in that same little room, as I did that night, and hear the rain patter on the roof above me. It was such pleasant music to soothe one to sleep.

The days of another week came and went. Captain Dana called to see us often, and I began to esteem his friendship highly. I experienced a sort of painful happiness, if any happiness can be painful, at seeing constantly one whom I had loved, and who was soon to pass from my sight forever; for though not dead to the world, Captain Dana would at least be dead to me.

I had already accepted a brilliant offer, which would oblige me to make my appearance in a distant city. And the very distance I was to go, was an inducement to me. I should be removed from the sight and sound of earthly things. My aunts were to accompany me to my new home, and our preparations were almost completed for leaving this old home forever.

The night before the time fixed for our departure, in the dim twilight, I ventured out to bid farewell to all the old places. The alder bushes were still there, and the berries hung black and ripe over the brook. At a little distance from them, on a rude seat under the apple tree, I paused to sit down. I caught a glimpse of Captain Dana coming towards me. Well, then and there would I bid him farewell forever. He was evidently troubled about something, and hardly spoke to me. I, too, was unusually silent.

"You are going away, then," said he, at length.

"Yes," I answered, quietly, "I have come to bid farewell to all these places which I shall leave forever."

"Forever is a rash word," said Captain Dana, "I, too, shall leave soon, but I dare not say forever."

"Do you sail soon?" I asked, with increasing interest.

"In a month's time. But I am weary of these voyages."

"Weary! Ah, I never should be weary of journeying."

"Alice!"

I looked up suddenly.

"Does not your chosen life strike you as utterly lonesome? Have you decided well?"

My answer came slowly, "Yes."

"Alice, bear with me one instant longer. Only one more question that I have hitherto delayed because of the agony that I felt sure your answer would bring me. But I must and will ask it now. Have I—can I ever hope to have any power to alter your decision?"

But I neither answered nor moved. Again that appeal.

"Alice!"

How was it, that I always was sincere in speaking to Captain Dana? From the depths of my heart came the word, "Yes."

And then and there, in utter forgetfulness of the glorious life I had chosen, I pledged myself forever, and forever was not a rash word.

I went away, but not to that distant city. I have stood, but not alone, upon glorious places in other lands. My feet have even trod holy ground, and I have seen the sun rise and set over the Mount of Olives. Now, in my quiet home, with all that is near and dear to me beside me, and with an ever unflinching trust in the Providence that rules all things for the best, I write this record of MYSELF.

A BOY-PICTURE.

Here is a good boy-picture. We know the original—several of them. They love to get in the dirt—they don't mind about clothes, and can't tell their mothers how they tore them—they lose their books coming from school—the cold doesn't affect them—in the spring they play ball, and play at marbles in the gutter—in the summer they fly kites, and after every circus they try standing on their heads. Snow is a delight to them, and they pop snow-balls at clever people who don't look as if they would get cross:—

"There's something in a noble boy,
A brave, free-hearted, careless one,
With his unheeded, unbidden joy,
His dread of books and love of fun;
And in his clear and ruddy smile,
Unshaded by a thought of guile,
And unrepresed by sadness;
Which brings me to my childhood back,
As if I trod its very track,
And felt its very gladness."

RUSSIAN LEATHER.

None of the European or American artisans in leather have yet been able to produce an article equal in quality to that which is sent forth from the Russian workshops. Its power in resisting decay in damp situations and its freedom from the attacks of insects and fungi, are remarkable. It is prepared by tanning the skins of calves, sheep, and goats with a warm decoction of red sanders wood, and afterwards applying by a currying process an empyreumatic oil obtained by distillation from the bark of the birch tree, which gives it its agreeable odor. The hair is said to be loosened by a weak wood-ash lye, of which the active principle is carbonate of potash. The process of manipulation, as carried on in Russia, produces inferior quality when practised in other countries.—Scientific American.

GOOD ADVICE.

C. G. Leland, in a recent essay, after speaking of a poem in which a lady tells her poor lover, who proposes marriage, that "she will wait for the carriage," says, "But don't wait for the carriage, now don't! There's a story in Northcote's Fables of a crane that went fishing, and successively rejected roach, dace, pike and salmon, waiting all the time for something a little better, and had to dine on a spoil clam after all. And many a lady has waited for the carriage, and waited, and waited, and had to put up with a poor donkey in the end!"

WISDOM.

Love built a stately house; where fortune came,
And spinning fancies, she was heard to say
That her fine cobwebs did support the frame;
Whereas they were supported by the same,
But Wisdom quickly swept them all away.

SONNET.

BY JOHN H. BAXLEY.

The woodsman with his sharpened blade
 Hews down the sad tree,
 Which, like the Christian meek and staid,
 Forgives its enemy,
 And scatters fragrance on and round
 The axe that's raised to give the wound
 And it destroy.
 The sweetbrier wounds the hasty hand
 That's stretched to seize a rose,
 And then sends forth, by zephyr's fanned,
 Rich perfume on its foes;
 So human life has goods and ills,
 Bitter and sweet, and love which thrills
 Our souls with joy.

LUCY ATHERTON.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

"Down! down! wild heart! cease thy throb-bings—let me have peace once more, or let me die!"

"Hush, hush, Edward," said a soft voice near him, "look for peace where only peace is to be found—in a good conscience."

"Do you, too, accuse me, Adeline?" asked the young man, fiercely. "Little did I think, when I came here to-night, that my only sister would throw reproach upon me."

"Nor do I, Edward," said the girl, tenderly.
 "I would not reproach you for the world, but think back a few weeks, and try to look upon your own conduct as if it were another's; and then imagine whether you would have considered it right in another man, to leave an innocent girl to be censured by the world, because a villain like John Manton reports evil things of herself and her noble old father. Why, Edward, when I see Mr. Delano's white hairs, and think how nearly that wretch has brought them down with sorrow to the grave, I tell you I sometimes wish I was a man, that I might stand up and plead for them before the world."

As the speaker laid her delicate hand upon her brother's shoulder, she seemed to grow taller, and her whole figure to expand, with the emotions which filled her young heart. She was a fair, slight creature, and might be a little above seventeen. Her small head was perfect in its shape, and crowned with the most beautiful hair. Her fine eyes, of a soft, grayish hue, were lighted up with feeling, and her red lips quivered with excitement.

"You battle well, for your friends, Adeline," said her brother. "I could almost think that Herman Delano had been telling you the story of his sister's wrongs, attributing them all to me.

 By Heaven, if you dare to encourage that fellow, after what he has said of me, I will never speak to you again!"

Adeline burst into tears. "Edward, you are too unjust to me. When did I ever encourage Herman Delano? Was it not when you, yourself, had brought him to our house, told me he was the dearest friend you had in the wide world, and said again and again, that you would be happy and proud to call him your brother? And now because John Manton, a creature who is stained with vice and infamy, tries to blacken with shame a family whose members you have known and loved for years, you turn against them too. How can you bear to look upon Mary Delano's drooping figure, and pale, spiritless countenance, and feel that you have helped to quell the beautiful spirit that had so trusted you? And as I said before, no one could look for a moment on Mr. Delano's white hair and noble brow, without feeling that he was immeasurably above the mean souls around him; and believe me, Edward, what he is, his children are too—good and noble. There is not a more innocent creature in the world than Mary; and I believe in Herman Delano's truth, as I believe in God, in Nature, in the Bible! Not more earnestly do I have faith in the eternal and immutable truth which comes to us from all these, than I believe in his virtue and his nobleness of soul."

"You are in earnest, Addie. Would that you could inspire me with my old faith in the family."

"And so you will be inspired, Edward, when this chain of miserable, wretched falsehoods is broken. Have I not seen Mr. Delano's eye flash with indignation, when John Manton has come into his presence, because he knew him for a walking, breathing, living falsehood? Have I not seen Mary go away, with a look of such scorn, as might almost have scorched him? And if you will force me to talk of Herman, have I not heard such biting sarcasms on his lip, when John Manton was present, as to make me know and feel, that had he not been a coward, he would have resented them?"

"Well, Addie, here comes Aunt Lucy, does she know of this matter?"

"Not by my telling, I assure you."

"Suppose then, that we lay the case before her, and get her opinion. She has had some experience of those Mantons, and I should like to hear what she would say about them."

The lady who entered the room where the brother and sister were, was a majestic-looking being. Though somewhat advanced in life, she had not yet lost that graceful ease which in her youth had characterized Lucy Atherton. A severe disappointment, at that sensitive age when "Time goes smiling by, with diamonds in his glass," had but kept her heart in its original purity and freshness. Robert Kingman lay asleep in his early found grave beneath the lime trees of Bermuda, but his image was in Lucy Atherton's heart, as fresh and beautiful as on the morning when she saw his white sail recede till it became a mere speck on the ocean wave; and henceforth that heart became the repository only of things good and pure. She lived only by doing good to all who came within her reach, and to none did she dispense her blest influence more freely, than to these two children of her love, Edward and Adeline Atherton. When the sorrow came that destroyed her young hopes, their father took her to his home; and her presence there had proved a blessing and a happiness to all within it.

Edward Atherton and Herman Delano had met each other abroad, and they came back together. Almost immediately after their return, the latter had introduced Edward to his sister, at a concert, and her gentle, innocent manners and sweet young face had filled his waking and sleeping thoughts. He had taken his only sister, Adeline, to visit her, and his attachment to her was well known in the circles where both families visited. Herman Delano liked his friend's sister, as one would like a playful and beautiful child. He did not comprehend the depths of her heart and understanding. She was a noble-hearted girl—passionate, when roused, but with all generous emotions springing up at the slightest sense of wrong to another.

John Manton was distantly related to the Athertons. He was an only child, wayward, and of a violent temper. His father, dying before he was quite of age, left him and his large property in charge of Mr. Atherton; a charge he unwillingly accepted. His own children were then very young, and he felt that young Manton's influence on his son might be very injurious. But it was his friend's dying request that he would save John from the consequences of a defective training, and, pitying his distress at leaving him, he promised.

As Edward grew up, he was within the sphere of John Manton a great deal more than Mr. Atherton liked. John was independent in a moneyed sense; and as Mr. Atherton, when his charge over him had ceased, could not well deny him his house, he soon tried to initiate Edward into ways which his father disapproved. It was therefore a great pleasure to Mr. Atherton, when the business of the firm in which he had placed his son required some one to go to Europe for several months; and his only care now was to keep Manton, if possible, from accompanying him, which he half-resolved to do.

It was on Edward's return, that John Manton first saw Mary Delano; and he determined then, that he would win her in spite of Edward Atherton's evident attachment to her. He besieged her with presents which she refused, with letters that she returned; and the innocent girl, unable to disguise her feelings, showed him in every way how much she disliked and despised him, and his aimless, objectless life, devoted only to luxury and dissipation.

Stung to the quick, he took measures to be revenged; and, step by step, he accomplished his object. Mary's father had been very rich, but was now reduced in circumstances; so that he felt no compunction in ruining the character of a poor man. John Manton had a great regard for wealthy people; but here was a fair field, and even Herman Delano was not greatly feared by him, although he had cowered once or twice under the clear, honest gaze of Herman's eye.

So it was not long before reports were circulated, involving the father's honesty and the daughter's innocence; for Manton found willing tools to do his bidding, and the stories gained ground every day, until Mary began to notice that some of her acquaintances passed her by without recognizing her; and her father went to his daily toil in a bank, where he received a mere pittance, meeting people who turned coldly away without speaking.

Through one of her father's servants, whom John Manton had often tried to employ in his schemes against the Delanoes, Adeline Atherton learned enough to make her suspect that the reports that soon reached her ear, originated in Manton's revengeful temper; and she imparted her suspicions to Mary and her father.

Edward had been absent some weeks on business, and, on his return, was met by a friend who, not knowing how he stood with the family, related all he had heard.

Edward was like a madman when he returned to his father's house; and not all Adeline's representations could induce him to do justice in his heart to the injured family. He had such a nice sense of honor, that he could not bear to have even the name of the woman he loved spoken in public places. How was it then when that name was coupled with dishonor and John Manton in the same breath! How was it, when he saw her pass along the street, with her white-haired father by her side, and heard from vulgar lips the scornful jest, and marked the cruel sneer that followed them!

Again he returned to Adeline for sympathy. Young as she was, she proved stronger and firmer than her brother; he was subdued to the weakness of a child, and could not even struggle against the new sorrow which had come upon him; or the rage which possessed him. Adeline had not breathed a word to her aunt; and when that lady entered she was amazed at her nephew's appearance. His face was worn and haggard, and his eyes swollen and blood-shot.

"Keep calm, children," were her first words, "I will ferret out this abominable falsehood. Let no one stir in the matter but myself."

Do not think, for a moment that Aunt Lucy was a bustling, fidgetty sort of person, concerning herself, as a matter of curiosity, in people's affairs of the heart. Far from it. She breathed serene airs into every household within her influence. She was calm and dignified, dispensing advice only where her gentle ways had induced men and women to ask it; and the rudest and roughest grew softer and more civilized in her presence.

Chance seemed to favor her present determination. She had dearly loved the gentle Mary Delano, for no one came nearer her idea of what a woman should be. Mary's father was her true friend also, and she would have sacrificed much to free from any suspicion the parent of one so dear to her as Mary.

No one, not even Mary, knew that Mr. Delano had offered himself and his fortune, in the days of his prosperity, to Aunt Lucy. It was in the first year of his bereavement, and Lucy Atherton was more shocked than flattered at the idea of so soon being asked to fill the place of her deceased friend; for, although the younger members of the family were unknown to each other until Edward's European tour, she, at least, was no stranger to the Delanoes. Still, the refusal with which she had pained and mortified the father, had caused a cessation of intercourse, which continued until the brother's intimacy commenced with Edward. She had looked on with pleasure, and watched the progress which Addie was making towards loving Herman Delano; for she felt that the son was following the footsteps of the father; and she knew that the motherless girl would need just such a protector as he would be to her.

The evening on which the conversation between Edward and his sister took place was pleasant and serene, and Aunt Lucy determined to enjoy it to the utmost. She was fond of lonely walks, and she bent her steps toward a green lane skirted by magnificent oaks, which had been the scene, to her, of many rambles with him from whom she had been so early divided. She had gained the summit of a hill which overlooked a scene of surpassing beauty, and her thoughts had been turned away from the subject occupying them when she left the house, when, looking down into the little valley, she saw John Manton walking hastily over the path she had just passed. She watched him until he entered a small cottage which stood half-hid among the trees.

Presently he came out, accompanied by a young girl, whom Aunt Lucy knew to be Bessie Hartley, the daughter of the owner of the small house. David Hartley was a wood-cutter; had always lived at the entrance of this forest, and his daughter kept house for him. She was a plump, fresh, good-looking maiden, and had been engaged to half the young farmers round the village, but she would not hear of being married to any one of them. And she carried off the palm as village coquette.

Miss Atherton saw the pair stop, and supposed that John Manton had been employing her in her occupation of straw-braider, for she noticed that he wore a large straw hat; and she saw him give her money, as she thought, when he parted from her at the entrance of the wood.

Sauntering back, through the pathway that led from the woods, he passed behind the rock against which Miss Atherton had seated herself, reading a letter as he walked. Still concealed from his view, she heard him say, "Why, Herman Delano is a fool, to believe that he can touch any one that talks about his father." A few minutes after, she again heard him mutter something about Bess being a good girl, if she did not lie to him so confoundedly; and then he wound up with a half-expressed threat of revenge upon Mary. He started when he saw her, and for a moment seemed disconcerted; but recovering his usual assurance, he accosted her with a pleasant good evening, and passed on.

"Hope that old maid did not hear me," said he, almost before he got out of hearing.

Aunt Lucy felt that she had some clue to the stories that were circulated in the neighborhood, and she arose from her seat, intending to go round by Hartley's, and talk with Bessie, if possible. In doing this, she could pass by Mr. Delano's house, and in passing, she saw Mary at the window.

Mary flew to the door and called to her friend; and Lucy Atherton, blushing and excited, entered Mr. Delano's house for the first time. Mary, who did not know the cause of her friend's excitement, could not account for the tremor she manifested. The room was shaded, and she did not see that another person sat in the dim twilight. It was Mr. Delano. He recognized her, and came forward to greet her. Spite of her habitual serenity, Miss Atherton trembled as Mr. Delano pressed her hand.

"This is kind in you, Miss Atherton," he said, but Lucy did not hear his words, for her eyes were fixed upon the white locks which were so black when he had asked her to be his wife.

She murmured some indistinct sentences, in which troubled tones might be distinguished, and seated herself in a dim corner; but Mary dragged her out, and would bring her into the light and show her their beautiful Provence roses, and the splendid carnations which Herman had brought her from English gardens; and this brought the afternoon to a close.

When Aunt Lucy rose to go, Mary playfully tossed her bonnet on her head, and prepared to accompany her. Mr. Delano rose also and took his hat. On the steps they met Herman, who turned back with them; and as he took Mary's hand under his arm, he whispered in her ear, "Let father for once, wait on a lady home."

They walked on silently at first, but before they parted, Mr. Delano had said, "Miss Atherton, I once asked you to be my wife, and you refused. I thought you proud and haughty then, but God knows how thankful I am now, that a wife does not share my poverty, nor feel the dishonor that has fallen upon my name."

"You distress me, Mr. Delano, by referring to the past. If, by conquering the feeling that I was ~~taking the place of~~ my beloved friend too soon, I had become your wife, do you think so meanly of me, as that I would not have borne my part cheerfully in any burden you might have been called to bear? Believe me, it was not pride, but a tender feeling towards the dead, that influenced me—" She stopped short, for she felt that she was committing herself.

"Say that once more, my friend! It is long since I heard such words from mortal lips, of tenderness for me and mine. And yet," he added, mournfully, "they come too late, too late."

Suddenly Aunt Lucy dropped his arm, as a thought which seemed too great for utterance filled her mind, but she made an effort to repress it, and bidding him good night, she went in, and, in five minutes, was locked within her room. She opened her window and inhaled the smell of the roses, and looked up at the quiet stars. Her thoughts went back to the time when Mr. Delano had asked her to share his fortune; and her resolution was formed.

"I have wealth enough for both—for all," she said, "and I will share it with him. If he suffers in public opinion now, from falsehoods that others have disseminated, how better can they be refuted, than by my showing I disbelieve them? Surely, they will not think," she added, proudly, "that Lucy Atherton would marry a man whose name could truly be dishonored."

There was true heroism in Lucy Atherton's resolve, for not yet had her early love been forgotten. But she stood so much upon her own approbation, and so little upon that of the world, that she feared not to do what some women might not dare. She did not sleep much that night; and early next morning, Mr. Delano received a note from her, which ran thus:

"I know that what I am about to write, would be looked at with astonishment by some, and with contempt by many. Let that pass. I once received an offer of your hand, and, as I told you, I refused it because I thought it too soon after my friend's death. I looked back, too, to an early grave, where laid the beloved of my youthful days. But for other reasons, which I do not choose to speak of, I will say, that if your heart is unchanged, if you still believe that Lucy Atherton can be to you, in any degree, what Mary Trevor was, I will be to you all that I can."

After despatching this note, Lucy Atherton walked down to the edge of the woods to see Bessie Hartley. She saw the girl, watching apparently for some one, and entering into conversation with her, she soon gained her confidence. In half an hour, yielding to Lucy's gentle words and manner, Bessie had told her of John Manton's promise to herself and her father, that if they would report certain things respecting Mary Delano, he would marry Bessie in six months. Bessie wept bitterly when Lucy kindly told her how utterly unlikely such a marriage could be, and described to her what a character John Manton was. She told her how wicked she had been, to injure a family so good and kind as the Delanos, and begged her to expose the falsehood, assuring her that she should come to no harm. Her suggestions prevailed with the poor girl, as soon as she could be made to see John Manton in his true light, and she promised to repair the wrong, if possible. * * *

Lucy Atherton was married—married in church, openly, before the assembled Sabbath congregation. No one knew but herself and her husband, how it was brought about, but every one seemed pleased; and Mr. Delano, despite his whitened hair, looked more youthful than he had done for years. Two years afterwards, a double wedding was celebrated in the same place, and the happiness of each and all was gratefully attributed to Aunt Lucy.

THE VISION IN THE NIGHT.

BY WILLIS E. FAVOR.

My hand was on my forehead pressed;
 My mind, in thought's majestic car
 Was whirling to the realms afar,
 Through avenues of dire unrest.

My heart was throbbing quick and warm;
 Pulsating as if on my face
 The fever-demon held its place,
 And kept wild revel through my form.

Faded the pictures from the wall,
 And vanished from their dusty shelves
 The books whose writers traced themselves
 Therein. And though I did not call

There came in stately march to me
 The mighty of the elder world;
 On me their fiery glance they hurled,
 And asked me why I bent the knee.

I cowered as if in disgrace;
 I had no heart to ask "how long,"
 Or what the mission of the throng
 That filled the arches of the place.

In my dumb awe I did not see
 How on each forehead there did shine
 The words that were to be a sign
 To all the outer world through me.

The lessons that the past did teach,
 My stubborn heart refused to read,
 No single symbol did I heed
 By which the human heart to reach.

So all was lost, and when again
 I trod the outer world, no sign
 Showed I had learned a truth divine,
 My stubborn heart would not retain.

GRAY FLETCHER.

BY ZELLE C. WOODMAN.

"Alas for the rarity
 Of Christian charity
 Under the sun."

"WHAT a zealous champion you are, Gertrude," said her cousin, Grace Arlington. "See, Mr. Butterfly, her eyes dilate, her cheek is flushed, her lip trembles, and all because we choose to indulge in a bit of scandal at the expense of her protegee. Take care, young lady, one should not ruin one's self in endeavoring to reform unknown gentlemen. What do you say, Mr. Butterfly?"

The gentleman addressed, who sat twirling his watchchain around his fingers, replied, in a conceited manner:

"Ah, Miss Glenhem, bettah heed the advice of Miss Grace; a young lady's character is extremely delicate—'pon my honor 'tis."

Gertrude Glenhem turned toward Broomfield Butterfly with a face flashing scorn and contempt, which plainly said, who are you, thus to intrude your advice? Then as if repressing her indignation, she replied bitterly:

"Yes, a lady, be she ever so delicate, may associate with a young man if he has only a standing in society; that is to say, if all the respectable men and women in the community uphold him in his iniquity; but if a man chances to be unfortunate in life, and claims your sympathy and assistance, then, surely, virtue draws her immaculate garments closely around her for fear of contamination, upon the principle that when a man commences going down hill, it's always praiseworthy to render him a little assistance."

"You're a brave pleader for so fair a one," said Mr. Butterfly, in a tone of sarcastic raillery.

Gertrude rose to take her departure; she would deign no further reply, when a pleasant old gentleman, with a merry twinkle playing around his eyes, issued from an adjoining room where he had evidently overheard the conversation which was passing between his daughter Grace and her morning caller, Mr. Butterfly. Holding out his hands to prevent Gertrude's escape, he cried:

"There, my bird, I've caught you, now tell me, pretty one, what troubles you?"

Gertrude raised an imploring look to her uncle's face, from out her tearful eyes, but he obstinately would not allow her to pass.

"Dear Uncle Joshua," said she, at length, beseechingly, "do let this unpleasant subject drop. It was very foolish in me to notice it."

"Not so foolish perhaps, child," replied he, good humoredly; "but tell me who is the young man in question, you can at least reply to that?"

"Ah, papa, to relieve my cousin's embarrassment, I will answer for her," said Grace, with a sneer. "It's no less a personage than young Gray Fletcher, who has recently come to town, hung out a newly-painted sign as 'Attorney and Counsellor at Law'; but is unfortunately followed by reports which seem likely to ruin his success in business. How he can have awakened such an interest in Gertrude is beyond my comprehension. To be sure, he's a noble looking youth, but vice hides itself under the most pleasing forms," she added in a voice of virtuous warning.

"Perhaps," said Butterfly, in an undertone, "they may have met in their moonlight walks."

"Who knows but the old elm is their trysting place?" replied Grace, in the same tone.

"And has Gertrude not a right to defend the young man?" inquired Mr. Abington.

"An undoubted right, sir," replied Butterfly, smiling aside to Miss Grace.

"I think she uttered a very true remark just now, young man, that when a person commences going down hill, enough stand ready to give him a kick," replied Mr. Abington, with considerable severity. "Pray tell me," he continued, "has Gray Fletcher a fine personal appearance, moustaches, and the like, that interfere with any one's plans; or has he not lavished his attentions enough upon the feminine portion of community to ensure a good word from them?"

"I have never seen him, papa, neither do I wish to," said immaculate virtue, in the person of Miss Grace.

"And I regard him rather dubiously," said Mr. Butterfly, as if he were a die-away echo; his face, or so much of it as was visible, assuming a delicate roseate hue.

"Come here, Gertrude, my dear, and tell me why you've taken so great an interest in the person in question," said Mr. Abington, his countenance relaxing into a sunny smile.

"I'm not aware of being so very deeply interested, uncle, as I know nothing personally of him; I heard him quite generally discussed at the school of scandal, versus the sewing society."

"And did Miss Tittle say he was a very immoral youth?" said Mr. Abington, with a mock sanctimonious air.

"Worse than that," replied Gertrude, laughing, "she said she hardly dared think, much less say, the terrible things she had heard of him."

"And probably, Gertrude, within the next five minutes, she rehearsed the whole story, with embellishments to order, and her heart ached that it was no worse. These women are strange animals," concluded Uncle Joshua, with a sly wink, and shake of the head.

"Strange animals indeed," repeated Gertrude. "Do you know, uncle, I think there's hardly a worthy woman in the world?"

"Not quite so bad as that, I hope, child, though to confess the truth, women are strangely going out of fashion, and ladies of nondescript manufacture take their place. But you haven't yet told me why you take so great an interest in Gray Fletcher. Come, young lady, own up; don't think to cheat your old uncle, own up."

"Well, Father Confessor," replied Gertrude, laughing—but not however until she had assured herself that her Cousin Grace and the Butterfly had flown to more congenial quarters—"in the first place, he's a young man, and just commencing business, and should be encouraged; secondly, if he endeavors to do well here, why should past follies be raked up and hurled in his face, leaving him no chance for that repentance he may be so ardently desiring? And thirdly, is it not better to believe good of a person until you are forced to do otherwise?"

"Where's the fourthly, Gertie?"

"Well, fourthly, uncle, every one seems against him, and it strikes me he should have at least one defender."

"Your heart's in the right place, are you sure of it?"

"Yes, Uncle Joshua, anatomically and affectionally," replied Gertrude, laughing.

"It doesn't go pitipat when you hear his name mentioned?"

"No, but beats as coolly as now, hear it—ono, two, three, isn't that slow and regular?"

"You're all right, never were in love, I suppose, never had any flirtations, you're above all this fol-de-rol. Yes, Gertrude, you're a right sensible woman, upon my soul; you're the first genuine article I've seen this many a day. A weak fellow always enlists the sympathy of a woman, and the deeper a youngster sinks in sin, the more anxious she is to draw him out. Don't I know, child; didn't I have a mother who clung to me, years and years ago, through scenes which would make your young cheek pale? I'm Judge Abington now, Gertie, people seem to have forgotten my early misdeeds. It's wonderful how money and influence help that thing along. But let me tell you, the remembrance of my youthful follies has left a tender spot in my old heart. I don't look at a chap now, and say, you've sinned, and you may go to tophet for all I care. If I can, I give him a cheery word or two, and a cordial slap on the back, and try to set him all right again."

"O, uncle, but you are so good and kind."

"Don't tell me that, you little minx," said Uncle Joshua, a tear-drop glistening in his eye. "I believe my soul you're going to kiss me, run away, you'll tread on my gouty toe."

Gertrude declared over and over she had not the slightest idea of committing such an attack; but her uncle, after ordering her to a distant part of the room, continued:

"Now, young lady, how are we going to help this persecuted youth? That's the practical part of it, for I assure you, if he's fallen into the hands of the tea-loving part of the community, they'll never rest till he's stripped of his virtues as dry as a picked chicken bone."

"O, uncle!"

"You may 'O, uncle,' as much as you please, it's just as I say, some people had by half rather believe evil of a person than good, that's the world's charity; you've heard of the weather's being as cold as charity when it was right freezing times, haven't you? What do you think, child, couldn't I run in and see the young man, have a little business, so that he wouldn't mistrust me? I could tell what he was in a twinkling. I'm shrewd, you know; if I find he's got one good trait, I'll put him in the way to have more. Wont Judge Abington's name go a little way towards silencing the scandal of the town?"

Gertrude's expressive countenance indicated the pleasure she felt at this unlooked for assistance.

"Uncle Joshua," she said, "I know you'll be blessed for your kindness to others."

"My kindness, you young flatterer, shall I be doing more than my duty? Hang me, doesn't the Bible teach Christian forgiveness? Don't I sin semi-occasionally myself? We pray, forgive us our trespasses as we forgive others; bless you, child, if God took us at his word, and extended his charity and forgiveness no further than most of his creatures, where should we land at last? I tremble to think of it. There isn't much heart work now-a-days. I think anatomists must find that organ small, if indeed they find it at all."

"But, uncle, you're unusually severe to-day."

"I've seen enough of the world to make me severe; I'm behind the scenes. I notice all the wire-pullers by which worldly people are influenced, and made to turn this way and that, like jumping jacks. But good morning, my dear, you're so agreeable and sensible I should have spent the morning with you, had not the ticking of my watch at this moment reminded me that 'time and tide wait for no man.'" Here, with a comical bow he left the room; but not the hall, until he had popped in his head upon Gertrude, to inform her that he would see to her young man during the day.

The deepening twilight threw shadows over the lonely office tenanted by Gray Fletcher. It would have been dreary enough, had not the setting sun sent a warm, cheering glow through an opened blind. The golden beams momentarily flushed the young man's face, then fading away, left him pale and sad as before. He was seated before a low desk, upon which lay a weighty volume of the law. A dry pen by the side of an unopened inkstand, together with the general appearance of the room, indicated that business had not been very brisk for that day at least.

"O, dear," said he at length, to himself, pressing his hand upon his forehead, "four weeks, and I've not received a single call. There's my sign, newly painted, no one seems to notice it. I can't live without work. Let me see, just two dollars in my pocket-book, all I own in the world, and no prospect of getting more. Not a very flattering state of things; and yet I've heard it said that God will help those who try to help themselves. I'm losing faith in that, for haven't I tried to help myself since—"

"Since what?" inquired a voice within him. Here the young man uttered a deep groan.

"Since I exiled myself from friends and home, and became to the world a vagabond and a wanderer. O, I see how it is, I'm branded, yes, with the seal of Cain. Can it be possible?" He uttered these words in a low, startled voice. "Is it possible that my past sins follow me to this quiet place? It seems to me I've noticed within a week or two, that some have leered curiously at me, young Dow in particular. I've fancied, too, they shrank from me as the virtuous shrink from the erring. If so, O, my God, whither shall I flee?"

At this moment his distress became insupportable, and seizing his hat he rushed into the open air. One by one, the gentle stars stole out, and twinkled lovingly above. Then the moon poured forth a flood of mellowed radiance, even upon him, poor and forsaken as he was by the world, yet not by God; not by the living, breathing, natural world. The flowers shrank not from his touch, but raised their fair and blushing faces to meet his gaze, and shed their perfume even upon his way. There seemed a soothing influence rising from the great heart of nature, which met and sympathized, and calmed his troubled soul. He turned to walk upon a rural bridge which led from the town. The moon threw her rays sparkling down upon the stream as though ten thousand spirits had cast the feathers from their silvery wings upon its surface. He gazed upon the lovely scene. There seemed a voice within him to say, "Gray Fletcher, you have sinned, but go—by a lifetime of virtue make atonement for that sin! Live a better man, and God will help you." He turned back to his office; a new spirit appeared to have taken possession of him. He was a calmer, better, more hopeful man.

"Ah," he said, "it's hard to suffer for the sins of a reckless youth, but I'll not be broken-hearted. I'll live it down, with God's help." And dashing a tear from his burning cheek, he seated himself before an open volume of Blackstone. A moment he pored over its pages, but was quickly aroused by the footsteps of some one approaching his room. "What," thought he, "is it possible I'm about to have a client." His heart and hopes rose higher and higher within him, as the new-comer neared his office, and when, indeed a rap summoned him to the door, he was almost breathless with excitement.

"How do you do?" inquired a pleasant voice. "I suppose this must be Mr. Fletcher, whom I address."

"Yes, sir, take a seat, sir; you have the advantage of me. I could not call you by name, although I think I've seen you before"

"Abington, sir, a brother lawyer," replied Judge Abington, for he it was, who had thus suddenly made his appearance.

"Ah, sir," returned Gray Fletcher, with a flush of glad surprise, "Judge Abington, whose office is but a few steps from here."

"The same," replied the judge, "and I want to get you, if possible, that is if you've not already too much business on your hands, to accompany me to Ludlow. Court sets to-morrow, and being pretty full just now, I'd like an assistant for a few days."

Gray Fletcher could hardly articulate a reply for pleasure, but hastily checking himself, lest too great willingness would imply scarcity of work at home, replied slowly:

"Let me see, to-morrow, no, I'm not busy to-morrow, and shall be able to attend to your wishes, with many thanks for your kind preference."

"No matter about that, Mr. Fletcher, I know by my own experience that young lawyers are not usually very much hurried by business the first few months, therefore I ventured to call upon you."

"And for which I'm greatly obliged, Judge Abington, for to confess the truth, business has not yet been very brisk with me." A cloud of sadness gathered upon the forehead of Gray, but was quickly dispelled by the pleasant voice of Mr. Abington, who, rising to leave, cordially extended his hand to Mr. Fletcher, and fixing his gray eyes upon him, said cheerily:

"Don't be discouraged, young man, success doesn't come in an hour; keep up a stout heart, and if you need a good word spoken for you, just send over to me, perhaps I can lend a helping hand—like to give a young man a start. Have been through the mill; hang it, it's hard, but it grinds out good qualities, though. Good day, good day, my young friend." With these kind words Mr. Abington bustled out of the room, leaving Gray Fletcher in a maze of bewilderment.

What could all this mean, he thought, as soon as his scattered senses would allow him to think. Why it seemed like a dream: Judge Abington, the leading man of the town, had paid him a visit, and actually engaged his services. Poor youth, he was overcome with mingled feelings of joy and gratitude, and leaning his head upon his hands, he wept. Yes, man that he was, he wept. So susceptible is the heart of man to kindness. After the first emotions of surprise and pleasure had fled, his mind passed into a state of sober reflection.

"Judge Abington's visit will give me a start directly," thought he. "There's young Dow, who has been trying to injure me for the last week, and who has treated me so contemptuously, will notice and wonder at my being at court with the judge; and if the judge can patronize me, others will."

Ah, how much tenderer, and more hopeful was his heart now than it had previously been. If he had done wrong, how deeply he repented of it, and promised to himself and his God, over and over, that he would never prove himself unworthy the confidence Mr. Abington had reposed in him. He was not a vagabond now, all the confidence of happier days revived, and Gray Fletcher stood erect in the nobility of manliness; a sinner, but repentant. Marvellous indeed, in their effect were the words of kindness which had been spoken. He moved briskly around his little room; took down a coat that had seen better days, brushed it, and hanging it upon the back of a chair, viewed it from every possible direction: after due deliberation he concluded it would pass muster, as indeed it must, for where would a new one come from? His hat, too, was burnished and reburnished, until the nap seemed in danger of suffering serious injury; for, seemingly unmindful of his work, he labored away vigorously for many minutes, as if at every stroke he were brushing a load of care away.

But while Gray Fletcher's soul was filled to the brim with joy and thankfulness, little Miss Tittle, a spinster, who occupied a dwelling opposite the office, was engaged in a strange wonderment as to the whys and wherefores of Judge Abington's visit.

"Who ever heard of such a thing?" said she, to her confidential friend, Hannah. "If the judge haint been in that office this long time, and he comes down all smiles. What on earth does it mean? He knows Gray Fletcher's a forger, doesn't he? If not, some one ought to tell him of it. Fletcher shouldn't be countenanced by virtuous people; he ought to be made to feel that the way of transgressors is hard. What, Hannah, do you suppose I'd be seen speaking to a forger?" And she raised her eyes to heaven, expressive of virtuous indignation.

"Well, Sarah," replied Hannah, "you know the judge never had much principle in such matters. Don't you remember that girl that was around town trying to get sewing, and that looked so pale and sad? No one helped her, you know; why should they, every one said she was a ruined girl? Well, what does the judge do but send her to his sister, and told her if she hadn't any one else to look to, she might depend upon him; and then the little hypocrite cried, and said she was so thankful, and she'd always been alone in the world, and never'd had a friend, and made such a fuss that the judge cried too, and pretty times they had. I guess Mrs. Abington and Grace wished the girl was in the bottom of the Red Sea. I heard all the news from Sarah Rankin, that done plain sewing at the house. It's my opinion the judge is an old fool, and I shall believe it, too, if he takes any notice of Gray Fletcher—the vagabond. If I was a man I'd ride him out of town."

What Gray Fletcher had done to provoke the ire of the spinsters in question, was unknown, unless, perhaps, he had neglected to return the oglings and smirks which they had lavished upon him from an opposite window. But certain it was, if Judge Abington was disposed to assist him, the maidens felt in duty bound to counteract his kindness, so far as lay in their power. And, gentle reader, no one can tell what may be accomplished, when a tongue is put in motion, to which in swiftness, a trip-hammer bears no comparison.

"What the deuce does it mean?" said young Dow, to a friend with whom he was walking. "Last week at court, who was there with the judge but that notorious Gray Fletcher? The judge knows him, for didn't I take special pains to inform his daughter, Grace, all I knew upon the subject? And I was pretty correctly informed."

Dow had forgotten at the time the five hundred dollars bail his own poor father had been obliged to give for him. But then that matter had been hushed up, as good luck would have it; and he felt only the more obliged to hold up as a warning, all sinning fellow-men. Passing strange that those who live in glass houses will throw stones. But in spite of Dow, and all other malicious scandalisms, Fletcher's star was evidently in the ascendant. The judge, to tell the truth, liked the young man, and was bent on doing him a good turn.

"Well, Gertie, I've seen your young man," said Mr. Abington, as he entered the room where she was sitting, after his interview with Gray Fletcher.

"And what do you think of him?" inquired she, anxiously.

"Think of him, chick! O, he's an old scapegrace."

Gertrude's countenance saddened. "Then he was really unworthy?" she replied.

"Come here, young lady," said her uncle, holding out both hands to her; "now tell me, is all your anxiety pure, sheer disinterestedness?"

"Pray, what else could it be, uncle? Can't a woman have sympathy and charity without being in love? Isn't there such a thing as mercy in the world? O, if I were an artist, I'd paint Mercy as an angel, pleading before Justice for a sinner, until the tear should glisten in the eye of Justice, and every sin be washed away and forgotten, and encircling the whole I'd have engraven in letters of burning gold, 'Forgive us our trespasses.'"

"Why, really," yawned out Grace.

"Don't make a fool of yourself, Gertrude," said the sharp Mrs. Abington.

"Did any one ever know Gertrude Glenhem to make a fool of herself?" interrupted the judge. "No, I feel indebted to her for her good sense; she has put me in the way of doing a most charitable deed."

"Taking care of another crazy Jane, and making yourself the laughing stock of the town?" retorted his wife.

"Yes, papa," interposed Miss Grace, "Mr. Butterfly said you were a very kind gentleman, but unfortunately had some marvellous eccentricities, such as spending your breath upon that miserable girl who came here for sewing."

"Poor Mr. Butterfly," replied the judge, with a comic, tender air, "it wouldn't take much to rub the gay coloring from off his wings; perhaps he isn't aware that it's generally known he professed at one time a tender regard for the poor girl in question, and afterwards jilted her. I think likely he feels sensitive about it. Don't wonder—"

"O, papa, I'm ashamed of you."

"Ashamed of me! hang it, you'd better by half be ashamed of Mr. Butterfly. But come, Gertie, I've seen Gray Fletcher, and he's a fine young man. Didn't I notice a tear standing in his eye when I offered to take him to court? La, he couldn't but just thank me; and deuce take it, wasn't my own voice so husky I could hardly speak? So I bustled off in a hurry; but I knew I left a happier heart behind me, and to such an old cove as I am that was some consolation."

"And are you really going to take him to court?" inquired Grace, with horror.

"Really going to take him, and why not?"

"O, Mr. Abington, you'll be the ruin of our family yet," replied his wife.

"And who's been the building of the family, if I haven't?" said the judge, slyly winking.

"But, papa, dear papa, he's a forger; I had it from young Dow."

"So much the more reason why he should go to court to-morrow; in fact, that's the very reason why I'm going to take him. If he's been unfortunate, I'm going to help him."

"It is no more than right that he should suffer; his sins should be visited upon his own head," said Mrs. Abington.

"Lord bless you, wife, how many of us would have heads left if that was carried out?"

But Mrs. Abington, who knew no reason could convince her husband of his error, betook herself to turning over the leaves of the Bible, in search of the scriptural fate of sinners.

"Better turn to the Psalms, wife, and read the chapter on charity."

Mrs. Abington didn't hear her husband's remark, she was already absorbed in "the way of transgressors is hard."

In spite of the lamentations of Grace and Mrs. Abington, who reiterated the prophecy that papa would surely ruin the family, Mr. Abington continued to patronize the young man, who had by his frank, open manner commended himself to the old man's heart. The town wondered at it. Even the truly good, and virtuous, ventured the remark, "It was better to know a person before you trusted him too far." Young Dow bit his lips at the success of his rival, shook his head, and then swore a little. Miss Tittle was more than ever confirmed in her opinion that the judge was either a fool or insane.

But how did Gray Fletcher bear his good fortune? Ah, his drooping heart drank in this reviving patronage, as the dying plant absorbs the gentle vivifying showers from heaven, only to bloom afresh, and far more beautifully.

Gray Fletcher's office never looked more cosy and pleasant than upon the evening of which I am writing. A fire from a cheerful open stove sent little shadows playing hide and seek among the furniture of the room; for the sky was gray, and the hour twilight. Fletcher sat near a window, busily writing. A few flowers were placed on his desk, upon which ever and anon he gazed with peculiar affection. But how came flowers there, was the query? They looked wondrously like some that had been growing at Judge Abington's. But this was not strange, as Gray Fletcher had long ago been introduced to the family of the judge. Mr. Abington said in extenuation of what some people called his folly, "He's never known the comforts of a home; I like to see him enjoy himself." I need not tell you who else enjoyed his coming. There is, however, my kind reader, a tacit understanding between us: you know who watched for his coming with longing eyes, so do I; there let it rest for the present. As I was saying, Gray Fletcher sat writing, when the door opened, and in walked Judge Abington.

"How now, young man, working at this time of night? Look out, you'll injure your eyesight. I thought I'd drop in for a moment and consult you about a little plan I have, that is if you'll hear it."

"Hear it, my kind friend and benefactor!" said Fletcher, his whole face lighting up with a glow of pleasure, as he seized the old man's proffered hand, "I shall only be too glad to hear what you have to say."

"Well, then," commenced the judge; "hem, hem; hang me, I don't know where to begin. Well, then, to make a long story short, I'm growing old."

"Not yet," said Fletcher.

"Yes, yes, young man; I know my own age best—I'm sixty—statistics don't tell fibs if women do. I'm too old to carry on as much business as I have; don't want the burden of it; besides, I've got enough of the chink," he continued, slapping his pockets. "I want a younger partner."

"What in the world has that to do with me?" thought Fletcher, at the same time a slight flashing of the truth passed through his mind.

"Well, then, to come to the point, I want you to shut up this little office, take down your sign, come over to my office, and we'll have a new sign painted—'Abington & Fletcher, Attorneys and Counsellors at Law.' How does that suit you, hey?"

Suit, indeed! Poor Fletcher had not a word to say; he could only shake hands with the judge, clear his throat, pass his hand nervously through his hair, and finally cry. The judge, too, seemed unusually fidgetty. He rose from his seat, walked to the window, knocked down the shovel and tongs, and at length said:

"Hang it, young man, this must be a smoky room, it brings tears to my eyes," though to be sure the chimney was as clear as a whistle.

Soon Fletcher found voice to say, "But, judge, you've not heard the stories afloat." For they had been kindly told to the young man. Some people, you know, think it kind to repeat all the scandal they may hear to the victim.

"What do I care for the stories?"

"But they are true, judge."

"So much the better, the sin of falsehood wont lay at the door of the reporters. There's just one thing, Fletcher, if you've done wrong you've showed you're sorry for it, and that's enough. I've confidence in you, and am pretty certain that we can make horses hitch."

"O, judge, you've saved me," gasped Gray Fletcher, whose emotion was beyond his control.

"Why, deuce take it, what have I done that makes you feel so?" replied the judge, a tear standing in his eye, which he brushed quickly away.

"Done! why, when the world was dark and cold, and I on the verge of ruin, yea, judge, ready to do anything desperate—for ill usage drives a man deeper into sin—you came to me, and encouraged me, and now if the heavens should open, I couldn't be more surprised or joyful. I'm overcome, judge, I say—" And he caught his hand wildly. "God bless you, God bless you."

"Poor fellow, poor fellow; I declare, I didn't think a few kind words were going to do this. I'd like to cry, fool that I am. 'Tisn't every day I have such pleasure. Come, young man, pack up; hang it, I can't but just speak; pack off down to my office, and leave all care behind you."

And so it came to pass, that in a few days Gray Fletcher was installed the junior partner in the firm of Abington & Fletcher. All the town, Miss Tittle and Dow included, stood on the very tip-toe of amazement when they heard the news. They were more surprised, evidently, than was the old judge, when Gray Fletcher, in a few months, came to him with great consternation depicted on his countenance, desiring a few moments' conversation with him, very privately. I know the subject of their conversation; can you imagine it, kind reader? I'll leave the door of the audience chamber open, and you may listen for yourself.

"You're in love, Fletcher; haven't I known it this long time? Can't cheat these old eyes. Come, I don't want to hear a word," cried he, before Fletcher could get in a word sideways.

"I know I'm presumptuous, judge, but—"

"Yes, I know it, hang you, take her, she's a noble girl; don't speak, you have my consent, and I guess you've gained hers."

It would be useless to spend time in telling you what followed; of the greater shock the town sustained when it was currently reported that Miss Gertrude Glenhem was likely to enter the firm of Fletcher; how Miss Tittle stood for the space of five minutes, with upraised eyes, and mouth wide open; of the anathemas Grace and her mother hurled upon the kind judge and his grateful niece. But I will tell you that a white veil, and orange blossoms were soon brought into requisition; that under the orange-flower wreath rankled no thorns; that in the heart of the gentle bride, peace and meek-eyed charity reigned triumphant.

Mr. Butterfly, after having flitted through all girlhood, concluded to waste his sweetness upon Grace.

Upon Gertrude's wedding day, Mr. Abington sent the young bride a letter, containing a deed to the comfortable sum of ten thousand dollars.

Gray Fletcher long ago learned the story of Gertrude's interest, and charity; and in the days of his prosperity, caused to be painted, a picture representing Mercy pleading before Justice, for the forgiveness of a sinning youth. Underneath the picture are the words, "Forgive us our trespasses."

A GRATEFUL CLIENT.

When Judge Henderson, of Texas, was first a candidate for office, he visited a frontier county, in which he was, except by reputation, a stranger. Hearing that a trial for felony would take place in a few days, he determined to volunteer for the defence. The prisoner was charged with having stolen a pistol; the defence was "not guilty." The volunteer counsel conducted the case with great ability. He confused the witnesses, palavered the count, and made an able, eloquent and successful argument. The prisoner was acquitted—he had not stolen the pistol. The counsel received the enthusiastic applause of the audience. His innocent client availed himself of the earliest interval of the hurricane of congratulations to take the counsel aside. "My dear sir," said he, "you have saved me, and I am very grateful. I have no money, do not expect to have any, and do not expect ever to see you again; but to show that I appreciate your services you shall have the pistol!" So saying, he drew from his pocket, and presented to the astonished attorney, the very pistol the attorney had just shown he had never stolen or had in his possession.—Washington Union.

BIRTHDAY OF WASHINGTON.

BY RICHARD WRIGHT.

Columbia! while thy mountains stand,
And while thy rivers flow,
While beats one heart in freedom's land,
While man the truth shall know,
While recollections of the past
Blend with the future day,
Above all other days be classed
That one of glorious ray,
The birthday bright as sun ere shone upon—
The birthday of Virginia's WASHINGTON!

England, an Alfred may revere;
France, her Marengo's chief;
Russia, the Peter to her dear;
The Swiss, their proudest leaf
Of history, when with William Tell
Dawned Switzer's liberty;
And we our ardent bosoms swell,
In proudest, strong degree;
We hail a birthday, dear for service done—
The birthday of our high-souled WASHINGTON!

Our Washington, as bright and pure
As mortal may be found,
With every virtue to endure,
With patriotism crowned:
Our Washington, in peril's hour
When all seemed lost in gloom,
Himself an all-redeeming power—
A sunlight to illumine—
To cheer with hope! his country thought was gone,
To do! to win! transcendent WASHINGTON!

From his youth upward still the same,
Unchangeable and true,
Warm with the glow of freedom's flame,
Which with his own growth grew;
In every station which he filled,
In field or cabinet,
His honest bosom but distilled
The love and truth which met
With Heaven's approval, as heaven's splendor shone Around the brow of peerless WASHINGTON!

General of armies in the cause
Of struggling liberty;
Chief magistrate, whose leading clause—
Impartiality;
Retiring, still he showed his love
In valedictory,
Urging us ever to approve
The Union's unity!
Each of the States an independent one—
The country all, so breathed a WASHINGTON.

Columbia! while thy mountains stand,
And while thy rivers flow,
Hail! hail his birthday through the land,
With deep affection's glow;
Ye "thirty-one," from shore to shore
Join the great Jubilee;
In union firm, for evermore,
Clasp hands with liberty;
And come what may, fear not to draw upon
Columbia's rock-built bank of WASHINGTON!

HOW PHILIP CLEVELAND WON HIS WIFE.

BY ARTHUR C. WAINWRIGHT.

THERE was a joyful gathering at one of the oldest and richest mansions in Leicester Square. The rooms were filled with the elite of New York society. The young and the gay, the maiden in the first bloom of loveliness, and the young man whose talents had procured him the invitation his poverty would have prevented, all met together in these splendid apartments, where pictures and statues, and beautiful flowers were mingled with rich furniture and costly ornaments. The brilliant chandeliers were reflected back from the long mirrors, which multiplied the other objects, until the eye ached with excess of light and glitter. A beautiful conservatory led from one of the spacious rooms, and was filled with the rarest and choicest plants. This room was partially darkened, there being no light except what came from a shaded crystal lamp, half-hidden by the redundant leaves, and filled with perfumed oil, which gave out an odor beyond even that of the flowers themselves. On a bracket, behind some tall, graceful plants, was the exquisite group of the Angel and the Child; and, just at the entrance, lay the sculptured image of a sleeping infant. Beyond this room was the library, opening by glass doors, into a large garden which extended into the next court, every foot of which was worth as many gold pieces as could be laid on its surface, but which could not be purchased for money; so much did the owner prize its refreshing shade, and the green coolness which thus sprung up in the very heart of the hot and dusty city.

These doors were open, and the refreshing air came wafting the perfume of the flowers, as it swept through the conservatory, and tempering the hot atmosphere of the reception room. And all this grandeur and show were to celebrate the birthday of Madeline Tracy, the only child of the rich owner of the mansion. For her was this crowd gathered to do homage to the manifold perfections which in the wealthy heiress are so readily seen and appreciated.

As may well be supposed, there were many aspirants to her favor, and of these, the acknowledged favorite of her father was young Walter Sunderland; and no one doubted the match would prove an agreeable one to all parties. The young man was such, in character and reputation, as to gain the universal approbation of the coterie assembled in upper tendom; and in person he was handsome enough to be the object of admiration to all the young ladies.

Among the visitors that evening, invited to the princely mansion, on account of his rising talent, was Philip Cleveland, a young poet of no ordinary genius. He had been gradually but surely growing into popular favor, and mingled with the highest society; but no one could have deemed him presuming enough to lift his eyes to the daughter of the rich Mr. Tracy.

In a secluded country home, with no one to listen to the promptings of his genius, except the partial ears of his mother and sister, Philip Cleveland had sometimes feared that he might overestimate his talents. But he was gratified to find, when he entered the upper circles of society, that his fame had preceded him, and he was most cordially received on account of that fame. Madeline Tracy was one of the first to welcome him, as she had been one of the first to recognize and herald his genius, before she knew him personally; and it was long before she knew that her disinterested praise had awakened for her a feeling in his heart, which could never be quenched except by her neglect or contempt.

This night, Madeline had gathered in groups those whom she thought most congenial to each other; and a little knot of literary people were hanging upon the words of Cleveland, as he poured out, in his high-toned eloquence, his opinions upon the art he loved. Madeline watched the effect of his words on the listeners, and her heart throbbed with emotion at her own thoughts.

"And this gifted being has laid his heart at my feet!" thought she. And as she looked round on the trappings of wealth with which she was surrounded, she thought how infinitely higher was that wealth of mind which distinguished Philip Cleveland. Yes, he had told her that the crowning reward of his aspiring genius was her love; but he knew, even if she bestowed it, he might vainly ask her father for a right to receive it. And for once, his heart had bitterly rebelled at the miserable and sordid restraints of society, which placed his happiness in the cold keeping of those restraints, and would in all human probability doom him to disappointment.

Still it was something to know that Madeline returned his love; that she had risen far above the heartless conventionalities which would have led her to despise an unknown and obscure man. It was worth something, too, to know that she had voluntarily wished herself less wealthy, so that no stain of a mercenary nature could be attributed to the man she loved. She told him so that very evening, in the few brief moments in which they stood together in the twilight darkness of the conservatory, and he believed her words.

The voice of Walter Sunderland, eagerly asking her father for her hand in the next dance, recalled her from her momentary oblivion of her guests; and she obeyed the impulse of her father's hand, as he motioned to her to join in the dance with Walter.

"I am absolutely given to this man," she said, as she gave him the hand she could not well refuse. "Yes, given to him," she continued, bitterly, as he led her to the set. "O, for power to free myself, and to give my heart openly to Philip."

Looking round, she saw Cleveland leaning against a pillar, and seeming sad and out of spirits. She cast a look of smiling faith upon him, which no one noticed but himself; and his eye lighted up instantly; there was magic in that fearless, trusting smile, which gave him new life. It told him that come what might, of cloud or sunshine, she would be true and faithful still—and he believed it.

That night Walter Sunderland asked Mr. Tracy's permission to address his daughter, and it was granted. Philip inadvertently heard it, and in ten minutes from that time, he had stolen out through the darkened conservatory, without taking leave of his host, and was soon pacing the floor of his temporary home at a hotel. All night he walked there, full of dark forebodings of evil. He knew Mr. Tracy would never consent to have Madeline give up Sunderland for him, and although scarcely thinking that Madeline would change, he yet feared what persuasion or threats might force her to do.

In the morning he went out, unable longer to endure the stifling, choking atmosphere of the house. He felt suffocated, and the outer air seemed to act on his heart as well as his senses, as an exhilarator. He strolled off into the vicinity of Mr. Tracy's house; but started away again at a wild pace, when he saw Sunderland's carriage standing at the gate. He crossed the square, and turned into a quiet, retired street, that seemed as if the inhabitants were all asleep, so full of stillness and repose was the place.

As he passed on, he heard the massive door just shutting, and a light footstep run down the steps. He did not look up, in his abstracted state, hardly conscious indeed, that he had heard anything. The footstep came on lightly behind him, and then a low voice said "Philip!" He turned and saw Madeline, with the flush of morning exercise upon her clear, healthful cheek. There was the same cordial greeting as ever, only she saw the touch of sadness on his brow, and unconsciously her own caught the same look.

"You out so early, Miss Tracy, and Mr. Sunderland's carriage at your gate!"

"Miss Tracy!" she repeated, laying her hand on his arm, almost caressingly.

His first impulse was actually to shake her off, but he caught the reflected expression of his own sadness radiating in her eyes, and he softened at once.

"Madeline! then, if I may still call you so. The knowledge that you have a visitor this morning, waiting your return, has almost maddened me; and the feeling that I cannot compete with Walter Sunderland for your hand, because I am poorer than he is, is too bitter a thought for me to bear calmly."

"Philip Cleveland, you do me wrong. I have owned to you, before this, that you were not indifferent to me. Will you force me now to do what I have always considered it unwomanly and unjust to do—to boast of a rejected offer? If I cannot justify myself otherwise in your eyes, know then, that last night, I positively rejected Mr. Sunderland; and if that is not enough, I will add further that it was because my affections were engaged."

"Madeline, you give me new life, new hope! May I dare to indulge it? And yet, the difference between us, how it preys upon me!"

"The difference of money, I know. In all else, I am immeasurably your inferior. O, that I could annihilate this foolish, witless distinction of wealth, parting as it does, the hearts which otherwise would be happy together."

"You feel this, Madeline?"

"I do, sincerely."

"God bless you!" burst from Philip's lips. "Then indeed I am happy," continued he, "even if no tie ever binds us together. If your father could be persuaded to give up his prejudices also. O, Madeline! would to Heaven you were as poor as I am!"

They had emerged now from the dull, quiet street, and had turned back into the square, when Sunderland's carriage passed them, and he was looking directly at the pair who were walking in close conversation. Madeline looked up first, blushed and bowed. Philip also bowed, but coldly, and they received an angry look in return.

That look brought Madeline to consciousness. She knew too well that her father made money his idol, and how hard it would be to convince him that she did not need to marry a wealthy husband. His ambition for her was not to be disappointed so. But knowing also his veneration for talent, she hoped. It would seem small grounds on which she hoped; but if she could rouse Philip to some great effort, she felt that it might yet be realized.

They parted at the door of Mr. Tracy's house; Philip with a renewed hope in his heart, and Madeline with a faint dawning of the same blessed inspiration. Her father met her kindly, but with a sober look on his countenance, as if he were not quite pleased.

"Mr. Sunderland has been here, my daughter."

"I know it, father. I met him as he drove away."

"And your determination is unaltered?"

"Absolutely. I am willing to remain unmarried, dear father; willing to devote my life to you, and make no other ties—but I am not willing to bind myself to a man whom I cannot love just because he is rich enough to gild the cage in which he may imprison me."

"Is it not rather because you have formed another attachment, my child?"

"And what if it were, father?"

"What if it were? I could not bear to see you lowering yourself to the level of a poor man."

"Think a moment, dear father. Did my mother stoop, when she, in the full glow of generous, unselfish love, made you a sharer of her noble fortune? Did she not feel that your worth and nobleness of mind were equivalents to the gold which she inherited from her father? And did she ever repent that she so decided? Ah, why do you interpose an objection in my case, which was so nobly and successfully waived in your own? Did my mother, did any one respect you less, because your worldly prospects were not equal hers? O, father, remember your own youth, and then, if you have the heart, bind me to a man which I do not value."

Mr. Cleveland sighed heavily. He remembered the brief career of his youth, and the beloved wife, who disobeyed her father to share his lot. He did not dare to remember that her father's life had been shortened by that disobedience, and that ere they had known a year of the advantages which that immense wealth brought them, his wife had laid down her life when Madeline was born. How little of happiness had that wealth ever brought him, except that of ministering to his daughter's comforts! And now he was about to make her miserable for the sake of gain.

"And then again, dear father, how much you think of talent! You always respect it more than anything else. Would you value the statue of a Rothschild as highly as you do that of Shakspeare or Walter Scott? And as she spoke of these, she laid her hand tenderly on her father's arm, and gently turned him towards his cherished marbles.

"I know what you would say, Madeline. You would bid me choose between Walter's wealth and Philip Cleveland's talents. But do you grant no excellence to Sunderland except his riches?"

"Many, dear father! but none that speak to my needs. I appeal to yourself, would you not have been as happy with my mother, was she not as happy with you, as if wealth had been showered on you both?"

"God knows she was, and that I would have been!"

"Now, father, let me make a compact with you. I will live with you, and for you alone, if you will promise to abandon all schemes for my marrying at all. I will give up Philip, who loves me, not for my wealth, but because he knows that I appreciate him. But allow me to remain single. Let me devote myself to you alone."

"You will think me a stern, selfish old fellow, if I accept this offer, my child."

"No, father. It will cost me regrets, but not reproaches."

"I accept it then, for a year. If in that time I see a man who loves you and is worthy to be your husband, I shall propose him to your acceptance."

One interview with Philip was allowed her, in which she bade him go and gather the laurels the world was ready to bestow on him who seeks worthily for fame. The promise that she would never marry another softened the pain of parting to him; and the engagement they made of corresponding, was another balm to both hearts.

A year sped on its course, and Madeline was the contented, loving, devoted child, ministering to her father's declining years, with a love and affection that merited a rich blessing in return. One year, and the world had already crowned with its highest honors, an unknown poet. Some said he was from one country, some of another, but all agreed that any might be proud to own him for her son.

Madeline read all that came from his pen. It accorded with the sentiments of her inmost soul, and although she knew not whence the inspirations of this genius emanated, she felt that they were such as Philip Cleveland might feel, had he been made happy. She did not reflect that the brightest efforts of genius spring from the crushed and wounded spirit.

Daily were these books her solace and delight. She read them to her father, who placed the stamp of his approbation on every page; and his approbation, nice and discriminating as it had ever been, was no mean tribute to any author.

This year was not suffered to go by in vain regrets, by Madeline. From afar off, but without any clue to his residence, for his letters to her came addressed under cover to his mother, Philip wrote her such words as a tender brother might have written to an orphan sister. And she happy, or at least content with these, preserved her peace and serenity.

People said that Madeline Tracy was growing beautiful. She had ever been called plain before; but there was a sweet, spiritual look on her face now, suggestive of something better than beauty. It was the constant communion, hallowed and sanctified mysteriously by distance and absence, with a kindred soul.

Again came Madeline's birthday, and again her father insisted on its usual celebration. Madeline would gladly have refused, for the letter from Philip had been strangely delayed, and she was growing anxious and disturbed; but her father's will was law, and she consented. The rooms were again crowded; but she was delighted to find that fewer wealthy, and more intellectual people were invited by her father, than ever before. Madeline had never met at one time, so many people of talent and intellect; and never had she appeared so much at home, or so self-possessed as on this evening.

She was making a tour of the rooms, speaking cheerfully to each of the guests, when she was arrested by hearing from one of the little scattered groups, a few words respecting the authorship of the books which had created so much speculation on both sides of the Atlantic. One after another the guests joined in different tones of criticism; and Madeline was completely hemmed in by the crowd. She heard her father's voice, but could not catch his words, until in a brief interval of comparative silence, she heard him say to the company:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I have the honor to present to you the author of the charming works you have just been admiring."

Madeline's heart beat high. She knew instantly that her father had been planning some pleasant surprise for her; but how little did she anticipate what was to follow?

As Mr. Tracy's tall form leaned over the group, he beckoned her to come near him, and when she came through the parted crowd, and stood by her father's side, she felt her hand grasped, and heard her name spoken. Philip himself stood before her!

The company had dispersed, and the last good night had been uttered, when Mr. Tracy led Madeline back to the room now vacant except for one motionless figure. Philip Cleveland stood there, scarcely conscious of the brilliant sensation which he had inspired that evening, or the adulation he had received. What was it to him, if his fame could not reflect upon the being for whom alone he valued it? Yet he lingered still, for Mr. Tracy's manner had been singularly kind and distinguishing; and it was a letter addressed to him from Mr. Tracy, and forwarded him by his mother, that had brought him from his seclusion, on the occasion of Madeline's birthday. And yet how vain for him to be here, and feel that she was lost to him! He had seen, as he passed the tables and reading-desks scattered profusely around, his own books, with innumerable passages marked as beautiful—and he felt how more than delightful it would be to have that appreciative second self always by his side strengthening and cheering him.

Can he believe the reality of his senses, when Mr. Tracy approached him with Madeline, saying, "Mr. Cleveland, one year ago I entered into a compact with this little girl, and the closing part was that, if by this time, I saw one who loved her, and that I thought worthy to be her husband, I should propose him to her acceptance. That time has come. You have proved yourself worthy; and she, too, by her beautiful devotion to me, notwithstanding that I thwarted her in her dearest hopes, deserves to be rewarded with all the happiness I can give her."

"Father!" was all that Madeline could utter, as Mr. Tracy joined their hands, and left them, with the tears streaming down his cheeks. And thus PHILIP CLEVELAND WON HIS WIFE.

THE KOSSUTH FAMILY.

The daughters of the admirable Madame Meslervi, the Nightingale of the Hungarian war hospitals, have been most generously cared for by Mrs. Cruger, of N. York, and, under superior teachers, have grown up to sensible and accomplished women, such as would have rejoiced the spirit of the departed mother, who exclaimed on her death-bed that she could now expire in peace. Her youngest daughter would be in a better condition than she has ever been. Friends of Madame Zakyaki have purchased for her a little farm in New Jersey, where she lives in comfort with her two youngest children. Her second son is quite distinguished as a civil engineer in the West. The gentle, discreet and accomplished Madame Ruttpay has established a boarding-school for young ladies at Cornwall, near Newburg, which promises to be highly successful. Her eldest son, a graduate of Union College, is in the engineer department of the navy yard at Brooklyn; the second is in the navy agency at New York. They are gentlemanly, unexceptionable young men.

THE RULE OF RIGHT INVIOABLE.

When Philip of Valois swore the officers of his mint to conceal the debasement of the coinage, and to endeavor to make the merchants believe that the gold and silver pieces were of full value, he thought that, although perhaps unprincipled, such a measure would be vastly profitable. And so no doubt believed the other kings, who, in the "good old times," almost universally did the like. They overreached themselves, however, as all such schemers do. It is true that their debts were diminished "in proportion to the reduction in the value of the currency; but their revenues were at the same time reduced in the like ratio. Moreover, the loss of their reputation for honesty made them afterwards unable to borrow money, except at proportionately high rates of interest, to cover the risk run by the lender." So that they not only lost on the creditor side of their accounts what they gained on the debtor side, but put themselves at a great disadvantage for the future. After centuries of, dearly-bought experience, the practice was reluctantly abandoned, and is now universally exploded as essentially suicidal—just as suicidal, in fact, as all other infringements of the rule of right.—Social Statics.

FIRST INVENTION OF GLASS.

According to Pliny, glass was invented by accident, in Syria, at the mouth of the river Belus. Some merchant adventurers, who were driven there by the fortune of the sea, were obliged to reside there for a time, and dress their victuals as they might. They made a fire on the ground, and some of the kali, which was found there, was burnt to ashes. The sand or stones accidentally mixed with it; and thus without any design a vitrification—or conversion into glass—took place; whence the first was taken and easily improved. The same writer says that the first manufacture of glass was in Sidon. A later period it was made at Rome; and afterwards at Venice, to a great extent and with great profits. England and France have had large establishments for the manufacture of this article nearly a hundred years past; and now it is made in the United States sufficient for the wants of the whole population.—Tribune.

SOOT.

In England, this is saved and applied to the wheat, and other crops, with great returns. In this country it is too often thrown into the street, and lost. About eighteen bushels are a good dressing for an acre. Several salts of ammonia, magnesia, and lime, render it too valuable to be wasted. As a liquid manure for the garden, nothing is better than three or four quarts of soot dissolved in a barrel of water, and applied with a watering-pot. Almost every family may, as well as not, preserve a few bushels of it. It is good for any kind of grain; also for roots, especially potatoes and carrots; and nothing except Peruvian guano—which it is silly to buy, and at the same time throw away about as good an article—is equal to it for giving a rich bloom to flowers. Save your soot, and you may have the richest vegetables and the brightest flowers.—Plough, Loom and Anvil.

PROGRESS.

BY GEORGE W. CROWELL.

The march of time has ever brought,
 Along its wide, extended reign,
 Conceptions grand, new fields of thought,
 Exalted truth, whilst error's slain.

Its course is o'er most ancient forms,
 When God and right have ceased to be;
 It rides triumphant with the storms
 Which sweep o'er mountain, vale and sea.

Those storms are of the kingdom mind,
 Which, slow uprising, strong and sure,
 Burst wild on realms of lust and crime,
 And build an empire there secure.

New theories into being spring,
 Illume but faint the mental sky;
 Though rich the fruits they onward bring,
 And stamped with beauty from on high.

Like morn's first rays they glimmer low,
 And struggle with a world of gloom,
 But still advancing brighter glow,
 To burst in full eternal bloom.

Thus ever since the race of man
 Has reared upon the plains of time,
 Creations from inventive plan,
 Or sought to mould the plastic mind.

Those fearless souls who led the way,
 Have struggled faithful, well and long,
 Before the bright, expectant day
 Has given new triumph to their song.

THE COUSINS:

—OR,—

MARRYING RICH AND MARRYING POOR.

BY MRS. MARY CRUIKSHANKS.

THEY were by far the handsomest girls in our school. It was impossible to say which had the most admirers among us—the queenly, dark-eyed Caroline, the languishing, graceful Emily, or sweet Mary, with her winning gentleness, her retiring beauty and her warm, friendly heart. Byron says:

"An eye's an eye, and whether black or blue
 Is no great matter, so 'tis in request."

And truly those lines were appropriate to Mary Aylett, for intimate as I have always been with her, to this day, I know not the color of her eyes. If "the kindest may be taken as a test," then was she, as I always thought her, by far the most beautiful one among us—for whoever sought sympathy from her in vain? whoever asked a favor and had it refused? Did one of the older scholars smuggle a novel under her pillow, and when she ought to have been studying, spend the hours devouring its precious contents—who would assist her out of her difficulties so well as Mary Aylett? Did a little idle one neglect her exercises and run risk of disgrace—who so ready to explain, advise and help along, as Mary Aylett?

And yet she was not more popular than her cousins Caroline and Emily, possibly because her good deeds were done modestly, while theirs were blazoned abroad; or, it may be, that like all the world over, the wealth of the two latter had more weight than goodness, with the little world of our school.

When a poor widow's only son was killed by an explosion in a mill, not far from our school, and our principal gave us leave to assist her, the sisters bestowed clothes and money with ostentatious profusion, and called Mary "mean," because she refused to add to the donation; but when, a few days after, I accidentally found her in the humble cottage, giving words of comfort to the sorrow-stricken mother from the Holy Book, I was satisfied in my own mind where the true charity was.

I have said the Ayletts were all beautiful, and two of them were rich; but of Mary's parents very little was known. Her mother had died at Mary's birth, and her father had gone a voyage to India soon after, leaving his child to his brother's care, with a sufficient sum, well invested, to pay handsomely for her board, clothes and education. For sixteen years, all the tidings received from the absentee was an occasional letter, very short, very crabbed—Mr. Aylett said, "very characteristic." "Brother John always was odd; he was odd in his youth, very odd in his marriage, exceedingly odd in his grief when his wife died."

Now as some might like to know what such a character meant, it may be as well to inform them that it consisted, in his "youth," in supporting his father and mother when his elder brother grew ashamed of them; in his "marriage," in choosing an amiable poor girl, instead of an ill-tempered rich one; and at her death in leaving, as he then thought forever, the scenes of his happiness and misery.

Disappointment had soured his temper, and the letters he sent his brother were not particularly affectionate; and as his brother judged by the tone of said letters that his affairs had not prospered very well, he in turn did not think it worth while to waste much affection on one whom he shrewdly suspected would come home some day, poor and friendless, to be a burden on him for the remainder of his life. Mr. Philip Aylett had a horror of poor people, especially poor relations.

To his daughter, John Aylett never wrote; he could not divest himself of the idea that the life of her in whom he had centered all his affections had been given for the little creature on whom he never looked but once, and that with the most painful feelings. He never tried to love her, even in imagination, and he never dreamed how much the poor child had suffered from his neglect.

As the sum settled on her paid her aunt and uncle handsomely for all the care they bestowed, Mary was looked on very agreeably by her relatives, who hoped that she would make a good match early in life and then be off their hands. "Nothing very extra, of course you know, as she has no fortune; but some one in respectable circumstances. My niece must marry respectably, of course."

What Mr. Aylett's ideas of "respectable" and "very extra" matches were, appeared very soon after his niece and daughters came home from school, when the beauty and reputed wealth of at least the two latter attracted hosts of aspirants for the fair hands of the youthful heiresses. The three girls all "came out" together, and in society, still more than in school days, Mary was thrown in the shade by her brilliant cousins.

Caroline, the elder, was extravagantly fond of dress and display; nothing afforded her so much gratification as the excitement of balls and places of amusement, where, in all the glory of her beauty and magnificent attire, she could surround herself with all the principal gentlemen of her set, and triumph over the forlorn state of less favored belles.

For Emily Aylett, such scenes had many charms; but her natural indolence made the necessity of constant attention to her toilet an irksome restraint, and she would often have preferred remaining at home to doze away an evening on her favorite lounge, to undergoing the fatigue of dressing for the most brilliant party of the season. Had she been born in humble circumstances, Emily would have been an untidy, ill-dressed sloven; but as it was, what with the watchful care of her mother, the diligence of her maid, and the never-failing kindness of Mary, she contrived to keep up an appearance of elegant negligence, well suiting her style of beauty, and extremely fascinating to some tastes.

To both sisters, Mary was an indispensable assistant—her tact and willingness being of the greatest service to people as dressy as the one and as indolent as the other. Of course all she did for them was asked as a favor, but these favors came to be of such constant demanding that at times even her patience came near wearing out.

"Mary dear, wont you arrange the lace on my dress? You know you can do it so much better than Minnie can, and to-night I am anxious to look my best, you know." And the vain Caroline stood before her glass trying the effect of flowers or pearls in her dark hair, finally deciding on the pearls.

Before Mary could answer, Emily, from her luxuriously pillowed sofa, exclaimed:

"O Caroline! how can you be so selfish? you know Minnie can put your lace on just as well as Mary can, while nobody can do my hair half so well. Jane makes me so nervous, I can't get composed again all the rest of the evening."

Of course the end of such conversations was that "Cousin Mary" performed the offices of both the maids; and Caroline's velvet dress, and Emily's blonde curls, were both beautified by her skilful hands.

"How do you like Marcus Willington, Mary?" asked Caroline, as the last touches were being put to her costume ere going down to meet a select party assembling in the parlor.

"Who do you mean? that tall, dark gentleman I saw last evening?"

"No—O no!" answered Caroline, with a sly look at her sister, who was sitting in the large easy-chair in the room, recovering from the fatigue of dressing. "O, no! that's Emmy's conquest. I mean that one who talked so much to papa last evening, and wore such a beautiful ring. You must have noticed that ring! I don't think I ever saw such a magnificent diamond in my life!"

"I don't like him at all, Caroline," said Mary, with a look that showed she now knew who was meant.

"You don't? Why, Mary, he's the richest young man in New York to-day!"

"That makes no difference. If he was the son of the great Mogul himself, and owned all the diamonds in the Indies, I should like him no better."

"Why, what possible objection can you have to him?" Caroline asked, with a slight touch of ill-temper in her tone.

She thought a great deal of Mary's opinion, as in fact did all the family, and it was rather annoying to hear so decided an expression of disapprobation.

"Do you really wish me to tell you?" Mary asked, with some surprise at Caroline's evident interest in her new acquaintance.

"Certainly I want you to tell me, for I cannot imagine what you can find fault with. He is splendidly handsome, he is talented and accomplished, and better than all, he is rich as the most extravagant person could desire. I can't think what fault you can find, particular as I know you are."

"He used language last night, which if not wicked, was decidedly improper."

"O, is that all! Everybody does that once in a while, especially when they have taken a little more wine than common—and you know papa's wine is enough to tempt any one to indulge a little beyond the rule, at least they all said so at the table yesterday. You ought to have been there—they all do seem to enjoy our dinner parties so!"

"I am not partial to parties of any kind—least of all dinner parties."

"O, Mary, you are such a dear little nobody! You don't like this and you don't like that! Do you like Emily's new beau, that magnificent Dubourdien?"

Mary laughed and colored a little, as she said:

"You know I was not introduced to any one, last evening. I did not come into the room until late, and I don't think half a dozen people saw me."

"But you saw all that were there, and I want to know what you thought of him—that tall, dark Southerner! Isn't he splendid? Isn't he charming? Wont Emmy be a lucky girl, if she only secures him? I can't tell you how many hundred slaves he has, and they say his plantation is worth more than any three in the State. I should have been almost tempted to try to win him myself; but then slaves are just the things for anybody as idle as Emmy is, and besides, when I marry, I want to stay here and eclipse those who have held their heads above me this season."

"Why, Caroline, what a disposition!"

"Well, I suppose it is not right; but you know I never pretend to be a Christian such as you are—so don't lecture, now, but tell me what you think of Arthur Dubourdien."

"I have not thought much about him."

"Well, what made you color so, just now?"

"How can you girls talk so much? You quite weary me listening to your nonsense," pleaded Emily, from the lounging-chair.

And Mary, having finished her offices for them, went to her own room to attire herself. "But then," as Caroline would have said, if any one had remonstrated about these impositions, "Mary was always prepared to dress in a hurry; she always knew just where to find everything, and her clothes were always ready—so it did not matter if she had not much time."

Mary did not tell them that the reason she would not speak of the Southerner was because she could not express a good opinion; and would not a bad one. But that she did not like him, was certain; and even yet her cheeks burned at the recollection of one or two looks he had bestowed on her during the previous evening.

Two hours after this conversation, Caroline came to where Mary was in an animated conversation with some of the elders of the party, and calling her aside, whispered:

"You must let me introduce you—Mr. Willington wishes it so much."

"But Caroline, I am a very insignificant person, and you know I told you I did not wish it; pray take and introduce the gentleman to some of the many lovely young ladies here to-night."

"O no, Mary! do be good for once. He is very earnest about it." And here Caroline lowered her voice. "You will have to know him some time, Mary, for we are all but engaged."

Mary's whole expression changed in an instant; even Caroline was awed at her look.

"When I told you that I would not know that man, I meant it. If you were my sister, and going to marry him, I should say the same."

Caroline went back to her beau, while Mary, disturbed and unhappy at the conversation, soon made her escape from the room. It was not many minutes before her aunt came to look for her.

"Why, Mary, what is this Caroline tells me? You should not act so, child! You make yourself look particular, and that is something every young lady ought to avoid. Mr. Willington feels seriously annoyed; and in the present position of Carry's affairs with him, it is very unwise to do anything to vex him."

"Why so, aunt? why be more anxious about him than any one else?"

"My dear, he is the best match in New York, possibly in all America!"

"O dear!" There was something very like impatience in the tone of this exclamation and the look which accompanied it. "Aunt, I want you to listen to me for a moment, and then we will end all these vexations. I refused to be introduced to Mr. Willington because I heard him make use of bad and profane language, unfit for any gentleman to use—certainly unfit for any friend of mine to use. It makes no difference to me if he is going to marry Caroline, although I shall be sorry for her sake. He may be rich, but he is not a man to make a wife happy. You know I only go down stairs to please you and the girls, and if I am obliged to become acquainted with persons unpleasant to me, I shall have to remain in my own room when there is company here."

Mrs. Aylett was astonished at such a display of independence in the usually mild and yielding Mary. She did not attempt to argue any more with her, but when telling her husband of it, expressed her opinion that "a great change had come over her."

"Well, I always said it would do her harm to go to so many meetings and places with that Mrs. Sawyer."

"What could I do? You know Mrs. Sawyer is so wealthy and aristocratic, and Mary is so much her own mistress, that I could not prevent it. I am very sorry, now; for she has got her mind full of out-of-the-way ideas about religion and propriety, and many other things that young girls like her don't need to trouble themselves about, and I am afraid she will end by falling in love with some one as odd as she is herself."

"Well, her father was odd before her. I only hope she won't fall in love with anybody that's poor. I don't like poor people."

Orange wreaths and satin dresses; bride cake and kid gloves; cards, compliments and kisses; marriage settlements, and future residences—what a delightful confusion reigned in the mansion of the Ayletts on that auspicious morn when both the beautiful daughters were given from the care of their parents (those parents who ought to have been their guardians for at least five years longer), into the protection of two husbands, little more than strangers to all parties.

Mr. Aylett was perfectly satisfied with regard to money matters; on that point, nothing could be said. But what did he know about the dispositions or the morals of those into whose hands he committed the fates of those two beautiful, inexperienced girls? Nothing—simply nothing. They were rich—that was undeniable; and in his opinion, to be rich was to be everything. He owned there was something about young Dubourdien which made him appear distant; but then the Southerners were always a haughty set! And no one could say that Marcus Willington was not a "first-rate fellow—so merry and jovial! A capital fellow, too, to take a glass with; he knew how to appreciate good wine." Mr. Aylett would have thought so, if he could have seen some of his hopeful son-in-law's liquor bills.

Not even Caroline herself, with all her ambition to outshine her acquaintances, could find the least fault with her new home, so magnificent, so perfectly in accordance with her taste were all its arrangements. All that lavish expenditure could do, had been done; and the young bride stepped on velvet carpets, and listened to the falling of tiny fountains, and looked on nothing but gold and silver, and costly pictures and dresses of rich material. And when she was weary of all this, she went out to ride in a satin-lined carriage, the envy and admiration of all beholders; and when her husband was weary of their insipid society, he withdrew himself to a secluded apartment, where, surrounded by the luxuries of an Eastern saloon, he could indulge undisturbed in his peculiar tastes. Happy Caroline!

And Emily, too, was happy; happy in her fond belief of her husband's devotion—happy in the knowledge that a dozen slaves awaited her slightest bidding—happy in the knowledge that she could for the future sleep and dream away her existence, undisturbed by demands on her time or patience!

What mattered it if the air of her new home was oppressive and debilitating, in its uncomfortable warmth? Did not her husband keep slaves to fan her when she slept—to shade her when she rode or walked—to sprinkle cool and fragrant essences around—to render life as desirable as possible? Happy Emily! Even dressing lost half its fatigue, where so many willing hands were stretched out to assist, and where garments were made more for ease and comfort, than show.

But how different would have been that young wife's feelings, had she witnessed a scene which took place on the plantation in less than twenty-four hours after their arrival. Her husband is in a little cabin; his companion is a beautiful girl of nineteen or twenty, without any disfiguring marks of colored descent save a pair of eyes wild in their brilliancy.

The girl was evidently in a high state of excitement, while he, with kind words, was trying to soothe her.

"You know, Mima, that we had decided, long ago, that it was best for me to marry. You must not be jealous and angry; you will always be first in my love."

The girl made no reply, but stood nervously rocking a little cradle which hung from the low roof; back and forth she moved it, not with the intent of hushing the little inmate, but to still the wild workings of a bursting heart.

Arthur Dubourdien went to the other side of the little cot and stooped down to look in.

"How is the boy, Mima? Let me take him up; I want to see him."

He made a movement as if to touch it, but quicker than lightning she snatched the child from its little bed, and pressed it to her breast.

"You shall not have him! You shall never have him again! O, my babe! my babe! we are forsaken and forgotten. There is no one to love us, no one to care for us now."

An agonizing look passed over Arthur Dubourdien's dark face, and he moved towards the girl, who stood swaying herself about as if unable to control her actions.

"Mima, listen to me—pray listen to me! You must not act so, Mima. You know that no wife, no one on earth will ever be as precious to me as you and the child are. Come! be like yourself once more, now, and listen to reason."

And so with gentle words he soothed her at last, and she even smiled when she saw him caress the beautiful boy; and he left her calm and gentle. But it was the calmness of the snow-covered volcano, liable to burst forth in wild rage at any moment; and Arthur Dubourdien knew it well.

Happy Emily! she little dreams that even while her husband sits at her side and smooths her fair sunny curls, and speaks the fond baby language she loves so well to listen to, his thoughts are in that little cabin and with that dark, splendid beauty, whose life and energy are so much in accordance with his own, whose high spirit it is so hard to subdue, whose deep love it is so gratifying to know.

But Emily knows nothing of all this, and there are none to tell her; and so her life is one summer-day of calm repose, and at home her mother hears of her happiness with feelings, which not even a life of such influences as she had been under, can quite subdue.

But in the little cabin there are horrible feelings cherished against that fair, pale young wife, and the dark eyes of the revengeful Mima flash, as the low carriage drives past, bearing its lovely occupant to the fresher breezes of an adjacent hill, or to the accustomed airing nearer the mansion.

"Henry, I would not sit up any longer, I think! Your face is flushed now, and you had better get some sleep and finish it in the morning."

The young man lifted his head from the writing, over which he was so earnestly bending, and with a fond look at the speaker, answered:

"I must not trust to the morning, mother; I cannot sleep until I have completed it. But you must not sit here any longer! I cannot say your face is flushed, for it is pale as death! Put your sewing away, dear mother, and go to your room at once. I didn't think it was so late."

"But is it so necessary that Mr. Sawyer should have that writing to-morrow, Henry?"

"It must be done, mother, and I must do it; for to none other would he trust it. I know he hardly thought it possible, but I will show him that if energy and fidelity are what he expects from me, he shall not be disappointed. He is a good friend to me, mother."

"He is a good friend, but I think he makes you work too hard, Henry; and his wife thinks so too."

"All the better for me by-and-by, I hope. Mr. Sawyer's own younger days were hard ones, and he believes such lessons are good. I know he gives me these hard tasks to try me, sometimes."

"But I am afraid of your health, Henry; I am afraid you will overtask your strength."

"Don't be afraid, mother; I will be very cautious. You don't know how much more precious life has been to me, lately."

"Perhaps I know more than you are aware of, Henry."

The young man changed color, and slightly started and smiled.

"I forgot Mrs. Sawyer," he said. "I see she has betrayed me. But you don't blame me?"

"No one could blame you, my son."

The mother left the room; but for a few moments the writing did not progress as well as it had done. Busy thoughts interrupted the rapid movement of the pen, and at last the young man rose and went to the window of the small and plain-looking room.

Outside all was dark and silent; the great city was sleeping, save where here and there a glimmering light told of the watcher at the sick bed, or some one who, like himself, labored for bread while others rested. There was no murmur in that young, hopeful heart at the recollection of how many around him were better off than himself—how many there were to whom labor was unknown, and whose luxuries had been purchased by the sufferings of their fellows. No such thoughts filled his brain; but he breathed a silent prayer for the still greater number of sick and suffering, the poor and the desolate, and then closing the window, went back to his task. He had marked out a course, and he was pursuing it with determined energy; he had striven for a prize, and he was winning it.

"I cannot permit any such thing, Mary; while you are under my care, you must do as I direct in all important matters. I don't wish to hear any more about it; the thing is settled now, and so I told that very promising young man this morning."

Mary Aylett conquered her inclination to smile at the very summary manner in which her love affairs were to be disposed of, and gravely resumed the argument.

"My dear uncle, this is a case which so nearly concerns my happiness that I cannot possibly allow any one to interfere to such a degree. In anything of minor importance, you know, I have always shown you the obedience of a daughter; but about my marriage, no one but my father has a right to interfere, or forbid my doing as I like. If you have any serious objections to the person who came to see you this morning, I want you to tell them to me plainly, and I will profit by them if they are reasonable."

"Objections? Why, bless my soul, child, it is all objections! That young man is nothing but an objection. You can't possibly think of marrying him?"

"But why, uncle? What is the reason?"

"Why he is poor, child—a beggar—absolutely a pauper! You must be mad, Mary, to think of such a thing."

Mr. Aylett was growing very nervous as he found how firm and resolute that gentle girl could be, when sure that she was right.

"He has but a small salary, I know, uncle, but he is far from being a beggar. He has energy and industry enough to not only make a living, but to rise in the world, if health and strength are spared him."

"Pshaw! Energy and fiddlesticks! You shan't have him! so there's an end of it. A miserable lawyer's clerk, indeed! I guess you can do better than that—a pretty girl like you, Mary."

"I don't want to do any better, uncle; I am quite satisfied to share his poverty."

"Well, I aint satisfied that you shall. I hate poor relations too much to let you marry a beggar, and then come to me by-and-by with a whole troop of children and a poverty-stricken husband, to support. I can make a great deal better use of my money."

"Uncle!" Mary's feelings were almost too great for words. How different was this scene from what she had sometimes pictured—leaving home with a father's blessing. But her father had long since been supposed dead, and her only relative thus cruelly wounded her feelings.

Mrs. Aylett, who, since her children's marriage, had become much attached to Mary, secretly did much to comfort her for her uncle's anger; and Caroline—who, little time as she had been married, had learned the truth of some few old proverbs—was very affectionate when they met, and Mary thought much changed, so little did she say against the poverty of him whom Mary had chosen.

"It is a pity he had not been better off; your father would not have said a word against it if he had been better off," said Mrs. Aylett.

"O, mother, don't say anything to hurt Mary's feelings; money is not everything." Happy Caroline!

"Now, Henry, I must not have you think any longer that I am going to be a burden on your hands."

They had been married almost a week, and he was preparing for his morning's walk to the office when she thus addressed him.

"A burden, Mary? I don't understand you."

"Well, I know you don't, dear, and that's what I want to explain."

"I think I can guess what you want to do; but I cannot allow it. You have never been used to do anything, Mary, and I do not intend you shall have to work for a living while you are my wife. Attend to your books, or your sewing, dear, and amuse yourself as well as you can while I am away. I have made every arrangement with mother, and she will see that the girl attends to her duties about the house. You have had no experience in such cares yet, and I do not wish you should."

"But it was not that I wanted to say, Henry. I wanted to tell you that I was richer than you thought, for the sum that my father settled on me is mine now, so you see that I am not quite a penniless bride."

"You are mistaken, love, about that. The morning I saw your uncle he told me the first thing, that on your marriage you would lose that, as it was only left to pay your board to him."

"Well, he did not tell you the truth, Henry, and I thought I would not say anything about it until we were married; but it is mine, and will be quite an addition to our income. Of course it did not seem a great deal to uncle, but it will be something to us, wont it?"

"It will, indeed, and I'm very glad it is so; even if you did not tell me before," he added, laughing.

"Well, now, since you have discovered that you are so much richer than you thought you was, wont you stay home a few days longer from the office? You can't think how I dread the thought of your being shut up there all the bright sun-shiny day."

"My dear Mary, if I consulted inclination, most certainly I would not leave you; but my word, dear, the promise I gave Mr. Sawyer, that cannot be broken on any consideration. I told him I would be there this morning, and of course he expects me, and of course I must go. You would not wish me to do otherwise?"

"No, no, Henry; it was very childish of me to say such a thing. I shall soon get used to being here without you, and it will be a pleasure to expect you home in the evening."

"Why did you not raise Henry Harding's salary a little higher when you were about it?" asked Mrs. Sawyer of her husband, as the two sat at breakfast that morning that Henry started for the office.

Mr. Sawyer put down his coffee cup and looked almost angrily at his wife, as he answered:

"Because I wish him to struggle a little, as I did when I was his age; because I want him to deny himself luxuries as I used to have to deny myself; because I don't want him to spoil that doll of a wife he has been taking; and because I want to see him become a greater man than ever I dared to hope to be."

Mrs. Sawyer smiled. "Will all this be accomplished, think you?"

"I trust so, for I love the boy as if he was my own."

No one would have thought under that rough, harsh-looking exterior, how much benevolence, generosity and love were hidden; but such was the fact, although he sometimes took strange ways to show it.

"I hope Mary won't be deprived of too many of the comforts she has been used to; it won't do to make her suffer for marrying the man of her choice, especially when we know it to be such a good choice."

"Don't be uneasy, Mrs. Sawyer, you know very little of that boy if you think he would let her want for anything. I tell you, you will see the day when she will be as far above you in point of wealth and position, as I am now above him."

Mrs. Sawyer smiled again. "You can't make me jealous if you try; I think my little favorite deserves all the good that can possibly befall her."

"I don't know about that," was the answer. "She must be something more than the common run of our fashionable girls if she deserves the husband she has got."

A year passed Emily Dubourdien's marriage with but little change; but ere a second elapsed a beautiful babe was given to the mother's arms, and then for the first time she cast aside the idle habits she had indulged in from her childhood, and really began to take an interest in life and living.

On Arthur, the birth of his child had the effect of increasing his love for his beautiful young wife, and at the same time filling his mind with apprehensions of the worst kind.

Mima, with an evil eye, had noted the change in him she loved so well. She felt that the fair, innocent girl whose will so gently yielded to his, was gradually twining herself round a heart, not naturally evil, but spoiled from unrestrained liberty.

So potent was the spell of love which Emily had cast around her husband, that ere a year of their married life was at an end, he would have made any sacrifice to have got rid of the beautiful Mima from the plantation; would have done almost anything to prevent the possibility of his wife's ever knowing of her existence.

But no offers could induce the girl to leave, and Arthur could not find it in his heart now to forcibly send her away, or sell her as he would once have done, for Mima was his slave.

But he lived in constant dread of her, and possibly the watchful care he had of Emily was one of the strongest reasons of her attachment to him. Certain it was that they were very happy together, and the little delicate babe was almost worshipped by both.

No one ever saw Mima near the house, yet she came there often when they little dreamed there was a spy on their actions; when Arthur had no idea that those flashing black eyes were watching him caress his babe and its mother; or that ears of keenest sharpness were listening to his loving words.

Through the other slaves he learned how strangely Mima treated her boy from the time Emily's little girl was born: one hour bestowing the wildest caresses upon it, the next abusing the poor child with heartless cruelty. But the slaves all said Mima was mad, and Arthur himself almost thought so sometimes. One night there was a fearful storm, and while the thunder rolled overhead, and the lightnings flashed, and the rain came down in torrents, Arthur strove to quiet Emily's fears, and allay her apprehensions with that tenderness which had become part of his nature now.

The little child was with them, and while its nurse was busy about the apartment, Emily put on the little cambric nightdress, and tied the bands, and then arranged the delicate lace frills, and then held the little beauty up in her arms for the father to admire. And as he lay carelessly on a sofa, Arthur Dubourdien thought never was sweeter picture seen than that fair, young, girlish mother and her lovely infant.

But other eyes than his were on them; and a tall, slender form stood outside in the darkness and the storm, and felt not wind nor rain, nor saw aught save that beautiful group, and the admiring glances he bestowed on them. Her child, which she held to her heart, at last began to cry with the cold rain falling on him, and she hastily turned away and went to her desolate cabin.

"She sits in her splendor and her state, and he loves her better than he ever loved me; while his boy and I may wander about in the dark and cold, and perish in the storm for aught he cares. O, shall I let her rob me of all my joy? Shall I let her have all the good, while I have none but the bad? No, never! She shall know what it is to mourn for a lost one, as I have."

The next night at that hour the scene without was calm and peaceful, scarce a trace remaining of the storm, while within the mansion all was terrified confusion, horror and dismay.

The beautiful babe, the precious babe, the cherished one, was dying, was dead; and Arthur Dubourdien turned from watching its last struggle to bear the almost lifeless form of his wife from the scene.

No more smiles and little winning arts; no more loving kisses and fond words; the baby was dead; cold and white, and not at all like the little warm, living creature they had all loved so well. And they buried it out of sight, and the mother, hopeless and helpless, with nothing to cheer her, sunk into worse habits of inactivity, and gradually pined and drooped away; and the father, uncertain of the cause of all their grief, and yet not daring to have his worst fears confirmed, grew moody and ill-tempered, and the once happy home was broken up; the slaves were sold and dispersed, and all that tells of the past are the two white marble monuments which mark the resting places of Emily Dubourdien and her babe.

Five years after their marriage, as might have well been foretold, Caroline Willington's husband was a confirmed drunkard. Disgrace and troubles of various descriptions had humbled the proud wife's heart, and it was almost her only comfort to go to Mary, and after recounting her trials, receive the warm sympathy which her cousin never denied.

Caroline, too, had lost a babe, an only babe, and it was pitiful to see with what emotions she would caress Mary's pretty infants, sometimes lamenting that her own darling had been taken away, again rejoicing that it had been spared the disgrace of the wretched father. All her love of display was gone, her beauty was destroyed by grief and constant anxiety. Mary could scarce realize that the careworn, prematurely old-looking woman was the once beautiful, blooming Caroline Aylett.

A very large party was given one night by a lady with whom the Ayletts had long been intimate, and Mary and her husband, as well as Caroline and Marcus, received invitations. Henry would probably have gone, for the lady's husband was one whom he esteemed and respected; but in the evening, Mary perceived symptoms of illness in her youngest treasure, the "wee baby," and of course no party had any charms for the fond young mother after that.

She urged her husband to go, for Henry was now a rising man, and many sought his society, who at the time of his marriage would have disdained to speak with him. Of course Mary was proud of this, and it gave her every satisfaction to see him in the society he was so well fitted to adorn.

"You had certainly better go, Henry," she said, on this occasion. "You know how many pleasant people Mr. W—— always collects together, and you will enjoy yourself well."

"And leave you home here to walk about the room all night with the little one? No, I am afraid I should not enjoy myself much."

Mary said no more, for Henry always knew best, and to tell the truth, she was not sorry to be relieved in her care of the child, who, sick and fretful, refused to go to any one but its parents.

Late in the night, it grew so much worse that Henry went and brought their physician, who pronounced it a very sick child, and took the father back with him to get some more medicine.

"Have good courage, dear, I will be back in a few minutes; I don't believe it is going to be anything very serious," Henry whispered, as he saw how pale Mary's cheek grew at the doctor's words.

For half an hour she sat holding the little feverish babe in her arms, pressing the hot hands to her lips and brow, and using all those little soothing arts mothers so soon learn.

The child had just fallen into a troubled sleep, starting at every noise, and throwing its limbs restlessly about, when a loud ring came at the door, and Henry's mother came into the chamber in a few seconds with the bottle he had taken, and a scrap of paper. There were a few pencilled words, and Mary's heart grew almost cold as she read them :

"Give the child his medicine, and leave it with mother, and come instantly to Caroline. Don't delay a second !
HENRY."

Many women would have stopped to still the pitiful cries of the little one, unwilling to leave the mother's arms ; but, though it cost her a deep pang, Mary obeyed the urgent command to the letter, and lost not a second. She felt that some fearful calamity alone could have caused her husband to pen such a note.

"Do you know where to go to ?" she asked of the man who stood holding a horse and sleigh at the door.

"Yes, ma'am. O, ma'am, aint this dreadful ?"

Mary made no answer ; the man was suffering from some dreadful agitation ; for her life she could not ask him what he meant by this, the word which he evidently fancied she understood.

But why prolong horrors ? Why try to depict the misery contained in that wretched mansion, where the master lay dead and disfigured, the victim of a drunken riot—the mistress a raving maniac—the servants terrified and bewildered, looking for some one to give reasonable orders ? Of course any one with Henry's calm decision was invaluable to such a time ; and while he assisted to hold the frantic wife, he directed the movements of those who could restore order to the fearfully disordered house.

The story was soon told. Marcus Willington had slipped away from his wife and the rest of the company at an early hour ; had gone among some of the vile companions he best loved to associate with ; had drank until intoxicated, quarrelled and fought with one, and just as his anxious wife came home to look for him, with fearful forebodings, he was carried into his house a bleeding, disfigured corpse.

Caroline never recovered from the shock to her already shattered mind and body ; a few weeks of raving delirium, a few more of quiet, sinking away, and then they laid her beside her husband in the churchyard.

Mary, too, suffered severely from the terrors of that night, but she soon recovered, and her convalescence was materially aided by the unexpected arrival of an old and careworn man, bent with years and sorrows, and faded with long residence beneath a tropical sun.

It was John Aylett, who came home to die among the scenes of his youth ; having grown almost fabulously rich, and found all too late that not even the excitement of money-getting could cure a broken heart. He lived but a short time to enjoy the comforts and happiness of his daughter's home, and very soon after his death his brother and his wife also ended their worldly cares and troubles.

Mary and her husband are yet living, and if I have not given their true names on these pages, it is solely because he is so well and honorably known to the world.

Old Mr. Sawyer's prophecy has come true, and the lawyer's clerk has risen to be a greater man than ever he dared to be. His sons are ranked among our best and noblest men, doing highest credit to the professions they have chosen ; and the husbands of his daughters are truly among the lawgivers of the land.

AMERICAN GENERALS.

Washington was a surveyor, and in after life a farmer. "Expressive silence ! muse his praise."

Knox was a bookbinder and stationer.

Morgan (he of the Cowpens) was a drover. Tarleton got from him a sound lecture on that subject.

Greene was a blacksmith, and withal a Quaker, albeit through all his Southern campaigns, and particularly at the Eutaw Springs, he put off the outward man.

Arnold (I ask pardon for naming him in such company) was a grocer and provision storekeeper in New Haven, where his sign is still to be seen ; the same that decorated his shop before the Revolution.

Gates, who opened Burgoyne's eyes to the fact that he could not "march through the United States with five thousand men," was a "regular built soldier," but after the Revolution a farmer.

Warren, the martyr of Bunker Hill, was a physician, and hesitated not to exhibit to his countrymen a splendid example of the manner in which American physicians should practise when called upon by their country.

Marion, the "swamp-fox" of the South, was a cow-boy.

THE PERSIAN WHEEL.

This is a contrivance for raising water to some height above the level of a stream. In the rim of a wheel turned by the stream a number of strong pins are fixed, to which buckets are suspended. As the wheel turns, the buckets on one side go down into the stream, where they are filled, and return full up the other until they reach the top. Here an obstacle is placed in such a position that it overturns the bucket, and the water is poured into a spout or convenient receptacle. It is evident that with this form of wheel the water can only be raised to the height of the diameter of the wheel, and there is no doubt that it is a very rude contrivance. It is much used in Persia for the irrigation of the land, and very many of them may be seen on the banks of the river Nile.—Scientific American.

Love is like honesty—all the world are talking about it and yet it is but little understood.

LOOK UP.

BY LENA LYLE.

Look up! look up, thou troubled one,
Thy Father is above;
His heart is filled with kindness,
For the children of his love.
Come to him when in sorrow,
And he a balm will find,
To set the aching heart at rest,
To calm the troubled mind.

Look up! look up, poor orphan child,
The whole earth is before thee,
Heed not the storms of angry Fate,
That now are brooding o'er thee.
But place thy hand upon the plough,
And press it firmly on;
Look not behind, but on ahead,
At what is to be done.

Look up! look up, lone widowed heart,
Raft of each glad some ray;
O, place thy trust in Him who dwells
In realms of cloudless day.
Look up, and ask of him the peace
Which nowhere else thou'lt find;
Call him, and he will quickly come,
Thy wounded heart to bind.

Look up! look up, forsaken one!
Let faith dispel the gloom
That hovers round thy spirit now,
O, bid religion bloom.
Look up to Him who dwells above,
The King of heaven and earth;
He made the meanest thing that creeps,
He gave this world its birth.

Look up! look up, I say, to all,
Ne'er yield ye to despair!
Fling far away upon the winds
The sickening thoughts of care;
Let not a doubt of what's to come
Assail thy trusting heart,
But let thy faith in God and man
Be of thyself a part.

TRUE LOVE'S GIFT.

BY MARY W. JANVRAIN.

"No! never will I wed an unbeliever! Never peril my soul's happiness by linking myself with one who doubts the existence of a God! And yet, why should it cost me a pang to reject Bayard Hartley? Ah, is it not that I fear for his future; that I fear for the genius that undirected and unhallowed, may lead his splendidly gifted mind into thick shades of mental night? O, if by this marriage, I could be instrumental in winning him to a better life—if I could save him—then, indeed, O how joyfully would I put my hand in his—for, ah me! I fear my heart is his already—then, indeed, would it be my highest happiness to marry him! But alas! I cannot, I dare not; it would only be a double wrong, for what says my Bible? 'Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers.'" And a fair girl swept back the folds of dark hair from a pale, high forehead, and leaned her face against the cool, moist window-pane.

The little wicket gate swung to in the yard below, and outlined in the bright moonlight, she saw a well-known, manly form approaching the house, and in another moment a familiar bell-pull broke the silence of the calm, summer's evening. Why did Ellen Haven start nervously, and the red blood flush her cheek, then rush back upon her heart again leaving her marble pale? Why did her limbs almost refuse support, as, obeying the servant's summons, she went down to the parlor?

Ah, her heart had been right in its premonitions! Bayard Hartley had sought her that night to ask her to become his wife; Bayard, whose genius she so admired, whose dreamy, artist eyes had first sounded the well of love in her young heart, whose voice had been the sweetest dream of music she ever expected to listen to this side of heaven! And she, alone and untrammelled in the world, the heiress of an ample fortune, free to do her own heart's bidding, with none to urge or hinder; why did she not place her white hand in his that night, and whisper, "Yours, Bayard, forever more?"

Because, amid all the fascinations of his passionate love, amid the thrall which this travelled, eloquent, and caressed son of fortune knew so well how to weave around the woman he loved; because, amid all, one memory had kept her pure and true, the memory of her gentle mother, whose death-bed rose terribly distinct to the child who knelt beside her and listened to that mother's dying words. "My daughter, I look back upon the wreck of my life! Young, trusting, and a Christian, I went out from my father's home to become the bride of your father—an infidel! Much as I loved him, I could not respect. Our life was outwardly calm, but ah, what an inward warfare! He died suddenly; in his death-hour wicked women heard his latest breath. I do not know that he carried with him into eternity another faith than the dreadful skepticisms of his life. O, my daughter, let your Bible be a precious boon; let gold never come between you and it; and never, never let an unworthy love turn you aside from the path of duty!"

Such, a dying mother's advice to her only child; and now the hour had come when the test should be applied. "Strange fatality," thought Ellen, as her hand trembled on the door leading to the room where Bayard awaited her, "strange fatality that bequeathed my mother's love-experience to her child!"

But not, like her mother, did Ellen Haven yield. There, in that quiet summer's evening, were spoken words that proud, self-confident man of the world had not thought to hear, and by one whom he had deemed a weak, confiding girl, whose only earthly happiness centered in his love.

And she had rejected him! For a mere whim, an idle prating about duty, she had cast aside his love! Had the artist been heart-free, he could have smiled and gone on his way, so lightly did her eloquent pleadings that he would abjure his skepticism affect him; but he did love her, strongly as a gifted, passionate man could love, and thus in warmer words he besought a return of his affection.

But though his entreaties moved her much (and when did lover-tones fail to weaken woman?) they could not turn her aside from the path conscience had marked out.

"It is impossible," she said, firmly, but with pale cheek. "Bayard, much as I love you—and I deny nothing—dear as you are to me, I dare not wed you. Do not urge me more. We part as friends; and may God guide you to the true fount of love and light, shall be my daily prayer. Good-by, Bayard!"

But the discomfited and suffering man, comprehending not, in the whirl of his own selfish passions, the stronger bonds that held her from his arms as his wife, haughtily refused the white hand she held appealingly towards him, turned upon his heel, and then, overcome by anger, paused a moment on the threshold to utter a few keen invectives; reproaches that paled her cheek, and brought a quiver to her lips.

"It is well! You talk of duty, Miss Haven. Duty and conscience, forsooth! I hope the latter will never bring you any stings, if, in the future you hear of me as an aimless, reckless man; a waif in the most dissolute cities of the Old World, whom you drove thither, an unbeliever not only in God, but in virtue and true womanhood! Ellen Haven, you never loved me! but you have coquetted with me, played with my hopes, feelings, and my love, till you led me on to this rejection. Talk of your duty! 'fore heaven, I would not wonder, if I stayed here five minutes more, to hear you say that your Bible commanded you to wed that young fop, Islington, with more guineas than brains, whom all the world has pronounced a fitting match for the rich heiress, Miss Haven!"

Pale as death Ellen Haven sank down on a couch, when, with imperious, angry step, Bayard Hartley passed out. With hands pressed convulsively over a wrung heart, tears falling rapidly down her cheeks, and his taunts still sounding loudly in her ears, she lay long, till the white summer moon rode high, and silvered all the landscape without.

It was a hard struggle between wounded love and duty; but a high, moral nature, though it suffer ever so keenly, will not weakly yield, nor did Ellen Haven.

Bayard Hartley stood in his room with preparations complete for his departure. Pictures were removed from the wall; articles of vertu, with his costly furniture, had been hustled into an auction-room; the rich Persian carpet was soiled and trampled by tread of porters' feet, and now he stood looking moodily from the window down the crowded city street, awaiting the arrival of the hack which was to take him to the steamer.

A wild, haggard look was about his dark eyes, but a bitter, cynical smile wreathed his lips, a smile that betrayed, more than it concealed, a heart ill at ease within. The door opened, and a handsome, jaunty-looking, fashionably-attired young man sauntered in.

"What the d—ickens means this, Bayard?" was his salutation, starting back and glancing round with an air of surprise. "Rooms torn to pieces, trunks packed—why, my boy, this looks like a start! What does it mean, dear fellow?"

"It means that three hours hence I shall be borne out of Boston Harbor on my way to Europe. The Canada sails to-day, and I go in her," answered Hartley, shortly.

"The deuce you do!" And a low, prolonged whistle betrayed the elegant Fred Pomeroy's astonishment; if anything could be said to astonish that calm, self-complacent, aristocratic, and immaculately-gloved young gentleman, who especially prided himself upon never being betrayed either into vulgar haste or surprise, "why, my dear boy, when did this plan get into your head? Thought you'd sown your wild oats—eh? and intended to settle down, become 'a respectable citizen,' 'useful member of society,' in this dem'd old Puritan city, paint pictures, and all that sort of thing. And now you're off to Europe! Besides, what will the fair Haven do for an escort, when her most devoted and most favored is upon the other side of the big mill-pond? for, you know, rumor voted one Bayard Hartley as the prospective lucky fellow who should come in for a share of the heiress's thousands!"

"Unfortunately, Miss Haven's arrangements for the future and mine conflict. At least, I am not supposed to be the participant of those plans, since, for aught I know to the contrary, she may have turned nun and vowed to build a foundling hospital or convent with her surplus funds," replied Hartley, with asperity.

"More likely that she builds a five story stone front in the region of Mount Vernon Street, and sets up that golden calf, Reginald Islington, as the idol of her worship. Ha, ha! that is not bad, is it, Bayard? That isn't bad—capital hit—think I must report it—'Fred Pomero's last joke.' Good-by, my fine fellow—give us your hand—write a fellow once an age when you get over with the old dons there, the other side of the water. O, river! as we say in Paris, I'm off." And the elegant perfumed and becurled Frederick Pomero departed, to retail what his shallow brain conceived to be a capital joke.

"Please, Mr. Bayard, a man left this package at the street door for you!" And a female domestic appeared in the doorway.

Hartley took the small paper package and opened it. A richly gilt and velvet bound volume met his eye. Mechanically he turned to the fly leaf, whereon were delicately pencilled a few words, "Will Bayard Hartley keep, and read this true love's gift?" The chirography was only too familiar—light and graceful—it was Ellen Haven's. The volume was a book of which he had spoken lightly, sneeringly—a Bible!

Now a red flush sprang to his cheek; for a moment he wavered between love and anger; then tossed the volume contemptuously into a partly-filled trunk which stood open.

"Cant, bigotry!" he exclaimed, scornfully. "She thinks to win me back at this late hour. No, Ellen Haven, if you have loved me, you shall suffer! If duty and conscience bade you to reject me, pride and firmness send me to the shores of the Old World. It shall place the ocean between us! 'True love,' indeed, which sent me from you coldly as the veriest ascetic in existence. By heaven! if you knelt to me now for a smile, I would chill you with my scorn!" And the excited Hartley walked the floor madly. "Ho there, waiter, strap up those trunks and take them down to the door. The hackman has come!" And three hours later Bayard Hartley was on his way to Europe.

That night, while the summer moon rose high over the city, and silvered the quiet suburbs, again Ellen Haven received tribute of the "heart, hand and fortune" of the elegant fop, Reginald Islington; the latter item (fortune), classing within its limits the comfortable sum of fifty thousand, inherited from a poor, dead-and-gone, money-making, labor-loving father, a fast nag on the Cambridge race course, a box at "the Boston," gold-bowed eye-glass, primrose kids, and sundry bottles of Macassar, all of which, strange to relate, Ellen Haven very quietly refused; so quietly, indeed, that the young exquisite doubted his rejection until the closing of the parlor-door and the total silence that followed announced the fact of his being left alone, when with extraordinary celerity he retraced his steps to the city, mentally resolving never to venture within range of Miss Haven's quiet words and scornful eyes again.

But to the poor, suffering girl who gained her chamber, and, from her mood of mortification that she should thus have been the recipient of an empty-headed fop's "adoration," fell into a long, painful reverie, what sad thoughts did the silver, early summer moon bring, shining as it did on her beloved hastening over the ocean?

Reader, picture if you can with your mind's eye, a gallant ship tossed on the wide seas in all the fury of a raging tempest. A fearful sight, this noble vessel, that of erst "walked the waters like a thing of life," now rolling hither and thither, an inert, heavy mass, whose next plunge might be into deepest whirlpools—abysses whose seething foam should strangle utterly the breath from hundreds of white lips, and send hundreds of souls into the presence of their God!

Reader, to you who are familiar with that late terrible calamity which yet fills our land with sorrow, to you who read how the fated Central America went down in mid ocean, carrying with her a more precious argosy than the golden dust with which she sanded the floors of coral caves—a precious freight of human hearts, loves, hopes and joys—to you the picture will loom up fearfully distinct; a wild, startling reality, and not a phantom picture of the brain; and now, behold on the deck of this fated steamer, amid the thronging mass of human life, pale, trembling and unnerved at the prospect of a terrible death, one whose footsteps four years before had trodden the deck of a foreign-bound steamer, Bayard Hartley.

Far and wide had the wanderer roved; the Old World was familiar to his vision. His footsteps had roved throughout Europe; he had penetrated into the heart of gay, metropolitan Paris, had drunk deeply of the cup of dissipation, had bivouacked with the German students, quaffed their sparkling Moselle and the vintage of the Rhine, had paused to dream months away in classic Italy, where Madonna and child, and the rare creations of a Titian and Corregio, looked down from gallery walls, and then had strayed beyond where the thousand minarets of Turkish mosques pierced the blue, southern sky, gathered the roses of Cashmere, and, treading the sacred turf of Palestine, looked upon the altar-stone where the chivalrous crusader knight had knelt to breathe forth his pious vows.

He had witnessed the performance of the rites attendant upon the different religions of the earth. The Hindoos had worshipped Brahma, Boodh and Vishnu, and performed their senseless rituals before him; he had noted the Mahomedan worship, and heard at twilight on Byzantine walls from Byzantine towers the muezzin's cry, "Allah ilallah!" "There is but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet!" he had stood in the Vatican and Saint Peter's, heard the pomp and ceremonial of high mass, the curling incense-wreaths, heard the "Grand Te Deum" and wondrous legend of virgin and martyr-red saint; and been an observer of the forms and ritual of the established Church of England; and in humbler houses, heard the man of God discourse of the Christian's faith; and yet Bayard Hartley was still an unbeliever! When the Old World paled on his vitiated taste, then this man of cosmopolitan life sought a new excitement in the new state that sits enthroned on her golden hills of our far western shores. To the El-Dorado of the nineteenth century he bent his way; and California never held, amid all her heart-sick, unnerved, gold-wearied sons, one who carried a heavier heart or dragged away a more aimless life, than Bayard Hartley. At length, more from love of change, than any other motive, he turned his thoughts to the Puritan city of his birth in distant New-England; and, gathering up the golden ounces which a few rapidly-executed but splendid pictures had gained him, he enrolled his name among the passengers shipping on board the Central America, and again turned homeward.

"Ellen, child, you surely are not going on to New York by the night boat, and alone, too! I cannot consent to it! What sudden whim is this? If you insist upon this visit, your cousin Ralph shall bear you company next Wednesday. Surely a week cannot make much difference; besides you will then have time to write to your aunt Lester announcing your visit. Come, Ellen, put away this sudden whim!" and Mrs. Haven paused from the pleading speech she had addressed to her niece.

"No, Aunt Emeline, please don't oppose it!

I must go to New York this very night! It is but a short journey, and Captain West is the most gentlemanly of captains. Uncle James has secured me a state-room; and as for travelling alone, you need have no alarm on that account. Please don't say any more, aunt! It is no idle whim that prompts this visit." And thus decided, Ellen Haven set about hasty preparations for her departure.

"Dear me, James, you can't think how I hate to have Ellen go on the Sound to-night! I am afraid of the steamboats. O, that dreadful Central America calamity! Wasn't it dreadful?" And Mrs. Haven looked sad and sighed heavily, as she left her husband at the dinner-table preparatory to offers of assistance to her niece.

"La, wife, you're nervous, that's all! The visit'll do Ellen good; now I think of it, she looked pale as a ghost this morning when she came into the store for me to go down to the office and speak for her state-room. I think the change will benefit her—am glad she thinks of it—always did wonder that a handsome, wealthy girl like her should be content to live a quiet, hum-drum life with us old folks. She'll see gayety enough at her aunt Lester's. Don't you think that our Ralph is getting to like Ellen wonderfully, wife? She'd make him a good little helpmeet, if she could learn to like him well enough; but, by the way, I wonder where that painter, Hartley, vanished four years ago? I thought Ellen and he were going to make a match of it. Never did like him any too well. Ah yes, wife," the merchant added, with a sigh. "Sad affair about the Central America! Terrible, terrible! Gloomy faces on State Street to-day. In fact, it cast a gloom over the whole city. Dreadful, wife, dreadful! Haven't had time to read the list of the saved, yet, but will bring home the evening papers."

"Wife, wife!" and James Haven looked up from his paper that evening, as he sat in his cheery parlor, "hear! 'Bayard Hartley,' among the saved from the foundered steamer. 'Bayard Hartley;' why, we were talking of him this very noon! And he was coming home from California with a fortune! Wife, do you suppose that Ellen saw his name in the list and hurried on to New York to meet him? I always thought the girl liked him. Poor thing, I pity her."

"Perhaps they were engaged, James. You know he came out here often before he left," suggested Mrs. Haven. "And yet I think she would have told me."

"Maybe not; Ellen's a quiet girl, but deep. Maybe not, wife. But Nelly's a hundred times too good for him, to my mind! But, poor fellow, he had a narrow escape of it!" And the old merchant removed his glasses, and sat for a long time in a deep reverie.

"And so my gift was not slighted; but, in that terrible hour of darkness and doom, revealed to you the one source of light and life? O, Bayard, what an escape, not only from the fearful waters, but from the death of a shipwrecked soul!" and the speaker shuddered.

It was a dimly-lighted apartment where, tenderly bathing the temples of a pale, emaciated man, sat Ellen Haven. In that moment when she had read his name among the "saved" from a dreadful ocean grave, all the conventional forms of society were set at naught; she but obeyed the promptings of her noble womanly heart and hastened to his side. All of the past was forgotten; she but saw the man she loved lying exhausted, faint and ill, and hastened to his side, where she heard a revelation it thrilled her heart with deepest gratitude to learn.

Now let us hear it repeated by Bayard Hartley's own lips, as, transferring the hand that lingered caressingly on his forehead to his own clasp, he told briefly the story of that terrible night.

"Ah, my best-beloved Ellen, when we parted—I in pride and anger—how little I foresaw this meeting! I went forth, a haughty man, arraigned against my Maker; I return a humble and abashed penitent. And, Ellen, you through Him have been the instrument of this! You, whom I vowed to forget, and blot out from my heart in a wild career of dissipation, but whose pale, sweet face came before me day and night, turning me aside from maddest revels and saving me from my worst enemy—myself! Ellen, you have been my guardian angel; and this," laying his hand upon a Bible, "this has proved to me the day-star of life. In the darkness of that terrible night on the waters, while men, women and children were scattering their golden treasures about the cabin, wildly calling for the aid no human arm might bring; in that hour, alone in my cabin, and prostrate before the sense of a mighty power I knew not how to name, like a lightning-flash came the memory of this book. Drawing it eagerly from the trunk where I had idly thrown it, and where it had lain untouched during my four years' wanderings, I opened it to read these words, 'The voice of the Lord is upon the waters: the God of glory thundereth: the Lord is upon many waters!' Ellen, that saved me! not only, as you have said, from the engulfing waves, but from that more terrible death of the soul. It saved me; it upbore me in the desperate battle with the chill waters that terrible night and that gray, drear day; it was with me when the rescue came. Ellen, the faith born there, midst the darkness and the waves, can never dim till merged in the stronger, clearer revelations of eternity. That Bible was indeed 'true love's gift.' And now, Ellen, dear Ellen, what wonder that I ask the heart that prompted it, and the hand that sent it? My only beloved, will you stay with me to be henceforth the angel of my life?"

There is small need to recall Ellen Haven's answer. It may be inferred from an exclamation her aunt made that day week, when she read a letter handed to her as she sat at work in her parlor:

"There! it is just as James thought; Ellen went to New York purposely to meet this Bayard Hartley! Poor child, how she must have suffered! and not to tell me she was engaged to him. And I suppose she was expecting him home in the steamer! What if he'd been lost? Poor Ellen!" And certainly, to have caught a glimpse of good Mrs. Haven's sad countenance at that moment, one would have been inclined to pity, rather than rejoice at the happiness of Ellen Hartley. But, reader, you and I know better.

DESTITUTION IN NEW YORK.

The Christian Intelligencer gives the following instance of the distress that prevailed in that city during hard times:—"We heard of an instance where a clerk, who had lost his situation by the failure of his employers, and who could get nothing to do, having been reduced to great want, went to the market-place and watching an opportunity, as he thought unobserved, put a piece of meat under his cloak. He was seen, and an officer was directed to follow him to his home, and be cautious and make inquiry and report before he took any steps. Waiting a few moments after the man had entered his house, he knocked. The clerk opened the door, and, on seeing the officer's dress, he said:

"So I am found out, am I? Before you take me away come inside a minute."

The officer went into the room, and found the wife and four children each with a piece of the meat in their hands, eating ravenously. He burst into tears, and the clerk said:

"My wife and children have had nothing to eat for four days. Everything is pawned or sold, except what you see; I will go with you, if you say so." The officer went back to the market and reported what he had seen, when the butchers filled up a basket with provisions, sent it to his house, and supplied him until he found work.

Wisdom and virtue are by no means sufficient, without the supplement laws of good breeding, to secure freedom from degenerating into rudeness, or self-esteem from swelling into insolence. A thousand incivilities may be committed, and a thousand offices neglected, without any remorse of conscience, or reproach from reason.

NONE OF YOUR BUSINESS.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

I was a little girl of ten summers, when I heard the following story. It struck me then as something quite out of the usual routine of things, and I have treasured it in my memory for many years.

I was my brother's pet, and one evening, after his return from Europe, when he was about to welcome to his own home a number of friends whom he had not met for years, I begged him to let me remain in the parlor, close beside him. He did not refuse me, and so I listened to, and enjoyed the conversation with him, with real childish gusto.

"How was it, Charlie?" asked my brother, turning to a fine-looking gentleman, with large blue eyes, and a pleasing face, who sat at his right, stroking his beard leisurely with his fingers. "How did you win that most inexorable of all ladies, your guardian's daughter?"

The gentleman smiled one of the most bewitching smiles I ever beheld, and said, with some little hesitancy in his voice and manner:

"O, that was a singular affair, which, though it may be very amusing to listen to, was, nevertheless, hard to endure. I am not sure that it will benefit you to hear it."

"How was it?" asked my brother, and "How was it, Mr. Davies?" chorussed in some half-dozen voices.

"Since you are all my friends, and having seen my Mabel, cannot blame me that my love for her bordered on frenzy, I will tell you, how at last, everything was brought about to my mind. Well, as stories have it, I was poor, and Mabel was an heiress. I was in love with her; but if she was with me, she kept that love secret. She never told me so. Consequently, my life grew to be one prolonged misery, though, all the while, I hoped against hope.

"Ah, but the day of all days, when affairs came to a crisis; when the darkest hour of night gave way, making room for the bright morning of my love. Telling Mabel that I loved her had grown to be one of my daily customs, as much as that of attending, regularly, family prayers, every morning, and, if I remember rightly, usually followed the morning's worship, while we were left alone together in the sitting-room. So, upon that memorable day of which I speak, I said, 'Mabel, if you will only love me I will do anything in the world for you; make any sacrifice that you may name; endanger my life; jeopardize my health and strength; anything.'

"Mabel looked seriously at me for a moment, and then added:

"Charles, do you realize what you have been saying?"

"O, yes! most certainly I do. Name the way in which you wish to test my love, and you shall find that I am true—as—as—the eternal heavens!"

"Well, well, that will do. We are to have a party to-morrow night," she commenced, seriously, "will you promise me to attend it?"

"I bowed an assent.

"To-morrow forenoon," she continued, resting her white hand upon my arm, and coming up closely to my side, "I want you to make several calls for me. One at the R. House, one at N. Hotel, and one upon Miss Reeves at her father's house on B. Street; and more, I wish you to promenade for a considerable length of time up and down Broadway."

"With all my heart, dear Mabel," I responded, "I see nothing disagreeable in that."

"But you have not heard me through yet; when you have, you may protest at once against my test as you are pleased to term it."

"Never, never, Mabel!"

"Well, I wish you to make this answer to every person who addresses you upon the street, at the hotel, or in any place you chance to be."

"What," I asked, breathlessly.

"These words—None of your business!"

"I could not speak for several moments, I was so astounded.

"Will you do it?" asked Mabel.

"Y-e-s, y-e-s," I stammered, my face flushing crimson.

"Very well. And now, but one thing more; you must report upon your word and honor to me the whole of your adventures. Will you?"

"Yes, Mabel," I answered, feebly.

"Well, then, here is my hand on the bargain. After you have performed faithfully your mission, perhaps—" she blushed, held down her head, and didn't finish the sentence. I bent my lips down to hers, kissed her passionately, and left her to ponder alone upon her strange request.

"I must say, 'None of your business,' to every person that speaks to me, I mused aloud when in my chamber. 'Why, people will think me insane! Miss Reeves, delightful Miss Reeves, beautiful Miss Reeves, will order her father's servants to turn me out of doors. She'll think I go there on purpose to insult her. By Jove, it is too bad! If any woman but Mabel had proposed such a method of procedure to me, I would have annihilated her by a single look. But Mabel, dear Mabel—I'll do it!'

"The following morning at ten o'clock, I started for N. Hotel. My guardian's house was a long distance from it, and during my walk I met many of my acquaintances. As good luck would have it they were all too hurried to greet me with anything beyond a bow and a good morning, until I met good parson W—. In vain I tried to dodge him; looked in every direction but the one from which he was coming, but to no account. He put his hand on my arm and sounded a round good morning in my ears.

"I bowed and moved a step forward, but he held me fast.

"Do not hurry, young man. I wish to speak with you upon a subject which should put every other out of sight—of your immortal soul!"

"I bowed again.

"How have you felt in your mind since I last conversed with you?"

"O, that odious sentence with which I had vowed to answer every one who spoke to me, how could I utter it!"

"How have you felt?" he repeated, looking anxiously in my face.

"None of your business!" I answered, plump and fair.

"The gentleman looked as though he expected the earth to open under my feet, so he stepped back from me. 'Young man,' he said, solemnly, 'beware how you treat lightly affairs pertaining to your immortal interests. I forgive your insult to me—'

"I broke away from him before he had completed the sentence. I was half crazed.

"A few moments' brisk walk brought me to N. Hotel, which I entered with the air of a martyr. I had but just stepped inside the hall, when a loud, brisk voice began:

"Good morning, Mr. Davies; you are just the person I have been wishing to see. Step into the parlor, if you please, while I whisper in your ear a bit of good news."

"I thought for a certainty, that I should sink through the floor as I reluctantly followed my worthy friend, Mr. Allen, through the hall. For many months he had been striving to make room for me in his extensive wholesale warehouse; because he had taken an interest in me, and knew that my yearly allowances ceased when my education was finished.

"Davies, I have it all arranged now as I have so long wished. You can have the head clerkship in our establishment, and receive a good round substantial salary. If you are faithful, in a few years you shall come in with us as a partner. We old men need a capable young man like you, to look after us. What do you say?"

"My tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. I thought I should fall from the chair in which I was sitting.

"Say, Davies, my good fellow, what do you think of it?"

"None—none of your business!" I gasped.

"Mr. Allen looked me in the face a moment, and then arose, proudly with a 'Very well, sir!'

"I buried my face in my hands, I had insulted the warmest friend I had in the whole city.

"Nothing can be worse than this, I thought. I will walk through the remaining scenes of this farce, like an undaunted actor.

"Hullo, Charlie," was the next exclamation that startled me, as I was walking up the steps of the R— House, and at the same moment a hand was laid familiarly on my shoulder. 'I haven't seen you for a number of weeks—not since I was married. By the way, you haven't seen my little wife yet; come up now and be introduced,' continued my friend, too busy with his own thoughts to notice that I did not reply to him. "I believe truly, Davies, that I am the happiest man in existence. I wish you were half as happy. This way," and he led me up a broad flight of stairs and paused before a door upon the first landing.

"We have a suite of room, here."

"A moment more and I was in the presence of Mrs. Thomas Langley—a pretty, sweet-looking little brunette.

"My friend, Mr. Davies, Mrs. Langley" commenced Tom, with a sort of pride visible in her tone. "One of my boon companions," he continued, as I bent low over the white hand of the lady.

"What would I have given to have been myself for the next half hour. I cursed myself for the foolish promise I had made; in my heart I called Mabel everything but a true woman. Why shouldn't I? I was making a fool of myself a laughing-stock among my friends. At last a bright thought struck me. Mabel had said that every reply of mine must be—'None of your business!' Surely I was not precluded from asking questions myself. So I commenced a lively conversation with the lady, which I should have enjoyed heartily, had I not been trembling all the while with fear lest she should ask me a question. One came at last, which I answered in French. I saw at once that she did not understand the language, but was too proud to admit the fact. I looked at Tom. His eyes blazed like fire. He was as familiar with the language as his own mother tongue. A moment more and I bowed myself out of the room. Tom's fiery glance followed me. He was possessed of a high temper, and I felt anything but sure as to the way the affair would terminate.

"Decidedly uncomfortable in my feelings, I made my way towards the home of Miss Reeves. You may judge of my joy, my happiness, on being told that the lady was away! With one bound I cleared the steps and landed on the sidewalk. I have always felt thankful to her for her timely absence.

"I walked briskly up Broadway congratulating myself that my trials were nearly ended, but vowing in my inmost heart that I would never bestow another tender thought upon Mabel Annis.

"A little beggar-girl crossed my way and asked me if I would give her a penny, and I thundered out my answer to her, at the same moment I dropped a silver coin in her thin hand. I could say 'None of your business,' to the king! I exclaimed, looking resolutely about me.

"How are you getting along?" sounded a pleasant voice at my elbow. I looked around to see the roguish, laughing face of Mabel Annis.

"None of your business!" I answered with marked emphasis.

"At two o'clock, P. M., I reached home sick and disheartened. I had lost a lucrative situation, as well as the confidence of a tried and esteemed friend. I had insulted a woman; and treated with levity and disrespect the teachings of a minister of the gospel, beside making myself ridiculous in numerous other instances. There was nothing left for me to do now, but leave the city. If I remained in it, I should always be notorious.

"With an air of sullenness and pride, I sought Mabel in the parlor, and told her of my exploits as well as I could, amid peals of ringing, musical laughter.

"After you have called upon Miss Reeves, we'll talk about—" commenced Mabel.

"Then you will never have that privilege!" I said, sternly, interrupting her.

"Just as you please," returned Mabel, with a pretty toss of her head.

"That I have acted the part of a foolish, inexperienced boy, I'll admit, Mabel," I said. "That you have made my love for you a weapon against myself, you are well aware. But I am stronger now, than I was this morning. I do not think if you had cared for me, even as a brother, you would have aided in making me appear ridiculous."

"But indeed, Charlie! I didn't mean any harm; it was so funny that I couldn't help telling you to do it. You were always begging me to test your love, you know?"

"Test my love, Mabel! Why did you not tell me something to do that would have been an honor to you in the suggestion, and to me, in the performance of it? Why didn't you tell me to be a brave, true man, true to myself and true to you, instead of sending me out on a mean mission to disgrace myself, and make my best friends my enemies."

"Is it too late for you to be a true man now, Charlie? Wont you try to be one if I ask you?"

"I looked into Mabel's face. Great tears were running down her cheeks, and her red lips were quivering with emotion. My heart smote me for what I had been saying. After all, I loved Mabel better than any one in the world. I began to feel a strange, choking sensation in my throat, and a rising of tears in my eyes, which in my new strength of manhood I would not have had Mabel seen for the world, so I turned slowly away from her and left the room. I thought it was unmanly to weep.

"Until six o'clock in the evening I busied myself in my room packing my trunk. When my task was nearly completed, I was interrupted by a low rap at the door, and on opening it Mabel stood before me her eyes red and swollen with weeping.

"I am going away," I said, as she glanced inquiringly about the room.

"I have done all that I can, to repair the wrong I did you," she said; "I have called on Mr. Allen, and he said that the situation was still yours, and that you were perfectly excusable. Mr. Langley laughed uproariously, at my explanation, and said that he did not blame you. And parson W—, though harder to convince than the other gentlemen, said that when he had an opportunity of conversing with you, he didn't doubt he should fully exculpate you from all blame. That is all," and she turned to go.

"No, no, Mabel, you shall not go from me in this way, after you have proved yourself so noble a woman. Only consent to be my wife, and I will be everything you wish me to be," I said, passionately, drawing her to my side.

"Will you be my wife?"

"Again Mabel's rosy lips quivered, and her delicate eyelids drooped over her eyes, as she placed both her hand in mine. And I don't believe there was ever a happier person in existence than I, when I pressed a betrothal kiss upon her lips.

"It is needless to say that parson W— was wholly reconciled, when three weeks after, he was the recipient of a round, handsome bridal fee at Mabel's and my wedding."

Curious Matters.

An Execution two Centuries ago.

From the Diary of John Hull, Treasurer and Mint-Master of Massachusetts, recently published by the American Antiquarian Society, we take the following item:—"1657, 23d of 2d (i. e. April 23d). We received letters from Hartford, and understand that the work of reconciliation (in the Church) went very slowly forward. We also heard that at a town called Farmington, near Hartford, an Indian was so bold as to kill an English-woman and likewise her maid, and also sorely wounded a little child—all within their house—and then fired the house, which also fired some other houses or barns. The Indians being apprehended, delivered up the murderer, who was brought to Hartford, and (after he had his right hand cut off) was, with an axe, knocked on the head by the executioner."

Patchouli.

Of all the Eastern odors, patchouli is that most employed in Europe, not as a scent for the handkerchief, but as a preservative for it against the destruction of insects. It is said to have been introduced into Europe in the following manner: It was observed by the purchasers and sellers in Paris of Indian shawls, that they possessed a peculiar fragrance. It was useless to attempt to pass off homespun goods for the genuine article; however admirable was the imitation, the fraud was immediately detected by the absence of the true scent. At last the haberdashers discovered the secret; the scent was owing to patchouli, and the plant, which was then first imported to aid the deceptions of trade, soon became a fashionable perfume.

Physiological Fact.

Little or no water is found in the stomach of a drowned person; and when it is present, it can in no way have contributed to death. The experiments of Oriffa and Marc have proved that water is never found in bodies submerged after death; and that it cannot be made to enter the stomach without the assistance of a tube passed into the gullet. This fact, and that of little or no water entering the lungs, cannot be too widely propagated, as the popular prejudice is in favor of the opposite opinion; and bodies taken out of the water are still rolled on barrels, and held up by the heels, in order to dislodge it—a practice fraught with the greatest danger, if the smallest chance of resuscitation exists.

Singular Death from Hydrophobia.

Mrs. Ann Randall, of Norwich, Conn., was induced by curiosity to offer water to a cow that a few days previously had been bitten by a mad dog, and exhibited all the symptoms of hydrophobia. The froth and saliva from the cow's mouth got into the water, and afterwards Mrs. Randall thoughtlessly put her hand into the water to rinse out the pail. On one of the fingers of the hand, thus introduced into the water, was a slight abrasion of the skin. In a few days after this, Mrs. Randall was attacked with hydrophobia, and after three days of horrible agony, died.

Extraordinary Longevity.

An aged couple, Charles and Betty Morris, are now living at Howell Croft, Belton, England, and it is a curious coincidence that each has just seen 102 summers. The old man is a handloom weaver, and was following his occupation last December. His son, who lives with him, is 54 years of age.

A skilful piece of Ingenuity.

An ingenious design, the result of much patience and perseverance, was recently shown a contemporary, who thus describes it: It consisted of a glass bottle, the height of which was only one foot, and in which were constructed several reels of wood, having on them 3487 heads, 120 yards of silk, and eight china images; altogether, this curious bottle contained 8038 pieces, so jointed and framed that they filled the bottle, and had all been put together through the neck. But the crowning work was the stopper, from which four pieces projected in the form of a cross, so that it could not be withdrawn, and the question with us was, how was it got in? This ingenious piece of work is a singular curiosity in art.

A French Foundling Hospital.

A touching custom has prevailed at Lyons for many years. The first child that is abandoned to the care of the foundling hospital on the eve of Christmas day, is received with peculiar honor and attended to with every care. A very handsome cradle, prepared beforehand, receives its little body, the softest coverings give it warmth, the kindest solicitude watches over its slumbers. The whole is designed to present the strongest contrast to the scene in the stable in which the Saviour was received, on entering on his earthly existence, and that the being seemingly condemned to perish, the victim of vice or misery, is saved by the birth of Him who was sent on earth to inculcate charity and good will.

Curious Mode of Capturing Whales.

At Quailboe, one of the Faro Islands, a peculiar species of whale, called the beaked or long-nosed variety, is caught by very singular means. When a stray fish of this tribe, individuals of which frequently measure about thirty feet long, is seen on the surface of the water, some boatmen gently approaches it, tickles the huge creatures back with one of his oars, and so pleases the unconscious prey, that it suffers another to stop up its blowing-holes with woollen gloves or stockings, a process which prevents it from sinking. The blubber being then perforated, and fishing-lines fastened through it, the prize is pulled softly on shore and despatched with spears that are usually kept at hand for the occasion.

An Australian Marvel.

The Melbourne Argus gives a summary of the discoveries in natural history by Mr. Blandowski, during his recent expedition on the Lower Murray, in the waters of which he found fifteen varieties of fish, in addition to the five already known, and amongst them three species of viviparous shell fish, and also some fresh-water sponges. But the greatest curiosity in his collection, was a variety of the boa constrictor with two small legs, slightly developed indeed, but sufficiently so as to enable the reptile to ascend the smoothest tree by inserting them in the crevices and excrescences of the bark.

Natural Compass.

It is a well-known fact that, in the vast prairies of Texas, a little plant is always to be found, which, under all circumstances of climate, change of weather, rain, frost or sunshine, invariably turns its leaves and flowers to the north. If a solitary traveller were making his way across these trackless wilds without a star to guide, or compass to direct him, he finds an unerring monitor in a humble plant, and he follows its guidance, certain that it will not mislead him.

A New and Amusing Cure for Love.

The son of a wealthy nobleman in a fashionable Parisian faubourg, became enamored of the pretty daughter of his father's concierge (door-porter), and determined to marry her. The aristocratic papa, of course, opposed; but moved at last by the despair of his son, gave his consent, with the proviso that the smitten youth should go to sea for twelve months before his marriage. Shortly after his departure, the father, who had previously observed a tendency to embonpoint in the young intended, took her under his special charge, gave her every kind of the most nourishing and succulent food and good wines, forbade her to take exercise, as unbecoming in his future daughter; and, in fact, staid-fed her to such an extent that when the enamored swain returned from his year's voyage he was horrified to find, instead of the slender, elegant girl he had left, an immense fat woman, as big as two Alibonis rolled into one! Of course the ruse was successful, and the unfortunate victim of good cheer has been pensioned off.

Curious Bank Transaction.

The editor of the Belfast (Ireland) Journal has availed himself of the columns of the London Times to expose an extraordinary transaction in which one of the Glasgow banks was concerned. "Not many years ago," says the writer, "a certain gentleman became indebted to one of these banks to the extent of several thousand pounds; when he was hauled up, it was found that he had no assets, and the bank, therefore, insured his life to the extent of their debt, upon which they of course pay a heavy annual tax. This gentleman called on the bank some time after, and told one of the managers, 'I am offered a lucrative situation in Sierra Leone, but you know if I go out there the policy will be vitiated; however, I must go, as I cannot starve.' What, then, was to be done? The same man is now comfortably living on the continent, on an annuity granted by this bank, which annuity, added to the premium of insurance, forms a nice little item in the expenses of the establishment."

The Effects of Moonlight.

Professor Plaza Smyth, the Astronomer Royal for Scotland, in his interesting account of a recent scientific expedition made by him to the Peak of Teneriffe, has set at rest the quæstio vexata of the heat of the moonlight. He says that his thermometrical instruments were sensibly affected by the moon's rays, even at the lowest of two stations occupied by him at different elevations. In tropical climates, meat which is exposed to the moonlight rapidly becomes putrid; and in the West Indies, the negroes, who will lie sweltering and uncovered beneath the full glare of a tropical sun, carefully muffle their heads and faces when exposed to the moonbeams, which they believe will cause swelling and distortion of the features, and sometimes even blindness.

Electrotype Pearls.

The Japanese are famous for their electrotype pearls, which are made in the following way: A quantity of oysters and muscles are collected, when their mouths are forced open, and a copper plate, from one-fourth to three-fourths of an inch in diameter, bearing a stamped impression of the image desired, is placed within. The oysters are then replaced in the water, where they are allowed to remain from twelve to fifteen months, during which time the oyster, irritated by the copper plate, forms a coating of pearl over the surface of it.

The Paper Plant.

The Mineral Point Tribune has a description of a plant with the above name, discovered in Wisconsin by Miss A. L. Beaumont. The lady describes it as follows: "I discovered, two years ago, a plant which yields both cotton and flax from the same root, and I believe I am the first person who ever cultivated, spun and knit from it. I am persuaded that any article that will make as good cloth as can be made from this plant, will make good paper; hence I call it the paper plant. It can be planted in the spring, and cut in the fall or winter. It bleaches itself white as it stands, and will yield at least three or four tons to the acre. From a single root that I transplanted last spring, there grew twenty large stocks, with three hundred and five pods containing the cotton, with at least sixty seeds in each. From this root I obtained seven ounces of pure cotton, and over half a pound of flax. It is a very heavy plant, and grows from six to seven feet high."

Weathercocks.

The vane, or weathercock, must have been of very early origin. Vitruvius calls it triton, probably from its having the form of a triton. The usual form on towers, castles and secular buildings was that of a banner; but on ecclesiastical edifices, it generally was a weathercock. There was a symbolical reason for the adoption of a figure of a cock. The cross surmounted a ball, to symbolize the redemption of the world by the cross of Christ; and the cock was placed upon the cross in allusion to the repentance of St. Peter, and to remind us of the important duties of repentance and Christian vigilance. Apart from symbolism, the large tail of the cock was well adapted to turn with the wind, and for a similar reason the arrow and the fox might be chosen; though the hare and grayhound are less favorable. On the church of St. Laurence, in Norwich, the vane is formed like a gridiron, with the holy martyr extended upon the bars.

Curious Fact.

It is generally thought that when a vessel is full of water any solid substance immersed in it will cause it to overflow, and such will be the case if the substance is not soluble in the water; but the philosophic truth, that in dissolving a body, you do not increase the volume of the solvent, may be proved by a simple and interesting experiment. Saturate a certain quantity of water, at a moderate heat with three ounces of sugar; and when it will no longer receive that, there is room in it for two ounces of salt of tartar, and after that for an ounce and a dram of green vitriol, nearly six drams of nitre, the same quantity of sal ammoniac or smelling salts, two drams and a scruple of alum and a dram and a half of borax—when all these are dissolved in it, it will not have increased in volume.

Reason for Italic Words in the Bible.

These words generally consist of auxiliaries, as on, are, was, etc., which in the original are not written, but understood. It is the genius of the ancient Hebrew, Greek and Latin languages to omit the minor words of a sentence; but as the omission sometimes gave rise to obscurity, the translators supplied them, and for distinction, printed them in italics. Thus in the Gospel of St. John, "There was a man sent from God, whose name was John." In the original Greek the italicised word is omitted.

The Florist.

Flowers, that bloom to wither fast;
Light, whose beams, are soon o'ercast;
Friendship warm, but not to last;
Such by earth are given.—H. F. GOULD.

Wasturidium and Mignonette.

Both these plants, generally regarded as rather tender annuals, may become, by attention and care, hardy, woody shrubs. The first winter of their growth, pot them and keep in the house; in the spring transplant them to the borders, where the growth of another summer will by fall render them hardy enough to be left in the ground in future, requiring only a little protection. Thus the care during one winter changes these pretty annuals into hardy shrubs.

Hibiscus.

The rose-colored, pale rose, and white with crimson centre, are beautiful flowers. The Hibiscus Grandiflorus is very large flowered. They are tall and robust plants, worthy of a place among the shrubs, and their blossoms, which strikingly resemble those of the hollyhock, make a fine display in August and September. Do not neglect to make an early provision of them.

Fertilizers for Flower Plants.

It has been proved that, for the generality of flowers, and more especially geraniums and the more delicate lilies, common glue, diluted with a sufficient portion of water, forms a richer manure than any other yet discovered. Plants placed in sand on the worst soils, display beauty and vigor when watered with this composition.

Meadow Sweet—Spiraea.

The Spiraea are very desirable border plants. There are the white and the double. The Spiraea Japonica is a distinct and beautiful species, a foot high, with spikes of white flowers. The Spiraea Cobata is a robust species with long spikes of red flowers. They bloom in June and July.

Stocks and Asters.

A shallow box, four or six inches deep, the size of a kitchen window, may be made to produce quite a quantity of choice asters and stocks with very little attention. As the days become warm, the box should be placed in the open air to harden off the young plants, or else the window opened quite wide.

Nipheas.

A very beautiful little plant, a native of Guatemala, and has a dwarf stem, with hairy, fleshy leaves, something like a Gloxinia; the flowers are of a snowy whiteness. The plants look best planted in clusters, and only require green-house heat.

Monks-hood—Aconitum.

The aconitums or monks-hoods are low plants with finely cut leaves, and flower-stalks from two to three feet in height, bearing clusters of blue, white, yellow or variegated flowers, and blooming from July to October.

Heaths.

A mixture of charcoal and sandy peat, and a great number of pebbles, mixed with the soil in each pot, is very beneficial to almost all species of heaths.

A splendid Greenhouse.

In the royal botanical gardens at Kew, England, there is one green-house, 382 feet long, the centre 100 feet wide, and 68 feet high, and the wings 50 feet wide and 30 feet high. It is built entirely of iron, stone, brick and sheet glass. It is heated by twelve furnaces, and by hot water pipes and tanks, carried beneath the floor. The aggregate length of these pipes is about five miles. From the lofty gallery in the interior you look down on magnificent palms, sugar canes, cocoa-nut trees, the great Strelitzia Augusta, and many rare and beautiful tropical trees, in the most healthy and luxuriant condition. The building containing the palm trees cost $200,000.

Phloxes.

The phloxes stand at the head of all hardy herbaceous perennials. The increase of new varieties has added largely to their value by great improvements in habits of growth, size and form of flowers and brilliancy and variety of colors. They fill up a great blank during the latter part of July, August and September. They are perfectly hardy, and flourish in any soil.

Milliflower—Achillea.

The Achilleas are handsome plants, from one to two feet in height, with large heads of flowers, blooming from July to October. The Parmica Plena (sneezewort) is a spreading plant, with a profusion of small double daisy-like flowers.

Bellflower—Campanula.

The bell-flowers are pretty, and varying in color from white through various shades of lilac and tender purple to deep blue; some are dwarf in habit, and others tall, covered, during a great portion of the summer, from July to October, with handsome bell-shaped flowers.

Tea Roses.

The perfume of these roses is most delicate and agreeable; indeed they may be called the sweetest of all roses. The flowers are also large and very delicate in their colors, such as white, straw and flesh color, and various tints of rose combined with them.

Carnation and Picotees.

The Carnation is universally admired for its brilliancy and beauty of color and delicate fragrance. It stands deservedly next in popularity to the rose. It flourishes in good garden soil. The Picotees are usually hardiest.

Snapdragon—Antirrhinum.

There are many beautiful varieties of this flower of all colors, from white to dark crimson, variegated, etc., in bloom nearly all the summer. They are great ornaments for the parterre.

Sphenogyne.

Beautiful annual plants, which only require sowing in April or May in any common garden soil.

Quassia.

This is found to injure tender shoots, if not washed off in the same manner as tobacco water.

Oriental Poppy.

This plant has magnificent flowers, six to eight inches in diameter, and of a bright orange yellow.

The Garden.

A garden creates a taste for simple pleasures. Those flowers and trees that may or may not interest the passing stranger, will always be looked upon with interest and affection by the eye of him who planted them with his own hand. This love of natural beauties is the best antagonist to the love of artificial, stimulating, and expensive excitements. "Consider the lilies how they grow," said the wisest and the holiest, while aiming to produce simplicity of faith and of taste; "they toil not, neither do they spin; yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." One great source of pleasure in a garden is, that it subsidizes the forces of all nature. These work for the man who works for them, and that, too, while he sleeps and eats and is otherwise engaged. All the increase is clear gain to human happiness.

Duvaua.

Chilian shrubs, which prove nearly hardy in this climate. The Duvaua dependens require very little protection during the winter. The leaves of plants of this genus, if thrown into water, will start and jump about in a very extraordinary manner, almost as if possessed of life; and they smell strongly of turpentine. The plants should be grown in a light dry soil, and trained against a south wall, where they can be protected by a thatched coping during the winter. The flowers, which are white, are produced in small spikes, and they are succeeded by dark purple berries.

Planting Fruit Trees.

McIntosh says: "In planting fruit trees where the subsoil is of indifferent quality, it is advisable to place under each a piece of pavement three feet square and about twelve or fifteen inches under the surface, that the roots, when they come in contact with it, may be made to take a horizontal direction. This is one great means of keeping them near the surface, and has been found of much advantage."

Alsine—Caryophyllaceæ.

This genus was founded on the Chickweed, and it contains several, four or five weedy-looking species. There is one variety which is pretty, for it bears a great profusion of tiny white blossoms, slightly fragrant. The species which composed the genus Alsine appear to have been nearly all distributed among other genera, and even Chickweed is now called Stellaria media.

Nitraria.

Low shrubs with white flowers, which are very hardy, and will grow well in situations exposed to the sea. In gardens, the ground in which they grow should be occasionally watered with water in which saltpetre has been dissolved.

Primula Cortusoides.

This is a very ornamental species of Cowslip, and produces its brilliant red flowers from May to July; requires a loamy soil, kept moist, and a shady situation; and therefore cannot be treated like a common border flower.

Torenia.

Australian plants with pretty flowers, which require to be kept in a green-house, and grown in sandy loam. One species is a half-hardy annual, which may be raised on a hot-bed and planted out in May.

Compost for Flower Culture.

The most important requisite for the successful cultivation of plants is to have a stock of suitable compost adapted to the several varieties. A plant in unsuitable mould cannot be healthy. The following materials are necessary: good garden mould, mould from decayed turf from a pasture or field, mould from decayed leaves, decomposed stable or cow-yard manure, sea or river sand, peat from the meadows that have been exposed to frost, coarse sand or gravel, broken flower-pots, charcoal or oyster-shells, and old mortar or plaster. Garden mould will not be needed if there is a supply of fine decayed turf mould, and will be wanted only in case of necessity. Turf mould, for a basis, is probably the best ingredient for a compost for plants. The broken pots, charcoal, etc., are used for drainage, to be placed in the bottom of the pot at the time of potting, about one-fifth of the pot being filled with it when broken up. Leaf mould is not always to be obtained; but it is a precious ingredient in a compost, and many plants thrive much better in it than in anything else. It takes a long time to decompose leaves so as to be suitable for compost. To have compost in perfection, the different ingredients should be mixed in advance of the time wanted.

The Violet.

This sweet little flower is a universal favorite. The odorata and its varieties are most valued, but they cannot be had in perfection unless a good deal of genius is bestowed on them. Slugs are very destructive to the violet, devouring the flower as much before as after they are in bloom. Where the flowers are much in request—when grown near cities—beds are made on purpose for them, composed of a layer of coal-ashes on the bottom, covered with a compost of peat-earth, loam, decayed dressing from the stable, and sand, ten inches thick. On this, young runners are to be planted, six inches apart, and carefully attended to. The sweet-scented violet should not be wanting in any collection of plants, on account of its fragrance and early appearance. A single flower will perfume a large room. The flowers appear in April, and continue for a considerable period of time. There are the single white and single blue, and the double blue and white varieties. The double sorts are the most desirable, and may be rapidly multiplied by divisions of the plants.

Adenophora.

Perennial plants with blue bell-shaped flowers, resembling the Campanulas. They require to be planted in rich but light soil, and are easily killed by much moisture. They are natives of Siberia, and easily propagated by division of the roots, and are quite hardy.

Malachodendron.

A handsome bushy shrub, which may be trained as a low tree, with large white flowers. It should be sown in sandy peat, and it is propagated by layers or cuttings, the latter of which, however, require sand, a bell-glass, and bottle heat, to make them strike out.

Prinos.

Hardy North American shrubs, that will grow in any light soil, though they prefer peat, and in any situation. They are generally propagated by layers.

Tormentilla.

British plants, with yellow flowers, which, though weeds, look very well on rock-work. The double-flowered variety is very ornamental.

The Housewife.

Wine Jelly.

After soaking one ounce and a half of gelatine for ten minutes in a pint of cold water, add a pint of boiling water, and stir until the gelatine is dissolved. Beat well the whites of two eggs, and put them into a mixture composed of one pint of wine, half a pound of sugar, the juice and gratings of one lemon, and a little nutmeg, ground cloves, and cinnamon. Then put the whole into the gelatine water; place it over a slow fire, stir it gently until it boils, take it off, and let it stand a moment, and then strain it until it becomes clear. In warm weather, use a larger quantity of gelatine.

To destroy Cockroaches.

Add about a teaspoonful of powdered arsenic to about a teaspoonful of finely mashed potato, rub and mix them well together, and then crumble about a third of it every night at bed-time about the kitchen hearth. It will be eaten up, or nearly so, by the following morning. The creature is very fond of potatoes, and devouring them greedily, crawls again into his hole and dies. No smell attends their disappearance. In putting this method into practice, care should be taken to sweep up any remaining crumbs next morning.

Soap.

Fourteen pounds of bar soap in half a boiler of hot water; cut up fine; add three pounds of sal-soda made fine, one ounce of pulverized rosin; stir it often till all is dissolved; just as you take it off the fire, put in two table-spoonfuls of spirits of turpentine and one of ammonia; pour it in a barrel, and fill up with cold soft water; let it stand three or four days before using. It is an excellent soap for washing clothes, extracting the dirt readily, and not fading colored articles.

For Chapped Hands.

Take five drachms of camphor gum, three do. white beeswax, two do. spermaceti, two ounces olive oil—put them together in a cup upon the stove where they will melt slowly, and form a white ointment in a few minutes. If the hands be affected, anoint them on going to bed, and put on a pair of gloves. A day or two will suffice to heal them.

Brown Bread.

Take three quarts of corn meal and wet it up with boiling water, letting it stand twenty minutes to swell, then add one quart of rye meal, or if that is not convenient, add one pint of wheat flour, and one teacup of molasses, and wet the whole up with milk or cold water; then bake two hours or until it is done.

Brighton Biscuit.

(Said to keep a year if you wish.) Four pounds of flour, two pounds of white sugar, one pound of butter, ten eggs, the juice and pulp of one orange, half a teaspoonful of soda; roll out quite thin, and cut in rings or any other shape you please.

Keeping Beef fresh.

In preserving beef, the ribs will keep longest, for five or six days in summer; the middle of the loin next; the rump next; the round next; the shortest of all, the brisket, which will not keep longer than three days in hot weather.

Beans.

For laboring men at this season of the year, there is nothing more nutritious and wholesome; besides, there is no other food of which a little will go so far, and do so much good. Boil them three hours in plenty of water, with a piece of pork to flavor them just right. Put in pepper as soon as they come to boil; when cooked, add a lump of butter and some cream or good milk. The meat and butter generally makes them salt enough. If there is plenty of soup about them, take them to the table in a deep dish lined with bread crumbs.

Rancid Butter.

To a pint of water add about thirty drops, that is, about half a teaspoonful of liquor of chloride of lime; wash in this two and a half pounds of insupportably rancid butter; when every particle of the butter has come in contact with the water, let it stand an hour or two, then wash the butter well again in pure water; the butter is then left with the odor, taste, and sweetness of fresh butter.

Sand Tarts.

(An exceedingly delightful German cake.) Rub one and a quarter pounds of butter into two pounds of flour, and then add two pounds of sugar; wet the ingredients with four eggs, leaving out a sufficient quantity of the whites to paint the cakes, with a feather. Roll out and cut the dough into thin squares, strew them over with pounded almonds (previously blanched), and cinnamon, and then bake them.

Remedy for Chilblains.

Boil some turnips, and mash them until reduced to a pulp; put them in a tub or large basin, and put the feet in them, almost as hot as can be borne, for a short time, before going to bed. Persevere in doing this for a few nights, and the itching and irritation of the chilblains will be cured. Of course this must be before the chilblains are broken.

Racco Hoo.

A beverage, to be used in the same way as tea, or coffee. Mix together, one pound of grated chocolate, one pound of pulverized sugar, one pound of rice flour, and four table-spoonfuls of arrowroot. When used, boil one pint of milk, and then add three table-spoonfuls of the above, with a little water.

Dropped Sugar Cakes.

Dissolve two table-spoonfuls of saleratus in a teacupful of sour cream; add it to one teacupful of sugar, five eggs, a quarter of a pound of butter, and enough flour to make a batter thick enough to drop on a buttered tin; flavor to your taste.

Soda Pudding.

Mix together four eggs, four teacupfuls of flour, two of brown sugar, the same quantity of butter, and a table-spoonful of soda. Bake the pudding in a mould, and serve it with wine sauce, which may be made with milk, instead of water.

Cream Doughnuts.

To one quart of cream, sweet or sour, add five eggs, and enough flour to form a soft dough; also put in a little salt. If the cream be sour, mix with it one teaspoonful of soda. Roll the dough thin, and fry the cakes in lard.

Lark Pie.

Cover the bottom of a pie-dish with thin slices of beef and fat bacon, over which lay ten or twelve larks previously rolled in flour, stuffed as above, season with a teaspoonful of salt, a quarter ditto of pepper, one of chopped parsley, and one of chopped eschalots, lay a bay-leaf over, add a gill of broth, and cover with three-quarters of a pound of half puff paste, bake one hour in a moderate oven, shake well to make the gravy in the pie form a kind of sauce, and serve quite hot.

Rice Bread.

Take one pound and a half of rice, and boil it gently over a slow fire in three quarts of water about five hours, stirring it, and afterwards beating it up into a smooth paste. Mix this while warm into two gallons, or four pounds of flour, adding at the same time the usual quantity of yeast. Allow the dough to work a certain time near the fire, after which divide it into loaves, and it will be found, when baked, to produce twenty-eight or thirty pounds of excellent white bread.

To clean Books or Prints.

Ink spots may be removed by oxalic acid dissolved in water, and carefully applied with a hair pencil. To remove oil or grease, warm the spot, lay over it blotting paper, and upon it the heated blade of a knife, when the blotting-paper will absorb the grease; then apply spirits of turpentine, with a hair pencil, and restore the whiteness of the paper with spirits of wine.

To make Ink.

To four ounces of bruised galls, allow two of copperas and two of gum-arabic; put the galls into a large bottle, with three pints of rain water; and, in three or four days, dissolve the gum in hot water, and add it with the copperas. Shake the bottle frequently for some days. A few cloves may be put into the bottle, to prevent the ink from moulding.

For a Sprain.

Mix equal parts of spirit of camphor, distilled vinegar, and turpentine, and rub the part affected.—Cold water applications are excellent for sprains; as, to bathe the part in cold water, to pour cold water upon it, or to put bandages wet in cold water around it.—Extract of arnica, applied to a sprain, will remove the pain in a short time.

To make Apple Molasses.

Take new sweet cider just from the press, made from sweet apples, and boil it down as thick as West India molasses. It should be boiled in brass, and not burned, as that would injure the flavor. It will keep in the cellar, and is said to be as good, and for many purposes better than West India molasses.

For blistered and tender Feet.

Boil any quantity of bran in water for twenty minutes, strain, and add it to the water of the usual foot-bath. To be used tepid or cold.

Potatoes for Breakfast or Tea.

Take mashed potatoes, with milk, salt, butter, and flour till you can roll out; cut in squares, and fry brown on both sides. An egg will be an addition.

Rice.

Boil a pound or more until every grain is soaked through and swelled to its biggest; salt to the taste, and put it away in the coldest corner of the cellar. For supper, I pour cold thin cream, well sweetened, over it, and season with nutmeg or lemon. It is cheap and healthy food, and very good for children.

To cement broken China.

Beat lime into most impalpable powder, sift it through fine muslin; then tie some in a thin muslin: put on the edges of the broken china some white of egg, then dust some lime quickly on the same, and unite them exactly.

Bread Omelet.

Put into a large teacup of bread crumbs a teacup of cream, a spoonful of butter, with salt, pepper and nutmeg: when the bread has absorbed the cream, break in the eggs, beat them a little with the mixture, and fry like omelet.

Fried Parsnips.

Boil them until they are about half done, lift them out, and let them cool; slice them rather thickly, sprinkle them with fine salt and white pepper, and fry them a pale brown in good butter. Serve them with roast meat, or dish them under it.

Wash for the Skin.

Four ounces of potash, four ounces of rose-water, two ounces of pure brandy, and two ounces of lemon-juice; put all these into two quarts of water, and when you wash, put a table-spoonful or two of the mixture into the basin of water you intend washing in.

Water Proof.

To make boots water-proof, melt three ounces each of resin and beeswax, and stir in one pint of boiled oil and heat all well together; when partly cool add three ounces of turpentine. Apply hot with a brush.

Washing Dishes.

Much time is wasted by housekeepers in wiping their dishes. If properly washed and drained in a dry sink, with a cloth spread on the bottom, they look better than when wiped, besides economy in saving time and labor.

Syrup of Tea.

One pint of water, two pounds of sugar, an ounce of black tea; boil together for five minutes, or rather less, and then strain. A wineglassful to half a pint of cold water makes very good cold tea.

Boston Brown Bread.

Mix three parts Indian and two parts rye meal. Sift and wet down with sweetened water, hot, a little saleratus, and yeast, into a stiff pudding. Bake with a steady, strong heat until well done.

To clean Bottles.

Cut some raw potatoes in pieces, put them in a bottle with a little cold water, rinse them, and they will be well cleaned.

To wash Glass.

Glass should be washed in cold water, which gives it a brighter and clearer look, than when washed in warm water.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

THE GREED OF GOLD.

In one of his vigorous essays, Mr. A. B. Meek, one of the most promising of our Southern writers, speaks forcibly of the sacrifice of the higher intellectual powers to the prevalent passion for wealth in this country. "This inordinate passion," says Mr. Meek, "is like the lean kine of the dreaming monarch, swallowing up every better purpose. It gives its hue and impress to every phase and feature of life. The parent, in the education of his child, must have him taught only those things which will be of practical value! Education itself is curbed, and fashioned by their influence. After delving in a miserable way, for a few years, over the primary branches of instruction, the hopeful youth, now that he is bearded and built up like his father, assumes the full stature of an educated man, with just knowledge enough to addle his brain, and engender a spirit of ignorant vanity—self-chuckling and deaf—which besets and debases his whole moral nature." * * * "He at once launches out into all the petty plans and speculations of the 'good old way in which his fathers went.' He loses all remembrance of the Pierian fountain, if ever he had knelt at its moss-covered curb-stone, and remembers the beautiful days of his youth, only as so much time squandered in idle pursuits, and under tyrannical task-masters. This is the character of the greater portion of our youth; and verily it may be said few of them are likely to die of that disease which Festus thought had affected Paul. The nobler race of the olden scholars has never existed in our land. We know nothing of that generous order of intellectual Palestræ, who from youth to manhood, from manhood to age, with an enthusiasm as deep as woman's love, drank of the golden waters of philosophy in the groves of Academe, or, in a later age, bent with a fever at the heart, and a flush upon the pallid cheek over dingy scrolls in the midnight quiet of some German university!"

CEREMONY.—Ceremony was always the companion of weak minds; it is a plant that will never grow in a strong soil.

ARITHMETICAL.—A mathematician has discovered that an infallible method for producing division in families is to multiply jealousies.

INCREDIBLE FEAT ON THE TIGHT ROPE.

On St. Mark's day in Venice, in February, 1680, Malcolm tells us, in his "Manners of Europe," that a person adorned in a tinsel riding-habit, having a gilt helmet upon his head, and holding in his right hand a lance, in his left a helmet made of a thin piece of plate gilded, and sitting upon a white horse, with a swift pace ambled up a rope six hundred feet long, fastened from the quay to the top of St. Mark's tower. When he had arrived half way, his tinsel coat fell off, and he made a stand; and stooping his lance submissively, saluted the doge sitting in the palace, and flourished the banner three times over his head. Then, resuming his former speed, he went on, and, with his horse, entered the tower where the bell hangs; and presently returning on foot, he climbed up to the highest pinnacle of the tower, where, sitting on the golden angel, he flourished his banner again several times. This performed, he descended to the bell-tower, and there, taking horse, rode down again to the bottom in the same manner as he had ascended.

JUVENILE SIMPLICITY.—"There, now!" cried a little girl, while rummaging a drawer in a bureau; "there, now! gran'pa has gone to heaven without his spectacles. What will he do?" And, shortly afterwards, when another aged relative was supposed to be sick unto death, in the house, she came running to his bedside, with the glasses in her hand and an errand on her lips. "You goin' to die?" "They tell me so." "Goin' to heaven?" "I hope so." "Well, here are gran'pa's spectacles; wont you take them to him?"

THE REASON WHY.—"Please, sir, I don't think Mr. Dosim takes his physic reg'lar," said a doctor's boy to his employer. "Why so?" "'Cause vy, he's getting vell so precious fast!"

CHAP.—This word is stated to be derived from the gipsy word chabo or chavo, a boy, or a young lad; the feminine form, chabi, is used for a girl.

ITALIAN PROVERB.—At an open house, or chest, a righteous man may sin; avoid temptation.

BAGGING A RIVAL.

Two gentlemen, one a Spaniard, and the other a German, who were recommended, by their birth and services, to the emperor Maximilian II., both courted his daughter, the fair Helene Scharfequinn, in marriage. 'This prince, after a long delay, one day informed them that, esteeming them equally, and not being able to bestow a preference, he should leave it to the force and address of the claimants to decide the question. He did not mean, however, to risk the loss of one or the other, or perhaps of both. He could not, therefore, permit them to encounter, with offensive weapons, but had ordered a large bag to be produced. It was his decree, that whichever succeeded in putting his rival into the bag, should obtain the hand of his daughter. This singular contest between the two gentlemen took place in the face of the whole court. The contest lasted for more than an hour. At length the Spaniard yielded, and the German, Ehberhard, Baron de Talbert, having planted his rival in the bag, took it upon his back, and very gallantly laid it at the feet of his mistress, whom he espoused the next day.

Such is the story, as gravely told by M. de St. Foix. It is impossible to say what the feelings of a successful combatant in a duel may be, on his having passed a small sword through the body, or a "bullet through the thorax" of his antagonist; but might he not feel quite as elated, and more consoled, on having put his adversary "into a bag?"

MEN AND WOMEN.—The terms, man and woman, in their proper and full import, convey far more than those of gentleman and lady. A true man and a true woman will be gentlemanly and ladylike, and a great deal more. There are men, and there are so-styled gentlemen, who have little or nothing manly about them.

A HUMAN BEER-BUTT.—A witness in a New York court lately testified that he had drunk forty-two gallons of lager beer in less than twenty minutes, without being intoxicated. We should think such habits would bring a man to his bier at last.

A FUNNY BOY.—"Dick, how is it you are always possessed of such a store of fun? Where do you get it?" "I manufacture it. I can make it out of nothing. For instance, I could make fun of you, but for friendship's sake."

A CONTRADICTION IN TERMS.—The London Times says: "Let us see how the truth lies, in regard to facts."

WITCHCRAFT IN NEW ENGLAND.

There is one case in the New Haven records which is very curious: The body of a poor woman, accused of witchcraft, tried and executed, was ordered to be examined by a jury of women to find the "witch-mark," the seal of the "devil's own." One of the female jurors, a woman of sense, was an unbeliever in the whole matter. On examining the body, this lady declared that "the poor woman was no more of a witch than she was." Fatal declaration! Her associate jurors discovered the deadly sign, and their unbelieving associate was forthwith arrested as a witch herself, and was condemned on what was held to be her own confession—her guilt being reasoned out by the following process of logic:

1. She had declared that the woman whose body she had examined, was no more of a witch than she was herself.

2. The other women jurors discovered the witch-mark.

3. The woman, upon whose body the mark was found, was a witch, of course.

4. So also was their fellow-juror, who had virtually confessed as much by the exclamation already cited.

What an affecting proof of the imbecility of the human mind, after all its boastings, is supplied by facts like these!

A CRUEL COOK.—Louis XVI. had a cook famous for his dish of eels. He cooked them thus: "Take one or two live eels; throw them into the fire. As they are twisting about on all sides, lay hold of them with a towel in your hand, and skin them from head to tail. This method is decidedly the best, as it is the means of drawing out all the oil which is unpalatable."

CURIOSITIES.—Dr. Dryasdust has donated the following curiosities to Mr. Kimball's museum: 'The key to the pantry of the "castle in the air;" a piece of embroidery executed by the "Sphinx of Egypt" with "Cleopatra's needle," and a knob from a "consular bureau."

PUNNING IN LATIN.—The ridiculous muss that is made, as to who was Lola Montez's pa, is a curious verification of her genealogy, as written in prophetic Latin: "Parturiunt Montez, nascitur ridiculus mus."

A GOOD MOTTO.—Shelley was very fond of quoting the passage from Godwin's St. Leon; "There is nothing which the human mind can conceive, which it may not execute."

THE CHARACTER OF FRANKLIN.

The example of Franklin, more than that of any other American, is held up for the imitation of our young men; and our readers cannot have failed to observe that youth become more early and deeply interested in the inner life of Franklin, than in that of any other public character. We use the term inner life, in contradistinction to the outer or public career by which and for which great men are usually known, and mean by it the way and manner in which one does great things as well as small, rather than the great things which he does. In contemplating the career of a great man, youth usually look upon his public acts as they would upon great monuments—not as things for daily and familiar use, but rather as objects for reverence and admiration upon stated occasions. Hence the force of example is, in these cases, lost; for one cannot emulate that in another which he does not thoroughly feel and understand in himself. There must be a sympathy, as well as admiration, to ensure emulation. Now with Franklin, the case is different. There was that in his character and qualities which makes the young feel a deep interest in what he said and did, and enter into the spirit of his actions, whether public or private. This peculiarity in Franklin which makes him so deep an object of interest to the young, was his naturalness. He was natural in all that he said or did, whether in his every-day life and business, or in the public capacities which he filled. Now most sensible men are natural enough in their private, common walk—but how few, how very few are there, who appear before the public, who put not on a stilted, artificial manner, deportment, thought, expression and action! Not one in a hundred of public characters are free from it. But youth see, or rather feel the unreality, and therefore only wonder and admire—never sympathize and emulate.

This naturalness of Franklin resulted from the peculiar traits which adorned his character, and the absence of others which too often mar the symmetry and deface the beauty of great men. He was not ambitious, he was not avaricious, he was not sensual; on the other hand, he was industrious, economical, persevering, independent and honest. These good qualities, acting upon a well-organized and bright mind, and a feeling heart, made him the great public benefactor of his country, as a political economist, a moralist, a philosopher and a statesman. His honesty taught him the rule of truth and sincerity, as his guide in public or in private life. His independence led him to act right in all cases, regardless of appearances, or the opposition of those who upheld wrong, however powerful they were in strength or numbers. His perseverance won for him success against the fitful storms of opposition, ever followed by the calm and prostration of exhaustion. His economy nicely adapted means to ends, and actions to circumstances, thus enabling him to come out of the contest not only victorious, but possessed of that for which he fought, and the means and capacity for its enjoyment. His industry made his means of tenfold power by their constant employment; secured and improved the advantages of success; diminished the waste of disaster; and constituted him the master, instead of the slave of circumstances. In short, we behold in the character of Franklin, whether in public or private life, that rare combination of qualities, endowments and motives, which may be called the perfection of common sense.

As a pleasing commentary upon the success of Franklin's career, and a confirmation of the correctness of the estimate which mankind have placed upon it, it may be remarked that he himself was not dissatisfied therewith, but was on the whole content. In remarking upon his life, during the progress of the important events in which it was involved, as well as in the evening of his days, when prejudice and passion grow dim and fade in the opening vista of another world, he frequently declared "that he would willingly live over again the same course of life, even though not allowed the privilege of an author to correct, in a second edition, the faults of the first."

How few, among the great men of the world who are held up as the sons of glory, could say this at the close of their lives! It is well that the young are warmed towards a character of such conscious rectitude, the records of whose outer life bear such faithful testimony to the correctness of the inner estimate! Happy for our country was it, that Franklin lived to bless her with his valuable wisdom and his honest counsels, when most her youthful steps needed wise and true guides! Happy is it for our country that his great example is left as a familiar, household guide, to interest and instruct the youth of our land!

LIGHTS FROM THE DUNGEON.—Sir Walter Raleigh's "History of the World" was written during eleven years' imprisonment, and left unfinished; Voltaire's "Henriade," while he was a prisoner in the Bastille; and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," while he, also, was suffering imprisonment.

THE GIPSIES.

This careless, free-and-easy race of people, who are the wonders of the earth, without home or resting place, and no certain knowledge whence they come, or whither they go—the scorn and contempt of all Europe—are about to have a history given to the world from the pen of the late Walter Simson, a Scotch gentleman. The work will be edited by his son, James Simson, now in New York, and will be published simultaneously in this country and in Europe. Bohemia is the centre from which this race has diffused itself throughout Europe, though their origin is often assigned by historians to Spain. The name of gipsy is supposed to come from the word Egyptian; and this has led to conjectures that this singular people originated in that country, and are a branch of the Coptic type of the ancient Egyptians. Certainly any history which will present a connected account of the language and customs of this remarkable people, and trace them ethnologically to their starting point in their wild and varied career, will be sought for with avidity, upon its publication. The work will contain proof of the gipsy lineage of the celebrated John Bunyan, author of the Pilgrim's Progress, who was born in Elstow, near Bedford, England, in the year 1628.

SELF-ESTEEM.—Some Frenchmen who had landed on the coast of Guinea, found a negro prince seated under a tree, a block of wood for his throne, with three or four negroes around with wooden pikes, for his guard. His sable majesty anxiously inquired, "Do they talk much of me in France?"

NOVEL IDEA OF HEAVEN.—An Indian was lately hung in Texas for the murder of a child. When on the scaffold, he said he was going to Arkansas, and wished the other Indians to send his gun to him after he should get there.

INCONSISTENT.—We wonder the members of our Legislature are trying to put down organ-grinders as nuisances, when they are constantly calling on their friends to organize!

ICES.—The quantity of ices consumed annually at the restaurants, coffee-houses and confectioners of Paris, is calculated at 16,000,000 pounds, English weight.

SMALL MEN.—A Cincinnati paper says there are some men in that city so small, that the tax-collector is unable to find them, when he goes round with his bills.

ADVICE.

Would a man wish to offend his friends? Let him give them advice. Would a lover know the surest method by which to lose his mistress? Let him give her advice. In short, if we are desirous of being universally hated, avoided and despised, the means are always in our power—we have but to advise, and the consequences are infallible. The friendship of two young ladies, though apparently founded on the rock of eternal attachment, terminated in the following manner: one of them said to her friend, "My dearest girl, I do not think your figure well suited for dancing; and as a sincere friend of yours, I would advise you to refrain from it in future." The other, naturally affected by such a mark of sincerity, replied, "I feel very much obliged to you, my dear, for your advice; this proof of your friendship demands some return: I would sincerely recommend you to relinquish your singing, as some of your upper notes resemble the melodious squeaking of the feline race." The advice of neither was followed—one continued to sing, and the other to dance, and they never met but as enemies.

A HUNDRED TO ONE.—"There were a hundred justices," says one, at the monthly meeting. "A hundred!" says another. "Yes," says he, "do you count, and I will name them. There was Justice Balance, put down one; Justice Hall, put down a cipher, he's nobody; Justice House, you may put down another cipher for him—one and two ciphers are a hundred."

HEARING BY MACHINERY.—Artificial ear-drums are now made of fine silver wire, with a disk of India rubber or gutta percha between. They are placed in the ear and worn without inconvenience, and it is said the effect is magical.

CAMBRIDGE WIT.—A gentleman of St. John's College, Cambridge, England, having a clubbed foot, which occasioned him to wear a very high-heeled shoe upon it, one of the college wags called him "Bildad the Shuhite."

THE HUTCHINSONS CORNED.—When the Hutchinsons give a concert out west, their rustic admirers pay their admission fees in corn, which, by the way, is much better than wildcat money.

EDWIN BOOTH.—At the termination of a successful engagement in New Orleans lately, this distinguished young actor was presented with a splendid service of plate.

THE FORTRESS OF GIBRALTAR.

The opposite heights upon the Straits of Gibraltar, one in Europe and the other in Africa, at the entrance to the Mediterranean Sea, the ancient Calpe and Abyla, were known to the ancients as the Pillars of Hercules. There seems to have been a fortress upon the European side from time immemorial. In the year A. D. 712, this position was captured from the Visigoths, who then ruled in Spain, by a body of Saracens, from Arabia, followers of Mahomet, which sect overrun a large part of Europe about that time with fire and sword. The leader of the captors of the promontory of Calpe was named Farik, and hence the present name, Gibet-Farik (Mountain of Farik), or Gibraltar. The African promontory, Abyla, was named Gibel-Maba. The Saracens in Spain, being hard pressed by the Christians, in the year 1091, called in their brethren of the same faith, the Moors from Africa, to their assistance. The Moors seized the dominions they came to protect, and subdued the Saracens. Gibraltar was held by the Moors until the year 1462, when it was captured by Henry IV., King of Castile. It remained a Spanish possession until the breaking out of that great European struggle, known in history as "The War of the Succession," which lasted eleven years. In the third year of this war—in 1704—the English, under Sir George Rooke, captured the fortress after a fierce cannonade by land and sea for three days.

Gibraltar has since continued an appendage to the British crown, and having been greatly strengthened and improved by the English, it is now considered as impregnable. It was attacked by the Spanish and French in the fall of 1704, but they were repulsed with immense loss. Subsequent efforts were made by Spain to recover this stronghold of her empire, in the years 1720 and 1727; but in both cases her troops were repulsed with very severe loss. In July, 1779, the French and Spanish commenced that memorable siege of Gibraltar, which lasted upwards of three years, and which was carried on by the most prodigious armaments ever brought to bear against a fortress. The besieging army amounted to 40,000 men, and one thousand pieces of artillery were brought to bear upon the fortress from the land. In addition to this, there was a naval force of forty-seven sail of the line, all three deckers, ten immense floating batteries, mounting two hundred and twelve guns, innumerable frigates, and smaller craft, gun and mortar boats, launches for landing the troops, etc., to so great an extent as literally to cover the bay. For weeks together, six hundred shells were daily thrown into the town; and upon one occasion eight hundred barrels of gunpowder expended by the besiegers. In a single night their floating batteries were destroyed by the English, with red-hot balls, and their whole line of works broken up by a sortie from the garrison, under Gen. Elliot. The loss of the besiegers in munitions of war alone, upon this night, was estimated at over two million pounds sterling, or about ten millions of dollars. The final defeat of the allies occurred however on the 13th of September, 1782, when the British garrison numbered only 7000 troops.

The great importance of Gibraltar to England, is as a naval and military station at the entrance of the Mediterranean, for the protection of her commerce, and as a security for the good conduct of Spain in the intrigues of European politics. This fastness is literally the key-stone of Spain, and of course while in the possession of England, that kingdom is at the mercy of Great Britain. The whole career of Spain towards Great Britain has been changed from what it was during the haughty dictatorial domination of that power, when it controlled the destinies of Europe. The position of Great Britain, as an independent equal among the nations was for a long time a mooted point with the continental powers of Europe, the whole course of their policy being adverse to the British power. In all their combinations against the English the agency of Spain was conspicuous and powerful. The capture of Gibraltar, by giving to Great Britain a fatal hold upon Spain, established a new order in continental combinations, exceedingly favorable to the position of England. This advantage was too great to permit either of its surrender by Great Britain, or of its peaceful enjoyment by her on the part of the continental powers. Hence the immense efforts which France and Spain have made to recapture Gibraltar, and the pertinacity with which England has resisted all the wiles of diplomacy, and all the warlike demonstrations which have been brought to bear upon her. So far as the question of the balance of power in Europe is concerned, it is well for our country that England should hold this important check upon her European rivals. In no hands could it probably prove less injurious to us as a nation, while at the same time it is pretty evident that our interest is to have that nation fully sustained in its European influence.

The position of Gibraltar does not control the entrance to the Mediterranean Sea, for the straits are so wide that a fleet may easily pass through without coming within reach of the guns of the fortress; and therefore there is no ground for jealousy on the score of commercial restraint on the part of our great maritime rival. The ceremony of saluting the English flag upon passing the fortress, was exacted of foreign vessels in former days; but that absurd pretension has long since been given up, and whatever respect is now paid by passing vessels is conceded as matter of courtesy, and not of right. With the above view of the policy of nations, we see not why it is not best that Great Britain should retain Gibraltar. May not a similar view applied to Cuba, the Gibraltar of America, demonstrate the sound policy and propriety of our possessing that key-stone of the United States of America? A large portion of the enormous national debt of England was incurred in the war which won for her the promontory of Gibraltar. One half the sum expended by her in that war, would probably be sufficient to purchase from Spain her rights in Cuba, and thus give us by peaceful negotiation, a most valuable addition to our national strength, prosperity and power, and one that would soon repay its cost to the country.

MIND YOUR P's AND Q's.—The most probable derivation of this phrase is, that it comes from the printing-office, and rose from the fact that the p's and q's in Roman type vary but slightly in form, and that when reversed, as they necessarily are in type, they are easily confounded by young compositors. Another derivation refers it to the "scot" written up in the ale-house, where P and Q were used to designate pints and quarts. Still another derivation refers it to the toupees and queues of olden times.

AN ANCIENT RELIC.—In the burying ground of the ancient town of Windsor, Ct., there is a monument more than two hundred years old, which still stands firm, with this inscription legible upon it: "Here lyeth Ephraim Hvt, sometimes Teacher to ye Chvrch of Windsor, who dyed Sep. 14, 1644.

Who when Hee lived we drew our vital breath,
Who when he dyed, his dying was our death,
Who was the stay of State, Of Church the staff,
Alas! the times forbid an Epitaph."

SUICIDE.—Perhaps the coolest attempt at self-destruction on record is that of an Englishman, cited by Foudere, who advertised that he would, on a certain day, put himself to death in Covent Garden, for the benefit of his wife and family. Tickets of admission, one guinea each.

A SIMPLE REMEDY.—Dr. Dewees says that he has often seen infants when seeming to suffer exquisite agony, rendered perfectly quiet and easy by a draught of cold water.

THE DOUAY BIBLE.

The Catholic edition of the Bible in general use among that communion, is called the Douay Bible. It is copiously explained by the notes of Catholic divines, and is the only authorized version of the sacred volume sanctioned by the head of the church. It takes its name from Douay, a city in the northeast of France, the site of a celebrated Roman Catholic College, founded by Philip II., of Spain, A. D. 1569. Douay was captured by Louis XIV., of France, in person, in 1697, and taken from the French by the English, under the celebrated Duke of Marlborough, in the year 1710, during the war of the succession. But it was retaken by the French the year following. It is a city of some importance, containing two other colleges, a foundry of cannon, a fine arsenal, and a military school, and is therefore well provided with weapons, carnal and spiritual, for the twofold warfare of the civilized world.

THOUGHT.—The mind of a thinking man resembles the soils beneath whose surface lie many precious seeds. Every rain calls forth buds, and every beam of the sun produces flowers. Fruits fail not in their due time. The flower-garden of a mind merely learned, endures but during the night. The flowers wither away under the rays of the sun, and are followed by no fruit.

ARISTOCRATIC SHREWDSNESS.—When the Siamese twins were exhibited in England, a certain noble duke paid a visit to the boys. His grace's first question, after examining their peculiar formation, was, "Pray, are they brothers?" On being informed by a wag that they were only "second cousins," he went away satisfied.

PHILANTHROPIC.—The editor of one of our exchanges says he is always ready and willing to lend a helping hand, and even an arm to squeeze the ladies, if that will keep them from squeezing themselves to death.

A HINT FOR THE YOUNG.—If a man begins to save ten cents a day when he is twenty-one years old, and continues to do so till he is seventy, he will then be worth $10,956 37.

A WELLERISM.—"Sir, I'm directed to make application to you," as the plaster remarked to the patient.

A GOOD SIGN.—An editor not a thousand miles from Boston, advertises for a seat in a church.

Among the rare and curious books and manuscripts recently sold by auction in London, was a copy of Cicero de Senectute et Amicitia, printed by William Caxton, in 1481, which produced the enormous price of $1325. It was formerly the Merly copy, purchased at that sale for $1000, by the Marquis of Blandford, resold at White Knights for $435, and afterwards in Trotter Brockett's for $2400.

How small is the diameter of the human throat, and how short its measure! Yet it will give the same note with the pipe of an organ eight feet in length! And the valve which covers it, and plays with electric swiftness (imitated by the reed of the organ), is, as all know, a very little thing; yet with the contractions and expansions of the throat, it will utter a scale of seventeen degrees!

Bad luck is a man with his hands in his breeches pockets, and a pipe in his mouth, looking on to see how it will come out. Good luck is a man of pluck to meet difficulties, his sleeves rolled up, and working to make it come out right.

Lord Chancellor Northington suffered much from the gout; and once, after some painful waddling between the woolsock and the bar in the House of Lords, he was heard to mutter: "If I had known that these legs were one day to carry a chancellor, I'd have taken better care of them when I was a lad."

The celebrated Dr. Hunter, whom Abernethy, in one of his arid veins, termed "the English Blood Hunter," when starting in life, gave lectures. His first lecture was attended only by the porter. "John," said the great man, unmoved by the circumstance, "take that skeleton down, that I may say with propriety—Gentlemen."

PICTURES OF BRAZIL.

JARA ASSU (LEOPOLDINA MAJOR).

IN the present number we propose to glance at some of the most striking features in the empire of Brazil, South America, a country about which very little is generally known, and which is nevertheless one of the most interesting countries on the globe. Our illustrative sketches, together with the text, will be taken from an admirable work on the subject, recently published in Philadelphia, by Messrs. Childs & Peterson, and entitled "Brazil and the Brazilians, portrayed in Historical and Descriptive Sketches. By Rev. D. P. Kidder and Rev. J. C. Fletcher." The work is an octavo volume of six hundred and thirty pages, illustrated by one hundred and fifty elegant engravings, wood and steel, some of the natural history drawings being elaborately colored. It also contains the best map of Brazil extant. The experience of the writers in the Brazilian empire embraces a period of twenty years, and they are thoroughly acquainted with the topography, resources, religions, laws, statistics and customs of the country, and the people. In addition to their own observations, they have studied every authentic work on the subject, French, German, English and Portuguese, and have consulted the imperial and provincial archives for statistics. Their book is written in a vigorous and lively style, and henceforward must be the standard authority on Brazil.

The empire of Brazil occupies an area of about 3,956,800 square miles, and is bounded north by Venezuela and the colonies of Guayana; north-east, east and south-east by the Argentine Confederation, Bolivia, Peru and Ecuador. It has no mountains of very great extent. Its river system is unequalled. The climate is good and much of the soil is productive. It is rich in minerals, and its diamond and topaz mines are very productive. The empire is a constitutional monarchy, hereditary in the male line of the reigning family. The Roman Catholic is the established religion, but all others are permitted. Don Pedro II., the reigning emperor, is a very liberal and highly educated man.

Brazil was discovered May 3, 1500, by Pinçon, but was subsequently taken possession of by De Cabral. Various towns were planted by the Portuguese, but not without being troubled by the English, Dutch and Spaniards. In 1800, when Portugal was invaded by the French, the king fled to Brazil, and on the fall of Napoleon, raised it to a kingdom, assuming himself the title of King of Portugal, Algarve and Brazil. The revolution which took place in Portugal in 1820, compelling the king to return to that country, he next year sailed for Lisbon, leaving Don Pedro, his eldest son, as regent. In 1822, Don Pedro, in accordance with the wish of the people, declared Brazil to be a free and independent State, and himself assumed the title of emperor, and in 1825 Portugal acquiesced in the change. Don Pedro abdicated, April 7, 1831, in favor of his son, the present emperor; but the country was ruled by a regency until 1840.

Among the first features that impress the traveller in Brazil, is the luxuriant growth of its vegetation. Our initial engraving represents the Jara-Assu palm, (Leopoldina major).

The most generous gift that bountiful Providence gave Brazil is the palm-tree. The traveller in the interior provinces and upon the seacoast away from the cities is struck by the very application of this "prince of the vegetable kingdom" to the wants of man. And if the palm plays so important a part in the domestic economy of Europeans and their descendants, his highness was, and is, servant for general house and field work among the aborigines of Brazil. To this day it furnishes the Amazonian Indians house, raiment, food, drink, salt, fishing-tackle, hunting implements and musical instruments, and almost every necessary of life except flesh. Take the hut of an Uaupé Indian on one of the affluents of the Rio Negro. The rafters are formed by the straight and uniform palm called Leopoldina pulchra; the roof is composed of the leaves of the Carana palm; the doors and framework of the split stems of the Iriartea exhoriza. The wide bark which grows beneath the fruit of another species is sometimes used as an apron. The Indian's hammock, his bow-strings, and his fishing-lines, are woven and twisted from the fibrous portions of different palms. The comb with which the males of some of the tribes adorn their heads is made from the hard wood of a palm, and the fish-hooks are made from the spines of the same tree. The Indian makes, from the fibrous spathes of the Manicaria sacci- fera, caps for his head, or cloth in which he wraps his most treasured feather ornaments. From eight species he can obtain intoxicating liquor; from many more—not including the cocoanut-palm, found on the seacoast—he receives oil and a harvest of fruit; and from one (the Jara assu) he procures, by burning the large clusters of small nuts, a substitute for salt. From another he forms a cylinder for squeezing the mandioca-pulp, because it resists for a long time the action of the poisonous juice. The great woody spathes of the Maximiliana regia are "used by hunters to cook meat in, as, with water in them, they stand the fire well." These spathes are also employed for carrying earth, and sometimes for cradles. Arrows are made from the spinous processes of the Pataua, and lances and heavy harpoons are made from the Iriartea ventricosa; the long blowpipe through which the Indian sends the poisoned arrow that brings down the bright birds, the fearless peccari, and even the thick-skinned tapir, is furnished by the Setigera palm; the great, bassoon-like musical instruments used in the "devil-worship" of the Uaupés are also made from the stems of palm-trees.

The highly-dressed belle in the next engraving is a creole Mina negress of Bahia, who rejoices in the name par excellence, of the "Bahiana." Bahia de Todos os Santos, the Bay of All-Saints, as our readers are aware, was formerly the capital of Brazil, and was discovered in 1503, by Americus Vespucius, then sailing in the employ of Dom Manoel, king of Portugal. It is a place of great bustle and business.

Around the landing-places cluster hundreds of canoes, launches, and various other small craft, discharging their loads of fruit and produce. On one part of the praya is a wide opening, which is used as a market-place. Near this a beautiful spacious modern building has been constructed for an exchange. It is well supplied with newspapers from all parts of the world, and is in a cool and airy situation. The principal commercial houses are situated on the Rua Nova do Commercio, and these compose the finest blocks of buildings in Brazil,—perhaps in all South America. These edifices would adorn the business portions of London, Paris, or New York.

favorable impression upon the stranger. The lofty buildings are nearly all old, although generally of a cheerful exterior. The streets in this vicinity are very narrow, uneven, and wretchedly paved, and at times as filthy as those of New York. At the same time it is crowded with pedlars and carriers of every description. You here become acquainted with one peculiarity of Bahia. Owing to the irregularities of its surface and the steepness of the ascent which separates the upper town from the lower, it does not admit the use of wheel-carriages. Not even a cart or truck is to be seen for the purpose of removing burdens from one place to another. Whatever requires change of place in all the commerce and ordinary business of this seaport—and it is second in size and importance to but one other in South America—must pass on the heads and shoulders of men. Burdens are here more frequently carried upon the shoulders, since the principal exports of the city being sugar in cases and cotton in bales, it is impossible that they should be borne on the head like bags of coffee.

Immense numbers of tall, athletic negroes are seen moving in pairs or gangs of four, six, or eight, as shown in one of our engravings, with their loads suspended between them on heavy poles. Numbers more of their fellows are seen sitting upon their poles, braiding straw or lying about the alleys and corners of the streets asleep, reminding one of black snakes coiled up in the sunshine. The sleepers generally have some sentinel ready to call them when they are wanted for business, and at the given signal they rouse up, like the elephant to his burden. Like the coffee carriers of Rio, they often sing and shout as they go; but their gait is necessarily slow and measured, resembling a dead march rather than the double-quick step of their Fluminensean colleagues. Another class of negroes are devoted to carrying passengers in a species of sedan-chair called cadeiras.

It is indeed a toilsome and often a dangerous task for a white person to ascend on feet the bluffs on which stands the cidade alta, particularly when the powerful rays of the sun are pouring, without mitigation, upon the head. No omnibus or cab can be found to do him service.

COFFEE CARRIERS.

THROWING THE LASSO.

In accordance with this state of things, he finds near every corner or place of public resort, a long row of curtained cadeiras, the bearers of which, hat in hand, crowd around him with all the eagerness, though not with the impudence, of carriage-drivers in North America, saying, "Quer cadeira, senhor?" ("Will you have a chair, sir?") When he has made his selection, and seated himself to his liking, the bearers elevate their load and march along, apparently as much pleased with the opportunity of carrying a passenger as he is with the chance of being carried. To keep a cadeira or two, and negroes to bear them, is as necessary for a family in Bahia as the keeping of carriages and horses is elsewhere. The livery of the carriers, and the expensiveness of the curtaining and ornaments of the cadeira, indicate the rank and style which the family maintains.

Some of the streets between the upper and lower towns wind by a zigzag course along ravines; others slant across an almost perpendicular bluff, to avoid as much as possible its steepness. Nor is the surface level when you have ascended to the summit. Not even Rome can boast of so many hills as are here clustered together, forming the site of Bahia. Its extent between its extreme limits—Rio Vermelho and Montserrat—is about six miles. The city is nowhere wide, and for the most part is composed of only two or three principal streets. The direction of these changes with the various curves and angles necessary to preserve the summit of the promontory. Frequent openings between the houses built along the summit exhibit the most picturesque views of the bay on the one hand and of the country on the other. The aspect of the city is antique. Great sums have been expended in the construction of its pavements—more, however, with a view to preserve the streets from injury by rain than to furnish roads for any kind of carriages. Here and there may be seen an ancient fountain of stonework, placed in a valley of greater or less depth, to serve as a rendezvous for some stream that trickles down the hill above; but nowhere is there any important aqueduct, though recent waterworks, with steam-engines manufactured in France, have been lately erected east of the Novicindo, which will furnish a bountiful supply of the potable element to the city.

KILLING JUDAS.

In 1510, a vessel under the command of Diogo Alvares Correa was wrecked near the entrance of this bay. The Tupinambas, inhabiting the coast, fell upon and destroyed all who survived this shipwreck, except the captain of the vessel. The Indians spared Diogo,—probably, as some supposed, on account of his activity in assisting them to save articles from the wreck. He had the good fortune to obtain a musket and some barrels of powder and ball. He early took occasion to shoot a bird, and the Indians, terrified by the explosion no less than by its effects, called him from that moment Caramuru, “the man of fire.” He then conciliated their favor by assuring them that, although he was a terror to his enemies, he could be a valuable auxiliary to his friends. He accordingly accompanied the Tupinambas on an expedition against a neighboring tribe with whom they were at war. The first discharge of Caramuru’s musket gained him possession of the field, his frightened adversaries scampering for their lives.

Little more was necessary to secure him a perfect supremacy among the aboriginals. As a proof of this, he was soon complimented with proposals from various chiefs, who offered him their daughters in marriage. Diogo made choice of Paraguassu, daughter of the head chief Itaparica, whose name is perpetuated as the designation of the large island in front of the city, while that of Paraguassu, the bride, is applied to one of the rivers emptying into the bay. He built a hamlet which he denominated S. Salvador, in gratitude for his escape from the shipwreck. This settlement was located in a place denominated Graca, on the Victoria Hill, a suburb of the city, still occasionally called Vilha Velha (old town.)

After the lapse of some years, a ship from Normandy anchored in front of Caramuru’s town and opened communications with the shore. Diogo now determined to return to Europe; and, having supplied the vessel with a cargo, he embarked for Dieppe, accompanied by Paraguassu. He intended, if he arrived safely, to go from Dieppe to Lisbon. The French, however, would not permit this, but preferred to make him a lion in their own capital. Paraguassu was the first Indian female who had ever appeared in Paris. A splendid fete was given at her baptism, when she was christened Catherine Alvares, after the Queen Catharine de Medicis. King Henry II., accompanying his royal spouse, officiated on the occasion as godfather and sponsor.

The French government contracted with Caramuru to send out vessels which should carry him to his adopted country, and return with brazilwood and other articles, which should be given in exchange for goods and trinkets. In the meantime, true to his original intent, he contrived to inform Dom John III., of Portugal, of the importance of colonizing Bahia. A young Portuguese, who had just finished his studies in Paris and was returning to Portugal, was the bearer of this message. This young man (Pedro Fernandez Sardinha) afterward became bishop of Bahia. The natives rejoiced at Caramuru’s return, and his colony now increased rapidly and extended its influence in every direction.

At this period the King of Portugal, in order to secure the settlement of Brazil, divided the country into twelve captaincies, each of fifty leagues’ extent on the coast, and boundless toward the interior. Each captaincy was conceded to a donatary, whose power and authority were absolute. Francisco Pereira Coutinho, who came to take possession of Bahia, was a man rash and arbitrary in the extreme. He became jealous of the influence of Diogo Alvares, and commenced to persecute and oppress him, and finally sent him on board a ship as a prisoner. This course exasperated the Indians, who determined on revenge. They attacked the settlement and killed Coutinho. Diogo Alvares was again restored to his original supremacy.

The growing importance of the country, together with rumors of violence practised by the donataries, induced Dom John III. to appoint a governor-general of Brazil, to reside at S. Salvador and to have jurisdiction over all the donataries. In 1549, Thomé de Souza, the first governor-general, landed with military ceremonies at Vilha Velha, but in the course of a month proceeded to choose another location for the commencement of his operations. It was that of the present cathedral, government palace, and other public buildings. Caramuru was now an old man, but was of great service to the governor-general in consummating with the natives a treaty of peace. In four months a hundred houses were built, and various sugar plantations were laid out in the vicinity. From this period the city of S. Salvador, having been constituted the capital of Portuguese America, and remaining under the direct patronage of the mother-country, rapidly increased in size and importance.

The year 1624 witnessed the first depredations of the Dutch upon the then quiet and prosperous city of Bahia. Without the least notice or provocation, a fleet from Holland entered the harbor, attacked the city, burned the shipping, and debarked men to seize the fortress of S. Antonio, and, after some fighting, gained possession of the town. This they sacked, not even sparing the churches. The captors immediately erected additional fortifications and built many new houses. They made prizes of all the Portuguese and Spanish ships that came into the harbor not knowing that the town had changed masters.

Portugal was at this time tributary to Spain. The news of the loss of Bahia caused great consternation at Madrid, and the more since it had been rumored that the English were to unite their forces with the Dutch and establish the Elector-Palatine King of Brazil. The Spanish court adopted measures worthy of its superstition and its power. Instructions were despatched to the governors of Portugal, requiring them to examine into the crimes which had provoked this visitation of the divine vengeance, and to punish them forthwith. Novenas were appointed throughout the whole kingdom; and a litany and prayers, framed for the occasion, were to be said after the mass. On one of the nine days there was to be a solemn procession of the people in every town and village, and of the monks in every cloister. The sacrament was exposed in all the churches of Lisbon, and a hundred thousand crowns were contributed in that city to aid the government in recovering S. Salvador.

A great ocean-fleet of forty sail, carrying eight thousand soldiers, sailed under D. Fadrique de Toledo and D. Manoel de Menezes, which in March, 1625, appeared off the bay; and after some delay, the object of which was to learn if the Hollanders had received reinforcements, D. Fadrique, satisfied that they had not, entered the harbor with trumpets sounding, colors flying, and the ships ready for action. The Dutch vessels also, and the walls and forts, were dressed out, with their banners and streamers hoisted, either to welcome friends or defy enemies, whichever these new-comers might prove to be. The city had been fortified with great care, according to the best principles of engineering,—a science in which no people had at that time such experience as the Dutch. It was defended by ninety-two pieces of artillery, and from the new fort upon the beach they fired red-hot shot. After some severe skirmishing, the Dutch, having waited in vain for the fleet from Holland, proposed a capitulation, which was acceded to.

The Hollanders attempted to retake the city in 1638, under Mauritz, Count of Nassau, who was then in possession of Pernambuco and a large portion of the adjoining coast. They were repeatedly defeated at Bahia, but succeeded for a time at other points. The original attack, on the part of the Dutch, grew out of purely mercenary motives. It was planned and executed under the auspices of the celebrated West India Company. Proving successful at first, the Hollanders did not content themselves with plundering the inhabitants, but determined to make the very soil their own. Their inroads were manfully resisted by the Portuguese, and the war, at different times, extended along the whole coast from Bahia to Maranhão.

In 1636, Mauritz, Count of Nassau, was sent out to take command of the troops and to govern the new empire. Under his direction, active measures were set on foot; forts, cities, and palaces were built, and the country was explored in search of mines. Agriculture was undertaken with a strong hand, and it is easy to imagine what changes would have been introduced into those fertile regions by the industrious Hollanders, had not the fate of war decided against them. In the low ground, the marshes and the streams that surround the city of Pernambuco, they would have especially gloried. But the Brazilians, under their vigilant leaders, Camarao, Henrique Diaz (the former an Indian, the latter a negro), Souto and Vieyra, kept up such incessant attacks upon the Hollanders, that at last, in 1654, they were expelled from Pernambuco, and in 1661 they abandoned, by negotiation, all claim to Brazil. It is interesting to think that, whatever motives may have urged the commercial Hollanders to attack Brazil, the Christians of that brave little Protestant country were not slow to follow up the settlements; and hence, in Pernambuco and vicinity, faithful missionary stations were established, and, when the Dutch were finally driven from the country, some of the clergymen came to New Amsterdam, and one of them was the first pastor of the Dutch Reformed Church founded at Flatbush, Long Island. From this time the Hollanders ceased their attacks on Bahia; that city advanced in wealth and prosperity, and was the seat of the viceroyalty until 1763, when it was transferred to Rio de Janeiro.

The position of Bahia, opposite the coast of Africa, caused it to be, from early times, an important rendezvous for those engaged in the African slave-trade. Bahia increased in population and wealth, and in 1808 its prosperity was still more augmented by the Carta Regia which opened the ports of Brazil to the world. This city was the last that remained faithful to Portugal; for, though the independence of the empire was declared in September, 1822, it was not until July, 1823, and after severe suffering, that the Portuguese army evacuated Bahia San Salvador. The rebellion of 1837 was frightful in the extreme; but the imperial government finally obtained the mastery, and from that day to this Bahia has continued quiet, and has made rapid strides of improvement.

There is no city in Brazil that so interests the foreigner as Bahia. It is the spiritual capital of the country, being the residence of the archbishop. The churches, the convents, and other public buildings, are upon a large scale, and have no provincialism in their appearance. The people are gay and social. To "fish for whales" is a regular business at Bahia, and nearly every week, from the numerous terraces, admiring thousands can gaze upon the stirring excitement of capturing these monsters of the deep. If we descend through lime-tree hedges to the Rio Vermelho, we may have an opportunity (besides seeing the fixtures for extracting of oil) of witnessing the triumphant arrival of the dead leviathan. Hundreds of people—the colored especially—throng around to witness the monster's dying struggles, and to procure portions of his flesh, which they cook and eat. Vast quantities of this flesh are cooked in the streets, and sold by quitandeiras. Numbers of swine also feast upon the carcass of the whale; and all who are not specially discriminating in their selection of pork in the market, during the season of these fisheries, are liable (volens volens) to get a taste of something "very like a whale." This whale-fishery was once the greatest in the world. At the close of the seventeenth century, it was rented by the crown for thirty thousand dollars annually.

buildings—the one upon the heights, the other upon the water's edge—everywhere separated by a broad, rich belt of green, itself here and there dotted with houses,—the fortress, the shipping, the white-capped waves, over which the whale-boats are pursuing their gigantic sport,—the distant isle of Itaparica and the blue ocean beyond,—all form a picture which at the time fills one with exhilarating delight, and ever after dwells in the cabinet of memory a choice and beautiful picture. There are few cities that can present a single view of more imposing beauty than does Bahia to a person beholding it from a suitable distance on the water. Even Rio de Janeiro can hardly be cited for such a comparison. The capital excels in the endless variety of its beautiful suburbs; but in the Archiepiscopal City beauty is concentrated and presented at one view. In Rio, for pleasant abodes, one section competes with another, and each offers some ground of preference; but in Bahia, the superiorities seem all to be united in one section, leaving the foreigner no room for doubt that the focus is the Victoria Hill.

The water-carriers of Rio, next represented, are a decided feature of the place. One of the greatest delights for the black population of Rio is the necessity of carrying water from the chafariz, or public fountain, or from the water-pipe, which is at the corner of almost every street. Blackey lazily lounges out with his barril under his arm, and happy is Congo if he espies a long queue of his compatriots awaiting their turn at the stopcock. Here the news of their little world is told amid bursts of Ethiopian laughter; or a small flirtation is carried on with Rosa, or Joaquina, from the next street; or perhaps there is an upbraiding lecture administered by some jetty damsel from Angola, whose voice, to his consternation, is by no means pianissimo. There is another out-door affair much more congenial, i. e., many a sly attempt to kill the bixo is made at the adjoining venda while the water pours into the barris of the earlier comers. Some mistresses, however, who find that their cooks have always to wait for the water, make arrangements with the water-carriers, who perambulate the streets with an immense hoghead mounted on wheels and drawn by a mule. This vehicle during a fire (not a frequent occurrence) is required to supply the fire-engines. These men are generally natives of Portugal or the Azores, and seem eminently qualified by nature to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. They carry the water up-stairs and pour it into large earthen jars, which bring to mind the water-pots at the marriage of Cana, in Galilee. The huge earthen vases are arranged on stands, in places where there is a current of air; and the liquid element in them thus acquires a coolness which, though not equal to the iced water of the United States, possesses a delightful frigidity. Ice is in Brazil an expensive luxury, brought solely from North America, and not in general use, even in Rio, and, of course, unknown in the country. Boston apples and ice are both in the highest esteem; but the latter was rejected as altogether unwholesome upon its introduction, in 1833, and the first cargo was a total loss to the adventurers.

Another of our pictures shows the costume of the police of Rio de Janeiro. It is military, and is well disciplined by officers of the regular army. They are fortified with plenty of authority, and take care to use it. Great difficulties have sometimes occurred between the constabulary and foreigners, where, on some occasions, the former have been to blame; but it was good for "Young America," when going "round the Horn," on his way to California, to be held in wholesome restraint by these "yellow Brazilians," whom he affected to despise. The police is armed. During the day you may see them singly or in pairs, having their positions in convenient localities for watching the slaves and all others suspected of liability to disorder. Now the policeman, with three or four of his companions, strolls along by Hotel Pharoux, to have an eye upon the foreign sailors; or again, with a single confrere, he takes his stand by the Carioca fountain; or again, his undress-cap, his blue uniform, his sword, and his brace of pistols, are wholesomely displayed at a corner venda, where Sr. Antonio from Fayal sells cachaca (rum), pigtail tobacco, carne secca, mandioc-flour, red Lisbon wine, and black beans. The above mentioned staples are the articles of stock and consumption for the low grocer and the low class that patronize him. Sometimes he will get a little higher in the provision line, and add butter brought from Ireland, lard from the United States, onions from Portugal, sardines, a few hams, and sausages. Then, too, he is somewhat of a lumber merchant; for he purchases a few bundles of finely-split wood, which, together with charcoal, is the small accompaniment of the kitchen-battery in Brazil. At these vendas is the only hard drinking—except that done by English and Americans—in Rio, and that imbibing is by the slaves. Often Congo or Mozambique becomes eloquent under the effects of cachaca, and then the policeman is an effectual arbiter.

Another of our illustrations represents a group of the famous coffee carriers of Rio. These men go in troops, numbering from ten to twenty individuals, of whom one takes the lead, and is called the captain. These are generally the largest and strongest men that can be found. While at work they seldom wear any other garment than a pair of short pantaloons; their shirt is thrown aside for the time as an incumbrance. Each one takes a bag of coffee upon his head, weighing one hundred and sixty pounds, and, when all are ready, they start off at a measured trot, which soon increases to a rapid run. As one hand is sufficient to steady the load, several of them frequently carry musical instruments in the other, resembling children's rattle-boxes; these they shake to the double-quick time of some wild Ethiopian ditty, which they all join in singing as they run. Music has a powerful effect in exhilarating the spirits of the negro; and certainly no one should deny him the privilege of softening his hard lot by producing the harmony of sounds, which are sweet to him, though uncouth to other ears. It is said, however, that an attempt was at one time made to secure greater quietness in the streets by forbidding them to sing. As a consequence, they performed little or no work: so the restriction was in a short time taken off. Certain it is that they now avail themselves of their vocal privileges at pleasure, whether in singing and shouting to each other as they run, or in proclaiming to the people the various articles they carry about for sale. The impression made upon the stranger by the mingled sound of their hundred voices falling upon his ear at once is not soon forgotten.

Another spirited engraving of this series represents a huntsman about throwing the lasso round the horns of a wild bull on the plains. The great wealth of Rio Grande do Sul consists of that which constituted the riches of the patriarchs—flocks and herds. The Guachos of Buenos Ayres are not more expert on horseback, or more skilful in the use of the lasso than are the Rio Grandenses, whose occupation from childhood is the care and culture of the herds of cattle which roam the vast campinas or prairies. It has been estimated that in the province of Rio Grande do Sul—not mentioning parts of Santa Catharina and S. Paulo, which are devoted to the same purposes—five hundred thousand cattle are slaughtered annually for the sake of preserving their hides and flesh, while as many more are driven northward for ordinary consumption. Most of the carne secca, or jerked beef, in common use throughout Brazil, is prepared here. After the hide is taken from the ox, the flesh is skinned off in a similar manner from the whole side, in strips about half an inch in thickness. The meat, in this form, is stretched in the sun to dry. But very little salt is used in its preservation, and, when sufficiently cured, it is shipped to all the maritime provinces, and is the only kind of preserved beef used in the country. ~~Stacks of this meat~~ (emitting no very agreeable odor) are piled up, like cords of wood, in the ~~provinces~~ houses of Rio de Janeiro. In the financial year 1853-54, Rio Grande do Sul exported the value of near $3,000,000 in hides, horns, hair and wool, $1,000,000 of which were imported into the United States.

The character of the people is somewhat peculiar, owing to their circumstances and mode of life. They are generally tall, of an active and energetic appearance, with handsome features, and of a lighter skin than prevails among the inhabitants of the northern portions of the empire. Both sexes are accustomed, from childhood, to ride on horseback, and consequently acquire great skill in the management of those noble animals, upon which they take their amusements as well as perform their journeys and pursue the wild cattle of their plains.

The use of the lasso is learned among the earliest sports of boyhood, and is continued until an almost inconceivable dexterity is acquired. Little children, armed with their lasso or bolas, make war upon the chickens, ducks and geese of the farmyard, until their ambition and strength lead them into a wider field. For the pursuit of wild cattle, the horses are admirably trained, so that, when the lasso is thrown, they know precisely what to do. Sometimes, in the case of a furious animal, the rider checks the horse and dismounts, while the bull is running out the length of his raw-hide rope. The horse wheels round and braces himself to sustain the shock which the momentum of the captured animal must inevitably give. The bull, not expecting to be brought up so suddenly, is thrown sprawling to the ground. Rising to his feet, he rushes upon the horse to gore him; but the latter keeps at a distance, until the bull, finding that nothing is to be accomplished in this way, again attempts to flee, when the rope a second time brings him to the ground. Thus the poor animal is worried, until he is wholly within the power of his captors.

Nor is it only in Rio Grande do Sul or San Paulo that scenes of this kind may be observed. They were formerly witnessed in Rio de Janeiro itself. At the Motadoura publico, situated on the Praya d'Ajuda, before the municipal butcheries were removed to the spacious abattoirs at San Christova, vast numbers of cattle were daily slaughtered. Among the droves that reached the capital from the distant sertoes, was occasionally an ox so wild and powerful that he was not disposed to surrender life without a desperate struggle. He would break from his enclosure and dash into the streets of the city, threatening destruction to whoever opposed his course. A horse, accoutred with saddle and bridle, and with a lasso fastened to him by a strong girth, stood ready for the emergency, and was mounted in an instant to give pursuit. The chase was widely different in its circumstances from that which occurs in the open campos; but perhaps no interest was lost in the rapid turning of the corners of streets, the heavy clatter of hoofs upon the pavement, and the hasty accumulation of spectators. In a short time, usually, the noose of the lasso whirled around the horns of the fugitive, an area was cleared, and the scene already described was enacted, until the runaway ox was killed on the spot or led away in triumph to the slaughter. The lasso is, moreover, in frequent use in the Campo de Santa Anna, in the same city, where vast herds of mules are frequently congregated for sale. The purchaser has only to indicate which animal out of the untamed multitude he would like to examine, and the tropeiro soon has him "slippernoosed" at the end of his long rope, by which he holds or leads him at will.

A curious ceremony is observed by the lower orders, of which we present an illustration. Hallelujah Saturday is better known as "Judas's day," on account of the numerous forms in which that "inglorious patriarch" is made to suffer the vengeance of the people. Preparations having been made beforehand, rockets are fired in front of the churches at a particular stage of the morning service. This explosion indicates that the hallelujah is being chanted. The sport now begins forthwith in every part of the town. The effigies of poor Judas become the objects of all species of torment. They are hung, strangled, and drowned. In short, the traitor is shown up in fireworks and fantastic figures of every description, in company with dragons, serpents, and the devil and his imps, which pounce upon him.

sure of a treble price from the newly-arrived. Who that has visited Rio de Janeiro will not at a glance recognize the landing-place depicted in the engraving? Hotel Pharoux, the Palace Stairs, and the Largo do Paço (Palace Square), are associated with Rio de Janeiro in the mind of every foreign naval officer who has been on the Brazil station. But changes have taken place, and greater are in contemplation, among this slow-moving people. Hotel Pharoux still lifts its white walls; but it is modernized, and the old restaurant and stable in the basement have given way to shell-merchants and feather-flower dealers, and the dining-room is upon the second floor. We no longer land at the palace stairs, where formerly at flood-tide the waters of the bay dashed and foamed against the stone

A BRAZILIAN MOUNTAIN-ROAD.

Besides the more formal and expensive preparations that are made for this celebration by public subscription, the boys and the negroes have their Judases, whom they do feloniously and maliciously drag about with ropes, hang, beat, punch, stone, burn, and drown, to their hearts' content.

Among our engravings will be found representations of the Hotel Pharoux, and the Palace Square and Rua Direita at Rio. Our authors thus speak of these localities:—"The stranger who, with anxious expectation, has paced the deck of his vessel as it lies at anchor under Villegagnon, knows no more welcome sound than the permission from the custom-house and health officers to land and roam through the city which for hours before his eyes have visited. The blacks who have come from the shore now return, pulling their heavy boat lustily along, for they are parapet which at this point marked their limit. The square has been extended into the waves, and soon the government will have fine quays along the whole water-edge in this part of the city.

"Instead of the old granite steps, we ascend the wooden stairs at the end of a long jetty. Here our boat has arrived, amid odors that certainly have not been wafted from "Araby the blest," and we learn that the sewerage of Rio is a portable instead of an underground affair. The sense of hearing, too, is wounded by the confused jabbering of blacks in the language of Congo, the shouts of Portuguese boat-owners, and by the oaths of American and English sailors. Once clear of this throng, what novel sights and sounds astonish us! A hackney-coachman, in glazed hat and red vest, invites us to a ride to the botanical gardens; a smart-looking mulatto points to his 'Hansom' hard by the Hotel de France. Before their words are ended, the roll of drums and the blast of bugles attract our attention in another direction. There, in front of the old palace, is drawn up a handful of the National Guard, composed of every imaginable complexion, from white to African; and now, as every day at noon, they remove their helmets, listen for a moment with religious veneration to the strain of music which the black trumpeters puff out from swelling cheeks, and then resume, with the exception of the sentinels, their difficult task of loitering in the corridors of the huge building, or basking in the sunshine, until another sound of the bugle shall call them to change guard or fall into ranks at vespers.

"We are not yet ready to try the vehicles of Rio de Janeiro; so we dismiss our would-be coachmen, and look around us in the Largo do Paço. At the Palace Square the stranger finds himself surrounded by a throng as diverse in habits and appearance, and as variegated in complexion and costume, as his fancy ever pictured. The majority of the crowd are Africans, who collect around the fountain to obtain water, which flows from a score of pipes, and, when caught in tubs or barrels, is borne off upon the heads of both males and females. The slaves go barefooted, but some of them are gayly dressed. Their sociability when congregated in these resorts is usually extreme, but sometimes it ends in differences and blows. To prevent disorders of this kind, soldiers are generally stationed near the fountains, who are pretty sure to maintain their authority over the unresisting blacks. Formerly there were only a few principal fountains; now there are large chafariz in all the squares, and at the corners of every third or fourth street are smaller streams of the pure element, which flow at the turning of a stop-cock.

"The palace is a large stone building, exhibiting the old Portuguese style of architecture. It was long used as a residence by the viceroys, and for a time by Dom John VI., but is now appropriated to various public offices, and contains a suite of rooms in which court is held on gala-days. The buildings at the rear of the Palace Square (represented on the left of the engraving) were all erected for ecclesiastical purposes. The oldest was a Franciscan convent, but has long since been connected with the palace, and used for secular purposes. The old chapel, with its short, thick tower, remains, but has been superseded, in popularity as well as in splendor, by the more recently-erected imperial chapel, which, without belfry, stands at its right. Adjoining the imperial chapel is that of the third order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, which is daily open, and is used as a cathedral. The steeples of this church during certain festivals are illuminated to the very crosses, and present a splendid appearance from the shipping.

"The streets of the city are generally quite narrow; but the Rua Direita, which is seen in the engraving, beyond the Largo do Paço, is wide, and well paved with small square blocks of stone which are brought from the Isle of Wight. The Rua Direita and many of the principal streets of Rio de Janeiro are now as well paved as the finest thoroughfares of London or Vienna, presenting a great contrast to the former irregular and miserable pavement, which was in use up to 1854. The Rua Direita and the Largo do Rocio are the points whence omnibuses start for every portion of the vast city and its suburbs.

"The houses seldom exceed three or four stories; but a four-story house at Rio is equal in height to one of five in New York. Formerly nearly all were occupied as dwellings, and even in the streets devoted to business the first floors only were appropriated to the storage and display of goods, while families resided above. But since 1850, this has greatly changed in the quarter where the wholesale houses are found; proprietors and clerks now reside in the picturesque suburbs of Botafogo, Engenho Velho, and across the bay at Praia Grande or San Domingo. Every evening presents an animated spectacle of crowded steamers, full omnibuses, and galloping horses and mules, all conveying the negociantes and careiros (bookkeepers) to their respective residences.

"The distant steeples on our left are those of the Church of Candelaria, which is situated on a narrow street back from the Rua Direita. It is the largest church in the city, and presents taller spires and a handsomer front than any other. The Praca do Commercio, or Exchange, occupies a prominent position in the Rua Direita. This building, formerly a part of the custom-house, was ceded by government for its present purposes in 1834. It contains a reading-room, supplied with Brazilian and foreign newspapers, and is subject to the usual regulations of such an establishment in other cities. Beneath its spacious portico, the merchants of eight or nine different nations meet each other in the morning to interchange salutations and to negotiate their general business. The Exchange is not far from the Custom-House, which formerly had its main entrance adjoining the Praca.

"Nothing can be more animated and peculiar than the scenes which are witnessed in this part of the Rua Direita during the business hours of the day,—viz., from nine A. M. to three P. M. It is in these hours only that vessels are permitted to discharge and receive their cargoes, and at the same time all goods and baggage must be despatched at the custom-house and removed therefrom. Consequent upon such arrangements, the utmost activity is required to remove the goods despatched, and to embark those productions of the country that are daily required in the transactions of a vast commercial emporium, and we are almost stunned by the sounds of the multitude."

The British cemetery at Gamboa, depicted in one of our engravings, is a beautiful and secluded spot. Men of eminent station, as well as the unknown English and American citizen, the Frenchman, the Swede, and the representatives of the commercial marine of almost every nation, here repose in death.

The fort of Villegagnon, and the island, derive their name from a Frenchman, patronized by Admiral de Coligny, who rendered himself infamous by defeating the projects of the French Huguenots to establish a Protestant colony in Portugal, after having received their fullest confidence.

The picture of a Brazilian mountain road gives the reader a good idea of the wild and romantic aspect of many portions of the empire. But the most curious spectacle is that presented by the profile of the Organ Mountains, as shown in another engraving.

The range from which they are detached is still more lofty, and is most massive in its character. Few persons have ascended these mountains, and those have either been naturalists, or daring hunters. Dr. Gardner made probably the most thorough scientific exploration, and up these heights Heath has often pursued the clumsy tapir or the lithe jaguar. The sloth, howling monkeys, the Brazilian otter, a little deer (Cervus nemorivagus), and two kinds of peccari, may still prove attractions to the naturalist and the sportsman; but every year they are becoming more rare. Of Another of our engravings represents a "Fabrica," or cotton factory, erected by an American, in the lovely valley of St. Alexio. Mr. M., the proprietor, lives in a beautiful house hard by. The spot was chosen for the water-power, but it is described as being one of the loveliest in Brazil. The hills rise around, and, mixed with stately palms, sensitive plants, with us the most delicate of exotics, here grow to an enormous size.

The engraving of the "Misericordia" is from a daguerreotype. It is the most extensive hospital in Rio, and is called the Santa Casa de Misericordia, or the Holy House of Mercy. It is located on the seashore, under the brow of the Castello Hill, and is open day and night for the reception of the sick and distressed of all nations and religions, none of whom require pass or recommendation to be received.

birds there are many varieties, remarkable for their brilliant plumage, and a few are much sought after for their delicacy, the jacu and jacutinga being the most esteemed.

The difficulties of the ascension of these mountains consist of the thickets of underwood, the serried ranks of great ferns and trailing bamboos, in addition to the steepness of the Serra. The paths of the tapir, however, render the undertaking much more feasible than it otherwise would be. Dr. Gardner, after two attempts—the latter made several years after the first—attained the highest summit of the range. These mountains—known in geographies as a portion of the Brazilian Andes, the Serra do Mar and the Organ Mountains—have been variously estimated to possess an altitude ranging from five thousand seven hundred feet up to eight thousand feet.

The new buildings of the Misericordia are upon a grand scale, and the view of it to those entering the harbor is, architecturally considered, truly magnificent. It is constructed of stone, and is six hundred feet in length. There is only the half of the immense structure presented to the eye as we look at the sketch; and the reader will be astonished at the size of this noble beneficiary edifice when he is informed that it is a double building, and that its twin brother is in the rear of it; but it is so connected as to form several airy quadrangular courts. With its modern improvements, insuring superior ventilation, light and cleanliness—with its flower-gardens and shrubberies for the recreation and exercise of the convalescent—with its cool fountains, its spacious apartments, kind attendants, and beautiful situation—this hospital is, as has been well said, "a credit to the civilization of the age, and a splendid monument of the munificence and benevolence of the Brotherhood of Mercy."

The annual expenses of the Misericórdia are about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. A small portion of its receipts are provided for by certain tributes at the custom-house, another portion by lotteries, and the balance by donations and the rent of properties which belong to the institution through purchase and legacies. The Foundling-Hospital and Recolhimento have been in existence about a hundred years. The original establishment of the Misericórdia dates back as far as 1582, and took place under the auspices of that distinguished Jesuit, José de Anchieta. About that time there arrived in the port a Spanish armada, consisting of sixteen vessels-of-war, and fifty years, have found an asylum within the walls of the Misericórdia of Rio de Janeiro—how many thousands a grave! Anchieta was among the first Jesuits sent out to the New World, and his name fills a large space in the history of that order. His earlier labors were devoted to the Indians of S. Paulo, and along that coast, where he endured great privations and exerted a powerful influence; but he finally returned to Rio de Janeiro, where he ended his days.

In our engraving of the Misericórdia, the hospital extends along the water; on the extreme left is St. Luzia's Chapel; about the centre, on the height, is the Jesuits' College, and away to the right the Morro do Castello and the arsenal.

and having on board three thousand Spaniards, bound to the Straits of Magellan. During the voyage very severe storms had been experienced, in which the vessels had suffered greatly, and sickness had extensively broken out on board. Anchieta was at the time on a visit to the college of his order, which had been founded some years previously, and whose towers still surmount the Castello Hill. Moved by compassion for the suffering Spaniards, he made arrangements for their succor, and in so doing laid the foundation of an institution which has continued to the present day enlarging its charities and increasing its means of alleviating human suffering.

It is impossible to contemplate the results of such an act of philanthropy without a feeling of respect towards its author. How many tens of thousands, during the lapse of more two hundred

Among the government institutions must be classed the National Museum, on the Campo de Santa Anna, which is gratuitously thrown open to visitors; and great numbers avail themselves of this pleasant and instructive resort. The collection of minerals has been much augmented in value by a donation from the heirs of José Bonifácio de Andrada. They presented to the Museum the entire cabinet of their father, who in his long public career had rare opportunities for making a most valuable collection. At an early period of his life he was professor of mineralogy in the University of Coimbra, Portugal, where he published several works that gained him a reputation among the scientific men of Europe. Through his whole life he had been industrious in gathering together models of machines and mechanical improvements, together with choice engravings and coins; and his heirs certainly could not have made a more magnanimous disposal of the whole than to confer them upon the nation. The department of mineralogy is well arranged, but contains many more foreign than native specimens. The same lack of Brazilian curiosities formerly prevailed in other departments, although in that of aboriginal relics there has been from the establishment of the Museum a rich collection of ornaments and feather-dresses from Para and Matto Grosso. There is a constant enlargement and improvement in every respect. Still, it may be said that while the cabinets of Munich and Vienna, Paris, St. Petersburg, London and Edinburgh have been enriched by splendid collections from Brazil, in various departments of natural history, yet in the Imperial Museum of Rio de Janeiro but a meagre idea my where instruction in instrumental and vocal music is given to both sexes by competent professors. There is also a Conservatorio Dramatico, to whose censorship were submitted, in 1854, two hundred and fifty plays, of which one hundred and seventy were approved, fifty-four were amended or suppressed, and thirty-three were of such a character as not only to be suppressed but to merit unqualified rebuke.

The Sociedade Statistica and Sociedade Auxiliadora da Industria both enroll many public-spirited men and good writers. But the association which in its character, dignity and numbers is the first in all South America, is the Brazilian Historical and Geographical Institute, organized at Rio de Janeiro in 1838, which has done more than any other society to awaken the spirit of Brazilian literary enterprise. This as-can be formed of the interesting productions—mineral, vegetable and animal—in which the empire abounds.

There is an Imperial Academy of the Fine Arts, which was founded in 1824, by a decree of the National Assembly. It is at present organized with a director and four professors—viz., of painting and landscape, of architecture, of sculpture and of design, and a corresponding number of substitutes. This institution is open to all who wish to be instructed in either department, and about seventy students are annually matriculated—the greater proportion in the department of design. This academy also provides funds for the support of a certain number of its most meritorious alumni at Rome, where they have ample opportunity for studying the choice productions of ancient and modern art.

sociation adopted as its fundamental plan the design of collecting, arranging and publishing or preserving documents illustrative of the history and geography of Brazil. Several distinguished persons took a deep interest in it from the first. The government also lent a fostering hand. The General Assembly voted an annual subsidy in aid of its objects, and the department of foreign affairs instructed the attachés of the Brazilian embassies in Europe to procure and to copy papers of interest that exist in the archives of the different courts, relative to the early history of Brazil. By this movement individual exertions were aroused, and the spirit of inquiry was excited in different parts of the empire as well as abroad, and interesting results have already been accomplished.

During the first year of its existence, this Institute numbered near four hundred members and correspondents, and had collected over three hundred manuscripts, of various length and value. The most important of these it has already given to the world, together with some valuable discourses and essays furnished by its members. The first Friday of each month is devoted to the sittings of this association; and none of its members and patrons are so punctual or take so deep an interest in all its proceedings as Dom Pedro II. Its organ is a Quarterly Review and Journal, which publishes the proceedings of the society at length, together with all the more important documents read before it. We have been particularly interested in the articles it has contained upon the aboriginal tribes of South America, and also its biographical sketches of distinguished Brazilians. On the whole, it may be questioned whether the Portuthat her language is the Portuguese. A prejudice against that language prevails extensively among foreign nations; and although that prejudice is in a great degree unjust, it will not soon be overcome. The learned have seldom been induced to acquire that knowledge of the language which is essential to an appreciation of its real merits. Those who have formed its acquaintance accord to it high praises. Mr. Southey, for example, has declared it to be 'inferior to no modern speech,' and to contain 'some of the most original and admirable works that he had ever perused.' Schlegel, in his 'History of Literature,' bears the very highest testimony to the beauty and copiousness of the Portuguese language, and cannot restrain his admiration for De Camoes. Of the Lusiad, a distinguished French writer has said, 'It is the first epic of modern times.' M.

gueuse language contains a more valuable collection of miscellany than is thrown together in the pages of the Revista Trimensal on Jornal do Instituto Historico Brasileiro.

The closing thoughts of our authors respecting the literature of the Brazilian empire are interesting; they say:—"The history of Brazilian literature is brief; yet, under the circumstances in which it has sprung up, that literature must be considered creditable. Of all that has been written in the Portuguese language within the last hundred years, Brazil has produced her full proportion of what is meritorious. Within the last few years there has been a decided and promising movement at the capital in behalf of literature and the diffusion of useful knowledge.

"It may perhaps be considered by some as a misfortune, in a literary point of view, to Brazil, de Sismondi says, 'The distinguished men whom Portugal has produced have given to their country every branch of literature. 'The Portuguese language,' says M. Sané, 'is beautiful, sonorous, and copious; it is free from that gutturalness with which we reproach the Spanish; it has the sweetness of the Italian and the gravity of the Latin.' In fine, it may be remarked that no living language, not excepting the Spanish and Italian, is so near in every respect the tongue of old imperial Rome as that of Lusitania. If the Brazilians, possessing such a language, shall develop the genius and the application necessary to such a result, they may yet, by creating a literature worthy of themselves, secure the respect and admiration of the world.

"Notwithstanding so little is known of the Portuguese language to certain classes of the literati, it prevails wherever there are or have been settlements of that nation, not only in Brazil and the Portuguese Islands, but along the coasts of Africa and India, from Guinea to the Cape of Good Hope and from the Cape of Good Hope to the Sea of China, extending over almost all the islands of the Malayan Archipelago.

"How interesting it would be to witness light and truth radiating from Brazil and spreading their influences to each of those distant climes! Before such an event can be reasonably anticipated, how great must be the changes in the moral and religious condition of the empire!"

In the February number of the North British Review, and also in the London Eclectic Review we find long and highly appreciative articles on Messrs. Fletcher and Kidder's "Brazil and the formation on all these topics, and on many others, we refer to the admirable book now noticed. A book, notwithstanding its occasional idolatry of Brother Jonathan, we may heartily commend to our readers."

The London Eclectic is, if anything, still more eulogistic of "Brazil and the Brazilians." It says that "a perusal of the present volume will do away with many erroneous impressions in regard to Brazil, and will give a new and more interesting aspect to the whole country. Its people, their institutions, their laws and constitutions, their manners and habits, state of religion, education and the fine arts, agriculture, manufactures, trade, commerce—all find a place in Mr. Fletcher's book, and are handled in an intelligent and lucid manner." In closing its ar-

Brazilians." The North British speaks of it in terms which must be greatly flattering to the authors when it characterizes the book as a peculiarly interesting volume; and again, "This faithful portraiture of Brazil and the Brazilians will not fail to be influential. New channels will be opened up for the streams of British and North American enterprise; and the sympathies of the Anglo-Saxon race will cluster around this people and their justly esteemed great prince." The same Review says, "To as many of our readers as have a taste for description of forest scenery, we can promise gratification in abundance, if they will follow, in the volume, Mr. Fletcher into the blooming woods of the Organ Mountains." Its closing remark is certainly a commendation of high order towards an American book. "But the half is not told. Those who wish more in-

ticle, this Review says, "We must here take our leave of this interesting volume of Messrs. Kidder and Fletcher. Interesting is not the only word we should use; the large insight it gives us into Brazilian life, in all its branches, deserves a more emphatic word; it is highly instructing and fascinating. We have been obliged to pause for want of space; but could we have spared a few more pages, nothing would have afforded us greater satisfaction than to have accompanied Mr. Fletcher in his journey, south and north, and into the interior, and to have culled some of his pleasant—Dulce est olim acti meminisse laboris—adventures and experiences, as well as his studies in natural history, for the benefit of our readers." The day has gone by, when it was said in a leading English Quarterly, "Who reads an American book?"

A BEAUTIFUL SONNET.

BY JOHN M. BAXLEY.

Here's a beautiful world and a beautiful sky;
 There's a beautiful house, but rather too high,
 And a beautiful lady, with Grecian nose,
 Going into the house with beautiful clothes;
 She has beautiful eyes, and Chinese model feet,
 And beautiful lips which look temptingly sweet,
 And a love of a bonnet:
 There! she's gone in—what a beautiful hall!
 And a beautiful parlor—she's making a call;
 There! she sits at the window in stately repose;
 What beautiful hands! her gloves "couleur de rose,"
 O she's beautiful now, but more so when feeding;
 Hush up now! be still! don't you see she is reading
 This beautiful sonnet.

DR. PETTINGILL'S TREASURE.

BY MRS. H. MARION STEPHENS.

ONE thousand eight hundred and ever so much, and New Year's morning at that! The bells are ringing, and the sleighs are flying, and glad, gay voices fill the air; while over all, the golden sunshine streams an uninterrupted brightness, as if old Sol was determined to celebrate a "happy New Year" on his own account.

In an office not more than a thousand miles from Tremont Street, over a glowing fire of Cannel coal, sits our good Dr. Pettingill, the noble philanthropist, whose good deeds have long ago been registered as "home words" in the hearts of all who respect nobility of soul and generosity of spirit. You can see that his heart rejoices in the merriment so prominent about him, although he is no active participant of the festivity.

He is a bachelor—is our good Dr. Pettingill—a bachelor of forty and odd years. You wouldn't believe it, though, to see him—such a hale, hearty, noble-looking fellow as he is, and such a favorite with the ladies! His head is whitening, to be sure, but his heart is as warm and true as if those ominous words, "it might have been," had never been engraved there. Heaven respect his secret, if secret there is!

He is one of those genial, social, hearty kind of men that we invariably think are, or ought to be, married. He would have made a home so happy, a wife so comfortable, little children so lovable, in his great love! Fortune makes some grand mistakes in matching and mismatching the human race, but never made she a greater one than when Dr. Pettingill was left beyond the pale of matrimony. He might have been thinking of this—possibly he was—sitting there alone, over his comfortable fire, while everybody else were whirling away out of town, or off to some dearly loved home, in cosy couples.

A little tap, scarcely louder than the whizzing of a fly, sounded upon his door, and a little form, meanly and scantily clad, responded to his hearty "come in." Such a thin, wistful, little old face—such a picture of squalid wretchedness and want—such a compassion-moving, compassion-compelling object of abject misery as it was, that looked up into the doctor's face, as he sat there, over the radiant blaze of his Cannel coal fire! There was hunger in the great blue eyes, there was the pitiful wailing of poverty in the thin, cracked voice, there was patient endurance and hopeless, helpless misery in every lineament of that wo-worn, cadaverous face—and yet its possessor was a little child scarcely big enough to be entrusted alone upon the street, much less to be out upon such an errand of poverty and destitution.

"A penny—only a penny!" pleaded the piping little voice, while its owner stood shivering at the door.

Only a penny! The good doctor was beginning to wonder how everybody that needed assistance should know enough to run at once with their cares to him. Already he had received ten or twelve such visitors that morning, and he was beginning to think it about time that some one else took a hand at the game. He knew how many there were to suffer, how few to relieve, still it was a wonder to him how all the poor people in Boston found him out. Good Dr. Pettingill! He had forgotten that his own kindly deeds had made his name a household word among those wretched beings whose wants he had so often supplied; he had forgotten that no suppliant for his bounty had ever been turned empty-handed away; he had forgotten that the poor and the helpless were the only family who had demands upon his generous spirit; he had forgotten himself, almost, when the wailing, woful plaint again shattered the bright fabric of his dreams with "only a penny—just one, for the love of heaven!"

"Only a penny!" replied the good doctor; "only a penny! Why, do you think I am made of pennies, child? How many pennies do you suppose I have been asked for, this morning, already? You want a New Year's gift, I suppose; a stick of candy, or something of that sort. A penny wouldn't go far for anything else."

The doctor spoke and meant pleasantly; if there was a dash of fun about him, it was his way, and not intended by any means to wound the most sensitive temperament. Judge of his astonishment, then, when seeing his little visitor wiping tears—real tears—from her eyes, with the bottom of her dress, as she turned to depart! She was out of the door, and going down the steps, before he could sufficiently command himself to check her.

"Here—hold on! Where are you going? Who told you to go? Here you—you—girl!" he vociferated, at the top of his voice.

But the girl did not pause. She walked quietly down the steps, and up the street, neither looking to the right or the left.

"Hold on, I say!" shouted the doctor, seizing his overcoat and hat, and slipping hastily into them. "What the old boy—I didn't say anything, I'm sure; and if I did, I didn't mean anything. Confound—" And the doctor hurried after his little visitor as fast as his rather stout legs could carry him.

He walked fast, but she walked faster; and while she was leading him this chase, he had time to observe the stately step, the regal turn of the head, and the evident gracefulness of manner indulged in by the little beggar girl. Her dress, though poor and thin, was scrupulously neat; her hair, which fell down below her hood, hung in smooth, glossy curls; and her whole appearance indicated pride in the midst of poverty.

On and on she went, and on and on went the doctor, following her, sometimes reflecting sorrowfully upon the unthinking words which had fallen carelessly from his lips, sometimes laughing to himself at the odd figure he must cut, in full chase after a beggar girl!

On and on they went, through streets which it was worth as much as a man's life to cross. She could duck under the trucks and drays, while he was obliged to watch his time to cross the thronged thoroughfare. Once or twice he lost her, but soon discovered her again, when coming upon another street.

On and on they went, through dark lanes and filthy alleys out into sunlit streets, and again into alleys which seemed the more dismal for the contrast. In one of those dark alleys, he missed her. In vain he walked backward and forward, scrutinizing old tumble-down door-ways and peeping into dilapidated entries filled with that peculiar blessing of an Irishman's home—children and pigs. She was not to be found. She must have darted into some one of those miserable domicils, but which, he was at a loss to conjecture.

There was no clew by which to find her; he could remember her dress, only that it was very neat; and as to the sleek golden curls, why any child might have boasted that adornment. With as much vexation in his heart as it was possible for Dr. Pettingill to feel, he at length gave it up for a bad job—not, however, with the best of humors towards himself. To add to his grievances, when he emerged from the dark lane, he found the sky had clouded up, and that already the little fluffs of snow, premonitory symptoms of a storm, were filling the atmosphere with moisture.

"Like my fate!" he murmured. "One moment so bright, the next so dark."

The thought had hardly escaped his lips when for a brief, bright moment the sun parted the clouds and lay goldenly in his pathway.

"A good omen!" he murmured; and folding his cloak more closely around him, he hurried back to his office.

It was past three o'clock, and his dinner hour was at two.

"Patience will scold, any how," he thought; "and it is hardly worth while to go home now. I'll feel a keener appetite for my supper." And divesting himself of his traps, he sat down at his desk and commenced writing.

The soft, sifting snow had given place to a real blustering storm. The sky was full of tempest, and the air of sleet. It was getting quite dusk when Dr. Pettingill rose from his desk and looked out upon the world of storm. The snow had been falling steadily all the afternoon, and now lay piled up in great heaps under the doors and windows, sifting in through all the crevices, and occasionally coming down in a soft, misty shower upon the head of the doctor, as he leaned it listlessly against the window-pane.

He knew there was a nice, warm fire awaiting him, a few squares away, a cosy arm-chair, and a good, substantial supper. But—there was no loving wife there to meet him with words of welcome, after the long, lone day; no little children to climb upon his knee and tangle their chubby fingers in his curling gray hair; no home loves, or home endearments, to tempt him out upon the drifted streets. He was thinking of these things, of the home, and of the storm and the tempest laying between him and it; and thinking, too, of the inducement that might have been, before which the most blustering storm that ever was recorded would have paled in significance. Why, amid the comforts of his own home, did the wan, worn face and the bright, glittering curls of his morning visitor gleam up so palpably? Did his conscience accuse him? Did he feel that he might have treated the little girl more delicately than he had done? Heaving a deep sigh, he turned away for his overcoat.

"I may as well make a beginning," he muttered, as he folded it around him.

He looked out upon the streets. Yet early as it was, they were nearly deserted. Here and there a houseless wanderer picked his slow steps along, or a fast young man bound to have his "time" out, bravely breasted both wind and storm. The doctor barred his office-window and was beginning to secure the door, when his keen eye detected the figure of a little girl toiling on slowly and painfully, as if every step would be her last. The wind whirling against her, blew her feeble steps backward, and the snow piled up higher and higher about her feet; yet she tottered on.

"If it should be!" exclaimed Dr. Pettingill, whose heart was touched by the sight. "O, if it should be! A delicate child, like her, out in this pitiless storm!"

Suddenly a cry was borne along the breeze—a wild, wailing, human cry, rising high above the storm—and the little wanderer fell senseless to the pavement. The doctor sprang forward, lifting in his arms the light weight, and looking in the face white as the snow which was falling upon it. Yes, it was his morning visitor! it was the girl with the golden curls!

Hurriedly he carried her to the warmth—the snow tumbling in at the door after him—and making a bed by his fire, commenced chafing the little hands and frozen feet. His efforts were successful in so far that the girl opened her eyes and looked about her with a frightened stare.

"I thought I was home," she said, in a faint whisper. "Where did you find me?"

And the little lip began to quiver, as she saw the face she thought so heartless in the morning.

"O, take me home—do take me home! What will papa think? What will he do without me? Poor, poor papa!"

A great gush of tears relieved her, and rising, more like a little woman than the girl she was, she proceeded once more to arrange her worn and faded cloak.

"And who is your papa, little dear?" inquired the kind doctor, now really anxious to make amends for the thoughtlessness of the morning. "Why did you leave me so suddenly, this morning? What made you run away from me? Did I say anything to annoy you?"

"O, no—O, no! only I thought—I thought—"

Again the quivering lip denied her the power of speech.

"Papa sent me," she said at last, mastering her tears. "We all know you; that was why I came. Be sure it was our last chance, or papa—"

Again the quivering lip denied her utterance.

"And who is your papa, dear?" asked the doctor, pressing her tiny hand in his. "And why does he allow you to be out in the street on a night like this?"

"O, don't blame him! Poor papa! you don't know him. I crept out by myself, when he was asleep; I do it often. He would die, else, and I should be left an orphan. It is a very dreadful thing to be an orphan, with nobody to love you, or care for you, or—"

The brave little girl swallowed the great sob which was swelling up from her heart, and catching his hand, he allowed her to lead him out into the storm and night.

"You will go home with me! Perhaps you can do something to help papa, you are so clever!"

The doctor smiled at the innocence of the compliment, and drawing her within the shelter of his cloak, trotted silently along until they arrived at a long, dark lane, leading from one of the principal thoroughfares.

The street was lonely, the lane was lonely, and the dilapidated house looked more lonely than all, in its snowy covering. The doctor could not help observing the scrupulous neatness of the room into which he was led, on their entrance. An old Irish woman was waiting anxiously at the door, when the party arrived.

"He's after wakin' and worryin' this half hour for you, darlint," she whispered, as they passed her in the passage.

The little girl only waited long enough to give the doctor a seat before hurrying to the curtained bed just visible in another room. After a few moments' conversation, she beckoned the doctor to approach, and whispering in his ear "papa wants to see you," ran hastily out of the room.

There was a start, a sudden flushing of the sick man's face, and hands were clasped which had been clasped before under happier auspices.

"You here? You? And in this destitution? Why have you not sent for me?" asked Dr. Pettingill, in utter astonishment. "And that sweet child! such a place for her to be in! Great Heaven! what changes there are in this world."

Richard Hollis's thin hand still lay in the warm clasp of the kind-hearted physician, and his sunken eyes rested sorrowfully upon his face.

"We parted in anger you know, James; we parted in anger. You gave me good counsel, and I gave you hard words. If I had taken your advice, I should not have been here. Everything seems to have gone wrong with me."

I started in business without any capital. Of course I failed ! Then my poor Mary died, and then I—I—took to drink, James. I neglected my business, neglected my child, neglected all I should have attended to, and then, perhaps fortunately, I was taken ill."

"O, Richard ! But why didn't you get employment with some kindly disposed person ? Surely you had friends !"

"Friends !"

O, the world of bitterness in that one brief word—"friends."

"Who would take me ? Who would dare trust the dissipated merchant, broken by his own criminal folly ? I might, perhaps, have got something to do, at first, but I was too proud ; then, when I would, O, so willingly, have accepted the poorest situation which would have kept the wolf from my fold, I could get nothing—not even sympathy."

"But surely your wife's relatives might—"

"Not if I was starving !" exclaimed the sick man, starting up in the bed ; "not if every hair on my head could be coined into so many lives, each one a misery, which a word from them could avert ! not if Lula, my poor motherless girl, was dying, and a look from them would save her life !"

Dr. Pettingill drew back, startled and astonished at such a picture of insane rage ; and well he might, for the lurid eyes and the distorted face might have terrified a more determined man than himself.

It was the last fit of frenzy ever allowed the sick man in this world. Exhausted with its force, he fell over on to the bed and lay speechless and motionless for more than half an hour. And now the strong points of Lula's character were brought out in a most forcible way. Her father was dying ; it was impossible to hide from her the truth. There was no loud and vehement crying, as might have been expected from a child like her. For a few moments she indulged in a quiet, heart-broken weeping, pitiful to see ; then, wiping away the tears, she called in the old Irish woman before alluded to, and climbing upon the bed, sat tearless and silent by the side of her father.

I will not describe the long, long watch of that hapless night ; suffice it that Dr. Pettingill sat by his old friend till his earth-sealed eyes were opened upon that "to-morrow" which, sooner or later, must come to us all, and that when he next sought his own domicile, he led by the hand the little waif which the strong wind of adversity had flung across his path.

A very queer household was that of Dr. Pet-tingill ; not very elegant, nor very showy, nor very anything, but substantial and homelike. His house was superintended by the widow of his only brother, who, together with a nephew of some fifteen years of age, were all the members of his family. A very hard, exacting woman, was Mrs. Pettingill, who, although only a sister-in-law, ruled the doctor with a rod of iron. Her will was the law of the household, against which there was no appeal ; and although occasionally the doctor had endeavored to take the reins into his own hands, she was sure to re-possess them again.

Her thin face grew darker and more portentous than ever, when the doctor entered her presence with his new charge. He explained the circumstances as well as he could, under the fire of her piercing eye—she never attempting to interrupt him. Back and forth, back and forth went the rockers of her chair, sending out a malicious creak with each turn, as an accompaniment to the clouded brow and the compressed lip of its occupant.

"Have you done ?" she condescended to ask, as the silence began to be oppressive.

"Yes ; I have no more to add than that I expect she will be well dressed, well treated, and most especially cared for, till the novelty of her situation is past ! Now I've done ; what have you to say ?"

"This, Dr. Pettingill : That if you expect me to interest myself in your charge, as you call her, you are mistaken. You needn't expect, because I have been a martyr to your caprices, cared for your interests, and wasted the Best years of my life in your service, that I am to be imposed upon now." And faster went the rockers, and deeper grew the ominous frown. "If she comes, I shall go ; that's positive ! I'll have no beggar's brats growing up over my head, I can tell you—"

"Now, Prudence Pettingill, bite your words short off, where they are ! Let me hear no more of this. You have ruled me and my house for the last ten years, because it did not interfere in my pleasures, and because it seemed to do you good. There is no occasion for argument. The house is mine, the property is mine, and I have a right to use it just as suits my purposes. It does suit my purpose to adopt this little girl, Lula Hollis. The house is large and convenient ; but whenever it becomes too small to suit your convenience, you are at perfect liberty to seek some more expansive quarters. I am sorry you compel me to speak so plainly ; but as I do not wish ever again to have occasion to refer to the circumstance, my own security forces me to it. Come, Lula! I will show you your chamber, and send the servant to assist you. Don't look so terrified! You are among friends; and Mrs. Pettingill was only joking. See! she can hardly keep from laughing now (wicked Dr. Pettingill!), she is so tickled."

Taking Lula by the hand, and casting a roguish glance over his shoulder to his astonished sister-in-law, he left the room.

Tickled! Yes, you could see it in the wonder-stricken face, in the paralyzed form sitting bolt upright where the shock of consternation had struck her. Could it be possible? Could that firm, determined man be the easy, pliable and most yielding Dr. Pettingill? She had lost the whip-hand, that was sure! Struggle as she would, the reins were gone, to a dead certainty! She might storm and rave and make everybody uncomfortable, herself included; but she would be none the less defeated. After the first paroxysm of anger and dismay had passed, like a sensible woman as she afterwards proved herself, she decided to give in with a good grace, believing that to be half the battle.

"I surrender!" she said, with a merry smile, as the doctor peeped in, on his way down town.

"That's right; I shall feel twice as comfortable now about it. She'll be a perfect little blessing to us, see if she don't! And such a change from the dull, characterless life we have led for the past few years! O, I am very thankful she was sent to me for protection! O, you'll see—you'll see. I wouldn't take a gold mine for her."

And that was the way in which Dr. Pettingill first found his treasure.

Such a chattering, and packing of trunks, and confusion of leave-takings, and rattling of carriages, and kissing "good-bys," mingled with occasional tears—April showers, to dissolve in the first sun-burst—as characterized the "breaking up" day of the Mystic Seminary, could be met with nowhere outside of the charmed circle of a young ladies' academy. Pretty arms, wreathing together with willowy grace; bright lips lingering upon bright lips with most tantalizing fondness; promises of eternal fidelity (the school-girl's eternity) given and extorted with as much earnestness as if they were not doomed to be forgotten in the next novelty! O, a rare day of excitement and anticipation is the "breaking up" day of a young ladies' academy!

"Be sure to write every week!" "Don't fail to come and see me!" "Be sure and come back!" "Remember your promise!" and hundreds of like exclamations, blended together in a confusion of sounds.

Apart from the gay throng, two very beautiful girls stood in earnest, excited conversation; the one, tall, grave and stately, with a certain hauteur of manner not calculated to enlist the sympathy of her companions—the other, lithe, willowy, graceful as a fawn, and quite as beautiful to look at. The latter seemed to be in the midst of some earnest argument, to which her companion listened with grave attention.

"You are too proud, Agnes," she whispered, in a low tone. "I can't understand it at all. If our situations were reversed, if it was I that was poor and you rich, I shouldn't hesitate for a moment. And after all, come to the truth of the business, I am no better off than you are. I have nothing of my own. I have only a rich uncle, who loves me dearly, and has no one else to spend his money on. I couldn't make him happier than by taking you home with me to spend the vacation, because it would make me happy. Don't you see?"

"Generous man!"

"Generous? O, yes! and good, good as he is generous! I couldn't begin to tell you how good, and how noble, and how grand he is!"

"And who keeps his house while you are away?"

"O, he has a sister-in-law—Aunt Patience! Pipkin, I call her for a nickname. You'll like her!"

"Of course. I suppose when your uncle dies, you will come in to his fortune?"

"Don't! O, Agnes, how could you say that? You are not yourself, to-day. You are hard and sarcastic and unkind, even to me. There, now! there's uncle's carriage driving into the avenue, and you wont promise me. How do you do, Johnny?" calling out of the window. "Now why wont you go?"

"My mother expects me."

"We'll send for her."

"I'll try and make you a visit during the summer. You know I must work hard with mind and brain. I haven't your privileges."

"Poor Agnes! So lovely as you are, too!"

"Poor Agnes" curled her scornful lip, as if the compliment had been some intended insult. Her companion did not see it, however. The merry group had gathered around her, like so many honey-bees around a rose-bush; while kisses and good-bys followed her, till, jumping into the carriage and framing her glad, fresh, sunny face in the window, she drove out of the avenue and was soon lost to sight.

One of the stateliest mansions in Beacon Street was blazing with light and welcome, when the carriage steps let out into the arms of Dr.

Pettingill the lost lamb of his flock whose absence had taken the sunshine from his heart and his home. There was quite a struggle between the good doctor and his now amiable sister-in-law as to which should shower her with the most kisses.

And could this be Lula Hollis?—this gay, bright, bewitching creature the once sad, pale, miserable child, wandering alone on the snow-covered streets? Could this be the desolate little orphan girl that Dr. Pettingill's charity adopted from the death-bed of her father?—this beautiful creature, in the first blush of maidenhood?—this gay, glad butterfly, basking in the sunshine of such love as few persons know how to bestow? Fortune has strange freaks, but few so wild as this!

Six years had passed over the heads of Dr. Pettingill and his beautiful charge since they were first introduced to the reader—years of pure, genuine happiness to Lula, of prosperity and contentment to Dr. Pettingill. Indeed, the kind doctor seemed to have taken a new lease of the years which had passed over his blameless life. Not a single wrinkle more had been added to his noble face—not a gray hair to his honored head. He was a man for all time, preserving into more than middle age the singleness of heart, the nobleness of nature, and the guileless purity of character which more properly belonged to the softer sex. He might have been a fresh-hearted boy, just beginning the alphabet of human nature, instead of the mature man, with the weight of fifty years upon his head.

His association with his protegee had been of the most pleasing nature. He had brought her up to reverence him, without fearing; to feel for him the love of a dear friend and companion, instead of the dependence or reserve of a protector or guardian.

Aunt Prudence would sometimes reason with her brother upon the lack of rule and discipline over the bright, gay girl; to which he would listen one moment, and the next open his arms to take in his pet, while she related some mischievous prank she had been playing, or tell of some escapade at school which it would not have been quite safe to trust to the ears of a less severe guardian.

But there was a time coming when Lula's step would grow stately, and her face grave, in the presence of her beloved friend. Before the violets had drooped in the summer sunshine, the doctor's private carriage had whirled them all off to the sea-side. Be sure the pride of Lula was not allowed to suffer by comparison with any of the gay outfittings of the display-loving pleasure-seekers which crowded the breezy thoroughfare. Much was the curiosity, and many the surmises among the visitors, when this bright little lady dropped in among them like a fairy, as she was. In vain she was voted plebeian; in vain pronounced vulgar; in vain accused of want of style. There was more attraction to the male portion of the population in that round, rosy face, with its setting of soft moist curls, than in the whole circle of faded, listless, elegant belles who congregated at the sea-shore.

Lula Hollis read all the jealousy and discontent upon the faces of the fair aristocrats, but minded nothing. The more they tried to put her down, the more determined was she to shine. Her society was courted, and even a nod was worth scrambling for among the hungry fortune-hunters—to say nothing of the evident admiration of grave senators and elegant millionaires. Bouquets, bright as her own sweet eyes, and arranged after the most approved rules of poetic inspiration, found most mysterious entrance to her cosy dressing-room. Little notes, redolent with perfume and poetry, were continually pouring in upon the wings of love's messenger, the penny-post. Ardent attachments were swallowed with her tea, and frantic declarations taken in with her buttered toast.

All this was very new and very pleasant to the just emancipated school-girl, and gave to life a rosier tint even than it had previously worn. It was amusement to her to watch the current of artificial life as it floated on at the crowded hotel where she made it her home. The handsomely dressed men and women pleased her, but even her love for excitement and admiration couldn't win one thought away from the homage due to her dear Dr. Pettingill. At length a new meteor arose on the horizon of the fashionable world; a young girl, stately and beautiful as marble, and as purely cold. There was that about her so original, so proudly distant and reserved, as to challenge curiosity to its widest extent. She was tall and superbly formed. Her hair and eyes of the intensest black, her skin white and pure as a lily, save where a faint tint of rose color broke up through the cheeks and left its trace upon the regnant little lip. Various were the comments made upon the dress and bearing of the magnificent stranger. She held herself aloof from all society, took no part in the festivities of the season, and by her very look and attitude seemed to say, "I have nothing in common with you, go your way and leave me to my solitude."

I need not tell you who know the world, that in no way else could she so soon have won over the thoughtless crowd to pity, sympathy and concern for her loneliness. Imagine the surprise of the exclusives who had themselves been repulsed by the haughty stranger, to see the meeting between herself and Lula Hollis; sweet Lula Hollis, her face flushed with exercise, her hair blown into little round rings all over her roguish head, and her cheeks dimpling with excitement and surprise.

"Why, Agnes! how superbly you have grown, I should hardly have known you! And so you are the proud, handsome stranger that has bewitched all my old beaux. But come with me. Uncle is out on the balcony, you must know him."

Lula wreathed the slender waist in her simple girlish fashion, and led her from the room. A strange gleam shot from the stranger's eyes, a singular expression crossed her face—an expression boding no good thought for the little lady by her side, no angelic feeling for the meeting which was to ensue. Before they reached the balcony it was gone, and she stood before Dr. Pettingill and received his congratulations, the same grave, proud, regal woman that had bewildered the crowd by her singularity.

It would take columns to describe the incidents, the manœuvres, the specious plotting and counter-plotting of the next four weeks. The intense pride, the disdainful hauteur, the contemptuous scorn of society depicted in the daily life of Agnes La Rue, was but a mask to cover duplicity and wickedness. She was the only child of a decayed French nobleman, born after her father, poor and proud, came to live in this country. Position, independence, influence, these had been the watchwords of his life. His daughter, schooled to this one purpose, shared to the extreme in this ignoble strife. She was envious of the distinction which accident had bestowed upon her companion, jealous of the position in which she was placed, yet artful and designing enough to keep the purposes of her life hidden in the recesses of her own heart. It was easy to dupe the affectionate girl who, sinless herself, dreamed of no sin in others; easy to impress upon her mind that some secret sorrow was brooding and darkening over her young life; easy to enlist her warm sympathy, her generous, confiding love, and her simple, guileless heart in the misfortunes and woes of her friend; and easy through her, to win over the generous-spirited man, in whom she had so sterling a protector. By degrees the influence acquired over Lula began to extend to Dr. Pettingill. He pitied the strong, proud spirit beating its wings perpetually against the bars of poverty. He rather liked the dignity of character which so kept aloof from common association.

Under these circumstances it was not hard for Agnes to wind her poisoned coils one by one around the unsuspecting man.

She knew her cards and played them carefully. She adapted herself to his moods and peculiarities, deferred to his tastes and opinions, and showed her seeming gratitude for his kind consideration in a deferent, appealing way, singularly pleasing to a man of his years and small experiences.

And Lula? The bloom was sitting from her cheek, and the shadows were coming back again to the soft blue eyes. Her voice was heard no more in merry laughter and gleeful singing, and even the step of Agnes herself could not have fallen graver upon the floor, than did that of poor Lula.

Aunt Prudence looked grave and severe, but made no comment on the progress of affairs. By the aid of half-suppressed sighs, sentences begun and never ended, and the art and tact known only to such wicked, scheming women, Agnes contrived to impress Dr. Pettingill with the idea that Lula was treating her rudely. That was the climax of her perfidies. Poor Lula could not understand the nature of his half-veiled remonstrances; his coldness shocked her in the extreme; attentions which she had been accustomed to receive were withdrawn, or bestowed sparingly; the sweet intimacy which had existed for so many years was broken; the little confidences were repelled; the pleasant, chatty hours she used to spend by his side refused to her; she was, in heart at least, once more the helpless, hopeless, orphan outcast, with no friend on earth but her God! There was Aunt Patience! but what could her influence avail over that of the power now in possession?

And was Dr. Pettingill happy in this singular change? No, there were hours when this dark girl was by his side, weaving her Circe-like spells around his heart, filling his brain with her slumbrous music; hours in which he believed himself thoroughly happy. How could he help believing in her sincerity? Had she not passed through the world careless and cold to other men?" Was she not even now, in the very vortex of life and excitement, shutting herself away from the crowd of men who must have fallen victims to her charms, merely for the pleasure of his society? Dr. Pettingill had his weak point, and this homage was just the thing to feed it; but in spite of his infatuation, he was wary of its indulgence. No word had yet escaped his lips in favor of marriage, yet it was planned that Agnes should accompany him home and remain with his sister for a few months.

The season at Newport had come to a close, the last day had arrived, carriages had been departing from morning till night, each loaded down with the jaded pleasure-seekers, and yet Dr. Pettingill had not ordered his.

The night had closed in dark and dreary, and a thin mist drove inward from the ocean. All the balconies except one were deserted. On that sat Lula Hollis, lonely and silent. It had been a favorite retreat of both hers and the doctor's, and some of the happiest moments of her life had been passed there. O, the change that had darkened her young life since she first sat beneath its vine-covered shade. Lula had made a discovery, that filled her with shame and despair. She loved the dear, old friend of her youth, not with the love of a child, or a sister, but with a love that could have borne to live with him year after year, tending to his comforts, making him happier for her existence, without the wish or thought of any other bond than that of involuntary affection; but a love that would wither her life away if its object took to his bosom any other wife. She was thinking of all these things, when a step which made her heart beat quickly, was heard approaching. What could have sent Dr. Pettingill out there on the balcony sacred to her memory? Perhaps he too did not feel quite so comfortable, or so satisfied with himself, as he might have done. Lula would have avoided him, but that was impossible. Her only way to escape was either past him, or in through a parlor, whose brilliant light was sure to betray the annoying fact that both eyes and nose were redder than such well conducted members of society should be. The doctor saw her at once, and seated himself beside her. Truly the old time had come over him. The grandly beautiful woman who swayed him like a reed, was not by his side with her soft coolings; and now that she was away, he could remember nothing but the loving, lovable little girl who had made so many years of his life a blessing, and who now was pining away in loneliness. He had scarcely taken her hand and seated himself beside her, when the parlor door opened, and from the window near which they sat, a gentleman and lady in earnest conversation was observed to enter.

Lula started, and would have left the balcony, but her companion held her firmly by the arm. Could that woman be Agnes La Rue? That face so full of anguish and determination, of conviction and despair? Yes, Agnes La Rue with her mask off! She might have been dead for the trace of color there was in face or lip. No marble statue was ever whiter. The deadly eyes were distended and glistening, the forehead veined with swollen chords, yet with it all, no tremor was palpable on lip or form. She was speaking earnestly when they entered, and still continued the conversation.

"It cannot be, George," she was saying, "it cannot be! This must be our last meeting. You know I have lived for this. I must have position, station, riches. I was born for it; I have struggled, waited, schemed for it, and now it is in my grasp. I shall triumph at last! I shall look down upon those poor, imbecile wretches, with none of my beauty, and not half of my intellect, who have disdained me in my poverty! I shall ride rough-shod over their heads. I shall reign a queen, where they have shared divided homage! They shall feel my power; the poor, clinging, contemptible crowd! feel what it is to outrage the noble blood of a daughter of France! What is love to the deep triumph of my great revenge?"

"Agnes!"

The voice which spoke the name was full of sorrow and reproach.

"You bewilder me, Agnes. I never thought to discover such reprehensible feelings in your heart. I shall despise you if you forget yourself in this way."

"Not that—not that, George. You are all that I have ever loved; all that kept one green spot in my dry and burning heart. I love you, but—I shall sell myself dearly. I shall go to the altar with a frozen heart, and that dotard, that old man who thinks he possesses the love of a young girl like me will gloat over his bargain. Let him. The day of reckoning will come—"

"It has come!" broke in Dr. Pettingill, in a voice of thunder, as he entered the parlor, almost dragging Lula after him. Had a cannon-ball fallen at the feet of Agnes, she could not have been more astonished. "It has come! You played your cards well—pity you did not keep the run of the game to the end. You thought me a poor, blind, vain, ridiculous old fool, and you were not far out of your reckoning. You entranced me with your arts, blinded me by your devilish machinations, and but for this happy accident would have led me like a lamb to the slaughter."

"Better say like an old goat," broke in Agnes, contemptuously, who now that she knew there was no retracing the lost step, determined to vent the full measure of her spleen on him.

"Yes, old goat, or anything contemptible that you like. You can't think more meanly of me than I do of myself. You can't upbraid me any more than I do myself. You can't feel any more disgusted with me than I do with myself.

You would oblige me if you would heap the bitterest, the most contemptuous of epithets upon me. Call me fool, dotard, old fogey, numskull, anything ridiculous and disgusting."

"You are not worth it."

"O, uncle! O, Agnes! This is worse than all. O, how could you when I believed you loved me so dearly! O, where can I look for truth, if you are false! And to think that it never has been, never, never, never, when I thought you so true. O, Agnes, O, uncle, do, do make it up! You didn't mean it, Agnes, I know you didn't, only you are so proud. Only say you didn't; only say you are sorry. Only say you will never do so again—"

"Go down on my knees to that superannuated old calf, and be a good girl forever after. No I thank you, Lula. You are a very good child, and a very loving child, and I could almost be sorry for your sake, that I am not of the same pattern; but you know it takes all sorts of people to make up a world. I am one of the odd ones."

The pallor upon her face, and the deadly fire in her eye, belied the heartless levity on her lip. Lula looked from one to the other for a moment, in stunned and helpless bewilderment, and then with a short cry, threw herself into her uncle's arms. He drew her to his great heart, great for all his silly folly, and soothed her as he would have done a grieved child.

"Never mind, my pet, it is all for the best. You won't despise your old uncle because a wicked woman turned his brain for a few days. We will go home, my treasure, home; you, and I, and Aunt Patience; we will be happy again, happy as the day is long. We will have the roses back again in no time, and the laughter, and the dimples, and the springing step. O, we will be rarely happy yet, my treasure!"

"Sweet simplicity!" sneered Agnes, still with the deathly pallor on her lip and brow.

"We neither ask nor desire your sympathy. We know you incapable of any such godlike virtue. There is an apple growing in the Indies, fair, beautiful, and gorgeous to the sight; one touch of the hand and it is ashes! You understand the application. Come, Lula."

Lula would have lingered and sought once more to conciliate her old associate, but the frowning brow repelled her. It was long, however, before she forgot that flaming glance, that curling lip, and that expression of ineffable scorn which was on the proud face turned towards her when she left the room. A vision of almost unearthly beauty, voluptuous, exquisite in every outline, but overshadowed by a spirit of wrath and mortification, revenge and madness, which it was terrible to see.

They never met again, and I venture to say no three happier persons ever lived than those occupying the carriage of Dr. Pettingill on the morning following the scene just recorded. Dr. Pettingill, heart whole and rejoicing in his escape, Aunt Prudence thanking Providence that the escapade came before it was too late, and Lula cherishing her own deathless secret, and made happy by her old friends' happiness.

Three years have passed since then, three happy, golden years, and Lula is a wife and a mother. I am not going to inflict you with her courtship, or tell you who is the husband and father. I was in Washington a few weeks ago, and at one of the most brilliant festivals of the season; an elderly man, very stately and elegant in his appearance, escorting a most beautiful woman, was the theme of general conversation. She seemed not like one whose heart was very deeply in the brilliancy of the scene. Intellectual, high-born men paused before her, honored if but to catch a passing word from those bright lips; noble dames brilliant with jewels sought her society and paid her due homage. She received the compliment gracefully and well, but there was a tiny crib covered with lace and bloom, within the sound of that evening's revelry, and the mother's heart yearned to be beside it. At an early hour she bade adieu to her hostess, and with her noble-looking, but rather old husband, sought her own apartments. A rosy, chubby babe, with her curly hair moist from slumber, lay quietly in its elegant crib. One little hand kept fast hold of a doll, its freshest plaything, the other was flung out upon the side of the crib in dimpled carelessness. A shower of soft kisses, a fervent, holy, mother's prayer rose on the wings of faith to heaven, and the graceful woman turned to depart. A pair of strong arms were about her, a great, honest heart beat against her own, and a warm kiss was pressed upon her brow.

"My treasure! my beautiful Lula." It was Dr. Pettingill who spoke. "How can I be thankful enough, grateful enough to God that I escaped that fiend of a woman and married you? It seems like a dream."

Lula placed her hand over his mouth.

"Let us forgive our enemies, and thank a kind Providence that it is no worse. If we had never suffered, we should never so fully have appreciated our present happiness; so you see 'whatever is is right.'"

"Come, come, come," broke in a familiar and agreeable voice, "you'll wake that young one up, sure as fun. If there is anything I do dislike it is to see married people courting all the time."

It was Aunt Patience, a very little older, a vast deal more important (she was head nurse), and to use her own words, "just as happy as the day is long."

Agnes La Rue never reached the goal of her ambition. She lives alone on the little annuity left by her father's relatives, a discontented, querulous, miserable old maid. The young lover, disgusted with her reckless heartlessness, left her, and years after, married a pure and lovely woman, with whom he is said to live as nearly happy as it is possible for human beings to be in this world.

The moral, reader? I have not thought of that myself. Perhaps this, that we cannot sin with impunity, that crime brings its punishment, that virtue, and goodness, and truth, though sometimes overclouded by adversity, come out bright in the end; and so terminates the story of Dr. PETTINGILL'S TREASURE.

THE LATEST MUMMIES.

One circumstance connected with the history of mummies has much puzzled the learned, viz., the latest period at which mummies were prepared in Egypt. Count Caylus thought no mummies were made after the conquest of Egypt by the Romans, which was about the time of Diodorus; but in this he was quite mistaken, for Blumenbach has shown, and St. Augustine informs us, that so low down as his own times, in the early part of the fifth century, mummies were certainly made in Egypt. This being the case, there is no reason why these more recent ones may not have reached us, and the difference in their composition seems thus reasonably accounted for by the great discrepancy in the ages in which they were prepared. Thus some mummies have been found with long beards and hair reaching down below their knees; some have very long nails; some have tutelary idols and figures of jasper put in their bodies; some have a piece of gold placed under the tongue. Wilkinson says he found the mummies of the poorer classes wrapped round with a number of palm sticks and fastened together with string, like a mat.—Topography of Egypt.

TO EXTINGUISH FIRES.

As soon as the fire-engine is ready to work, stir into the water eight pounds of pearlsh, and add the same quantity as often as occasion requires, directing it against the timber, and not against the brickwork. Where time will admit, dissolve any quantity of pearlsh in a vessel of water, and as it dissolves, mix a pailful in the water in the engine pretty often. Wood, steeped in a strong solution of "phosphate of ammonia and borate of soda," becomes incombustible. If trees when cut down, the sap being exhausted, are thus treated, fires will be hardly possible.

NIGHT.

BY W. JOHNSON.

The Night has drawn her curtain round,
The busy world lies hushed in sleep,
The moon, the cold, pale moon hath crowned
The arch of yonder azure deep;
Her pale light shines as bright as when
Youth through each throbbing pulse did flow;
But Time hath chilled the heart since then,
And left his footprints on my brow.

To-night I think—ah, why should thought
Thus tarry in this weary brain?
Why is the past by Memory brought,
And all her scenes revived again?
The scented flowers, the singing brook,
The rose-wreathed cottage standing near;
A mother's smile, a mother's look,
Called by her magic wand, appear.

I live my childhood o'er again,
I roam beneath its cloudless sky,
I join the little household train,
Who now beneath the tomb flowers lie;
A sister's dark eyes thrill my soul,
A brother's laugh rings in my ears:
These feelings fain I would control;
I would, but may not check these tears.

I leave my childhood, and my youth
Rises before my saddened view,
When all of earth, even love, and truth,
And thou, false one, seemed faithful too;
Upbraid thee, no, I chide thee not,
No word of murmuring falls from me,
And yet, this is the darkest spot—
The brightest once on memory.

Night, how I love thy holy calm,
For through thy hours my soul can fly
To those who've won the "blessed palm,"
And dwell beyond the star-lit sky.
I love to think the stars that burn
Upon the dark, clear brow of night,
Are worlds to which our souls return—
Worlds of eternal, endless light.

Night, in thy mercy send me sleep,
Send all thy soothing powers to me;
I would not think, I would not weep—
Away, thou phantom, Memory!
The future, it is left me still;
May its untasted moments be Less dimmed by grief, less seared by ill,
Than is this weary memory.

MY INVALID SISTER.

BY HERBERT LINTON.

My sister Margaret had been a sad sufferer for many years. All that brotherly affection could do to restore her shattered health and spirits, was faithfully and cheerfully done. For the last eighteen months, Margaret had been my only care, for my wife and child had died in one week, leaving me dependent on this truly Christian sister for the sympathy and consolation which her own sorrows taught her so well how to bestow.

We both longed for quiet and repose, for neither could mingle with the gaieties of the city; and Margaret's health imperatively pointed to the country. To the country, therefore, we went; and trusting to a friend for selecting our retirement, we had the good fortune to get settled in a pretty and well-furnished cottage; very small indeed, but abundantly large for the two quiet souls that were trying to find rest. We thought ourselves fortunate, for ours was one of only three in that neighborhood that were well built and habitable. The rest were slightly put together, shabby and ill conditioned, and although wearing a smart look from their glaring white paint, were evidently built "to let."

We liked the sober, brown cottage; and as it had been newly furnished the year before, we had nothing to do but literally to walk in and take possession; and soon felt as much at home as they who had "lost the poetry of life" could be expected to feel. To Margaret, it was my duty, as well as my privilege, to supply the place of all other relatives; and from her I received all the kind offices which the enfeebled state of her health permitted her to bestow upon me.

We did not think of anything in our removal to this place, beyond the change of air to the invalid, and the repose it ensured. We did not intend to make acquaintance with any one. To enable Margaret to drive out securely in her own pony carriage, to obtain for her the fresh, pure milk from her own cow, and the fine freshly-gathered vegetables from her own little garden, were great objects; and these she enjoyed fully.

It was delightful to watch her improvement. She did not regain her youthful appearance, for the roses were gone forever; but she grew stronger and better, from the sense of the delightful freedom which neither of us ever knew before. We had been pent up from childhood within the city, and it had been part of our creed that nothing could be enjoyed elsewhere. How pleasantly we were undeceived! We began to pity people who could not, or did not, seize upon the superior advantages of the country.

It was delightful to me, who had betaken myself to it as a last resort, when the gradual wasting of my beloved sister had made me feel that this last tie at least must be spared to me—Margaret must not die! I was fully repaid, when I went home about sunset, every evening, to find my invalid up, and busying herself about her little household preparations. With our faithful Hannah's help, she had made our little parlor—scarce large enough for a closet—into a perfect bower of roses, as long as they lasted. The yard in front had been freshly turfed, and she had ordered a profusion of rare plants from a greenhouse, and arranged them on the piazza, which, with the clematis and woodbine running thickly over the trellises and pillars, made our place a little paradise of sweets.

Another treasure we had, in the shape of a magnificent chestnut, overshadowing the whole front of the house. The spirit of utilitarianism, when it laid every other tree low, in order to cut up the estate into building lots, had spared this tree. Such a shade—so wonderfully it protected us from the gaze of prying neighbors, or inquisitive passers-by! Margaret was never tired of admiring her tree. It had just begun to show its beautiful clusters of tassel-like blossoms, when we took the house; and this alone would have influenced our own choice, as it did our friend's who selected our abode. Round this tree I had ordered a semi-circular platform to be built, bringing it up to the level of the piazza, and this sheltered her feet from the damp earth at its roots. Here she would have her chair and work basket, or book, through the long summer day, until the time in which she expected me home. Then her delight was to assist Hannah in preparing the delicate supper, which I found always ready for me, and which we frequently took under the branching shadow of the chestnut.

We were very peaceful. Happiness was out of the question—at least, happiness in the most comprehensive meaning of the word. The mourning for the departed had not yet gone from our hearts, although time had softened and mellowed it down to pensive melancholy, as sweet as it was sad.

I returned one evening earlier than was my wont, and found all things awaiting my comfort as usual; but Margaret was weeping over a newspaper in the parlor, away from her accustomed seat. I knew of no intelligence that could affect her in that way. Our relations with the outer world were very limited, and they who claimed relationship with us were already removed by death, or by almost immeasurable distance; and of these last we had lost nearly all traces.

"Margaret," I said, "what is it? What can affect you thus?"

She pointed to a paragraph in the newspaper, and covered her pale face with her hand. I followed the direction of her finger, and read, with an emotion of pain, the death of Albert Thornton, a dearly beloved classmate of my own, and who had once touched and interested the sensitive heart of Margaret. But that was long, long ago; and after many struggles with her affection, Margaret had given him up, from the conviction that her life was so precarious, that she had no right to throw its frail burden on one who was just starting in the battle with the world.

"Greater love can no one have than to die for his friend." I now learned that this feeble child had done a greater deed—she had lived; but what a life! It was like shutting out every ray of sunlight from her heart, when she gave him up. And Albert, with his bright, glad face, beaming all over with health and animation, and giving promise of a long life, had gone down to the grave, and this poor girl, struggling with weakness and pain, was left.

I was frightened, that night, at the intensity of her grief. She was so weak, that I feared that any additional trouble would soon deprive her of reason. Gradually I soothed her, by talking of him, and leading her to relate her renewed connection with him. She told me, that although she had refused to marry him, she had yielded to his earnest wish of corresponding with him, and that she had thus kept up that correspondence through the many years that had separated them. There was lingering hope in his heart that they would yet see brighter days; but in hers, never, until this summer at Compton had so invigorated her in health and spirits. Albert had eagerly noticed this, and in the letter which she had last received, had declared his intention of coming.

"Why did you not tell me?" I asked, almost reproachfully.

"Because I knew that, although you would have disguised your feelings for my sake, you would have dreaded the separation; and besides, I could not have the heart to anticipate any happiness for myself when you were so desolate."

"Dear sister," I exclaimed, struck at her self-sacrificing spirit, "it would have been my highest joy to have seen you Albert Thornton's wife; and as to the separation, I am not so wedded to New England that I could not have followed you elsewhere."

I knew that Margaret often had received letters from New Orleans; but supposed them to be from a lady, whose marriage had compelled her residence there, and who, I supposed, still kept up her correspondence. Once I had even said, when handing her a letter, "How much Mary Raymond's husband writes like Albert Thornton!" It was a passing remark, and she went out of the room to read her letter, and I never thought of it again. In our young days, Margaret had wanted me to love Mary Raymond; and now we rarely spoke of her, because I felt that I had disappointed my sister, in not fancying her favorite.

I did not attempt to console Margaret. I knew too well, from my own experience, how little even the dearest friends can do, except to utter the common-place and stereotyped words of consolation, and how little those words avail to reach the mourner's heart; how coldly come the voices of sympathy while that heart is bleeding inwardly, and how we turn away from all, with the feeling that it "knoweth its own bitterness," and must not be intermeddled with, by even a brother or a sister.

That sorrow has pressed heavily upon other hearts before, does not lighten our own; we do not suffer less because another has also suffered; and, feeling this, I would not bring up to my sister's mind the remembrance of my own desolation.

In a few days, the violence of Margaret's grief subsided; but her former languor had returned. I expected to see her droop and fade away daily before my eyes, and almost dreaded to return home at night, lest I should find her lying upon the bed from which she might never arise. It was altogether a sad episode in our peaceful summer at Compton.

There was one thing which unconsciously cheered me in this hour of trial. Our next door neighbors, the Leightons, contrary to our intention of making acquaintances, had forced themselves upon us, although in a perfectly delicate way. They had noticed my sister's feebleness when we first came, and had watched her through the slight opening in the trees, as she passed from the door to her favorite seat; and they had begun the acquaintance by sending her baskets of delicious foreign fruit, the first of their splendid flowers, and jellies and preserves of every kind.

Margaret could only accept and acknowledge, and the result was an intimacy with Flora Leighton, the only daughter of the family, whose manners completed the attraction which her beauty began; so, at least, thought Margaret. I heard much of Flora Leighton, and had some curiosity to see the being who had so won upon Margaret; but she was always out of sight before I came home, and I never, by any chance, had seen the bright eyes and pleasant smile which my sister had described to me. I called her the invisible; but I saw all her fairy gifts, which Margaret would always leave untouched until I came home, that I might see the perfect elegance of her friend's taste. It was quite a study, the artistic arrangement of those floral offerings; and the fruit which she brought Margaret was always shaded by its appropriate leaf. Our table was always supplied with something from her hand, but the hand itself remained, to me, invisible.

Margaret rose up from that great suffering, sooner than I had hoped or imagined. If she still mourned for Albert, it was in silence; and on her cheek there was no trace of tears when I came home. I was engrossed with the cares of business, through the day; but still found time to think of her, and to rejoice that she had a companion, such as she described Flora Leighton. She had told Flora all, and was startled, and perhaps gladdened by finding that she was the daughter of Mrs. Thornton's sister. Albert Thornton was therefore the playmate of Flora's childhood, and the friend of her older days. She too mourned his death, with the sorrow of a tender heart, that remembers those dear ones with an added love, "when love is joined to death."

It was near the close of summer. People were flocking home to the city in swarms, frightened at the first cool morning breeze; but Margaret begged for a longer stay, and I gladly consented. I wanted to pass the autumn in the country, to watch the golden grain of the harvest, and to feel the inspiration of those days which, despite the melancholy song of our own poet, Bryant, are not "the saddest of the year."

We had learned to love this quiet retreat, and any change struck us unpleasantly. The whole neighborhood around us, too, had assumed a less staring and comfortless appearance. It had mellowed into an older and more subdued look; and others had followed our example, in beautifying and adorning their homes. The house occupied by Mr. Leighton was precisely like our own, and separated only by a slender fence, which the two girls had not long suffered to remain. At least, Margaret told me that it was Flora Leighton's superior strength which had taken down the barrier; but remember, Flora Leighton was still a mere fabulous person to me. I did not believe in her, and tried hard to make Margaret own that she, whose praises had been so long sounding in my ears, had really no existence at all, except in her own brain. Something like a presence, a spirit in human form had appeared to Margaret's vision, and she called it Flora Leighton. I bantered her so much, that she declared that I should not see her.

"I wonder that you cannot make allowances for her sensitiveness, William," she would say.

"Already she has had her feelings wounded by the whispered remarks of others, in regard to her friendship for me; and her delicacy is such, that she would not give any color to such remarks by coming here when you are present."

I did not care to see her. If Margaret was soothed or comforted, or her time lightened by anything like a comforter, I cared not who the comforter was. My sister was my only object of solicitude; and to save her an hour's loneliness or grief, I would sacrifice anything on earth. They only, whose affections are narrowed down to a single object, can appreciate my devotion to my sister. The mother who bore her, could not have been more tenderly careful of her than I was, subduing my stern man's nature to feminine watchfulness, averting from her every shadow of evil, or even of annoyance. And not less deep and strong was her affection for me. "We were but two!" One of our little home band had found a grave beneath the waters; another, a bright, rosy, laughing girl, radiant with life and health, had sunk suddenly beneath acute and sudden fever, and then our father and mother departed to the land of shadows. What wonder if we clung to each other? O, surely, in that land, when love makes up its jewels, brother and sister will not forget their own.

That year, October was brighter than even that bright month usually seems. I used generally to get home sometime during the shortened twilight, and perhaps once or twice a week, I would be able to reach it time enough to enjoy the sight of the gorgeous autumn sunset. One afternoon I came quite early, intending to take Margaret out in the chaise, to witness the glory of the brightening woods.

I came softly into the room, and with Margaret a lady was sitting by the window, reading aloud. Her voice was clear and musical; her intonation perfect. I stepped forward, after listening to the silvery chime for a while, and Margaret introduced me to Miss Leighton.

Very reluctantly she seemed to look up in my face; but she had scarcely acknowledged my awkward bow, before she was gone. I did not see how, nor when she went, but I know that, in the brief glimpse I took of her, I thought her the ugliest woman I ever saw. As I turned round from depositing my hat and coat, there was no one there but Margaret.

"I told you so," I said, gravely.

"Told me what?"

"That your friend was only a creature of your imagination—a shadow, an ignis fatuus—and could never be identified. How otherwise could she have disappeared?"

"Naturally enough, out of the window."

"And this is the woman you have been calling handsome all summer?"

Margaret fairly cried at my badinage, and my contempt for the beauty she had been praising. I could not tell her what particular features I thought ugly, in the brief glimpse I had taken. It was the general impression of the whole face.

"Why, she looks beside you, Margaret, like—like—forgive me—like a tiger lily by the beautiful pale thing which we drag, with its long, slender stem, from the deep ponds where it hides."

"She was Albert Thornton's friend," said Margaret, very softly.

"So she was, and I will never tease you again about her. She shall, henceforth, be as beautiful as you choose to think her. Can I say anything more?"

That night Margaret and I sat up long, watching the lovely October moon—the glorious harvest moon—as she sailed through the magnificent blue arch over head. We talked long of the living and the dead; of those whom distance had separated from us, and of those whose memory was still more sacred, because death had set its seal there.

We talked of Albert Thornton; and then Margaret told me, for the first time, what peace and resignation had come into her heart; how patiently she waited for the hour which should unite them again; and that death had become beautiful instead of terrible to her, because he had passed through its portals.

Then she talked of Albert's cousin, Flora, and told me how earnestly she had hoped, all through the summer, that I should see and become interested in her; that it would have been so pleasant to her to feel that, should she leave me, as she sometimes thought she would be called to do, she should not leave me comfortless. I was touched by her tender care of me, which thus pointed to my welfare, even when she should be beyond the skies.

It might have been ten o'clock, when some one rang at the front door, and asked if that was Mrs. Leighton's house. Hannah directed them, and we heard footsteps on Mrs. Leighton's piazza, then a joyful cry of recognition, and a low hum of conversation succeeding.

We were both silent. I, from a strange curiosity to know who was this stranger; Margaret, because something, as she afterwards told me, struck her as strangely familiar, in the voice that called for Mrs. Leighton. Then came a step to the door of our house, and Flora's voice called us, quickly and impatiently.

"Come in, come in, Miss Leighton," I said, "Margaret must not go to the door in this night air."

She came in, and seemed to hesitate as to what she should say or do. Womanlike, she only burst into tears and sobbing.

Margaret was trembling on my arm, but she did not weep. A voice said:

"Have you told her, Flora? May I come now?"

"It is Albert!" said my sister, in a whisper.

"Hush, Margaret," I answered, "what folly is this? You are mad to think of such a thing."

"It is Albert!" she said, calmly, and very slowly.

He heard the words, and the imprudent fellow, imagining all was explained, rushed forward, and clasped Margaret in his arms. The surprise had well-nigh killed my poor sister; and Flora repented, too late, her indiscretion in not preparing her better. Her sorrow was so real and genuine, that I undertook to console her, much as I disliked her way of communicating the surprise to Margaret.

We were all happier, an hour afterwards, when Margaret was recovered from her temporary fainting, and was sitting with her hand clasped in Albert's, while he recounted the circumstances leading to the mistake that had been made. He had been very ill for many days—apparently dying—and while in the stupor which often precedes death, the report was carried to the newspapers that he was dead. The next day, it was contradicted, but we did not see the contradiction, for our hearts were too heavy for consulting the newspaper.

Margaret's life received a new growth from the happiness that had come to her. She would not renew her objections to marry Albert, because now she felt that it was better to make the most of life while it lasts. She might, perhaps, outlive him, even with her feeble health; and, at any rate, his constancy deserved this reward. The wedding was performed in that little cottage, for so Margaret willed it, and Flora Leighton was her only attendant.

We went back to the city in November, and Flora went with us. Albert had consented to stay in New England, and we made one family. Margaret, still pale, but beautiful from the soft light of happiness that beamed in her countenance, was our stay and dependence in house-keeping; and Flora and myself had leisure to become acquainted. I saw her as she was—noble, affectionate and true. I believed that, while she was unconscious of her own feelings, she really liked me, whom she had so avoided through the summer. I had looked at her on the night of Albert's return, by the softening light of the harvest moon, and thought she was not so ugly after all! And every day afterwards I made some progress in the belief that she was growing pretty. To-night, as she sits here, under the gaslight, I think her the handsomest woman that I ever saw, as I know her to be the best. We are very happy now—I and my wife—for yonder is a cradle which Flora will not have carried out of the drawing-room, although people tell her it is an old-fashioned ornament, and should be banished to a nursery. And in the next room is Margaret's pretty, delicate girl, in a cloud of long, white drapery, sinking to her evening slumbers.

In the spring, we shall take them both to the beloved brown cottage, where our happiness commenced, and where the dead seemed to be restored to life; and under the shadow of the broad chestnut tree, our little Berta and Blanche shall drink in health and beauty, with every breeze that plays with their brown hair; while Margaret and Flora will recall the pensive hours of two years ago, and compare them with the happy ones that are bearing us on to the future.

FAIRY TALES.

If we were required to choose a course of reading for a child, we would develop his imagination through fairy tales, as we would discipline his intellect through logic and mathematics, and his perceptive powers through the natural science. We would stock his library with the magic romances of the Wizard of the North, with Homer, Virgil and Xenophon, with Shakspeare, Irving and Hawthorne, and with fairy tales ad infinitum. It is a hopeful sign of the progress of the times that Hans Christian Andersen and others of that ilk have turned their attention to this kind of writing. The children will appreciate it in youth, by their keen enjoyment, and will repay it in after life by a refined taste and a cultivated imagination. Let no one then, despise the Pixies' ring or the elves' dance on the green sward, or the strange, wild demons of the Hartz mountains, or the enchanted genii that people the luxurious eastern palaces. Let us beware how we anger these good folk, else like Bottom the weaver, we may be furnished with fair, large ears, and a sleek, smooth head, and be left to munch our oats and dried peas, regardless of the honeybags and nuts which Titania proffers us. A word to the wise is sufficient.—Educational Herald.

WHEN I AM DEAD.

When I am dead 'twill be the same,
Though all unloved my earthly name;
The shadows will as darkly creep,
And dreams as fearful haunt my sleep,
Let mortals praise or blame;
And winter winds their revels keep,
And summer skies as sadly weep
Above my grave, if lone I came,
Or laid me down the helr of fame.

BARON HUMBOLDT.

The most remarkable devotee of science now living, and in some respects the most remarkable man of the age, is the illustrious Humboldt. He is now nearly eighty-nine years of age, having been born at Berlin, the capital of Prussia, September 14, 1769. Recent English papers inform us that he is bright and active even at this advanced age, and fully alive to the pleasures of society as well as the interests of science. At a recent ball given by Lord Bloomfield, at Berlin, Humboldt was one of the most distinguished guests, appearing in his court costume as chamberlain to the king, decorated with the numerous orders that have been conferred upon him, and enjoying the life and interest of the occasion, with a zest truly remarkable in one of his great age. Considering the vast amount of travel in unsettled and forbidding regions, which Humboldt has performed, his constant devotion to experimental science, and his immense literary labors, continued with but slight intermission even to the present day, his great mental and bodily vigor at such an advanced age, is a most remarkable phenomenon. It indicates a good constitution, well cared for.

The early education of Humboldt was of that thorough and practical description which the schools of Prussia furnish, and had especial reference to his future employment in the mining bureau of the kingdom. At the age of twenty-three he was appointed assessor of the Board of Mines, and subsequently, director. After three years' devotion to these duties, his active and inquiring mind, well stored with the natural sciences, prompted him to abandon them for a life of more active and congenial pursuits, and incidentally launched him upon that broad field of scientific discovery upon which he gathered such vast stores of intellectual wealth.

After essaying various other projects of foreign travel, he finally entered into the service of the Spanish government, for the scientific exploration of Spanish America, and sailed from Corunna with Bonpland, the French botanist, upon this expedition in June, 1799. On the voyage to South America, he stopped at the Canary Islands, and ascended the Peak of Teneriffe, a height of nearly twelve thousand feet. In the course of a few days' stay at these islands, he thoroughly explored them, and made a number of new and valuable observations upon their natural history.

The voyage across the Atlantic was prosperous, and in July of the same year he landed at Cumana in the Spanish province of Venezuela, on the northern shore of South America. After a thorough exploration of that province he started from Porto Cabello to penetrate the interior of the land, made his way to the Orinoco River, ascended that vast stream by means of canoes, and reached Fort San Carlos on the Negro River, a branch of the great Amazon, and within two degrees of the equator. Having thus penetrated the vast wilderness thousands of miles, he returned again to the northern coast, and sailed from Cumana to the island of Cuba. He spent some months in this valuable Spanish possession, gathering much important information in reference to the history, capacities, and natural phenomena of the island. From Cuba he sailed for Carthagena in New Grenada, on the Caribbean Sea, traversing the country to the city of Bogota, in the centre of New Grenada, thence across the lofty Cordilleras, and up the valley of the Cauca River, into Equador, reaching the city of Quito after almost insurmountable difficulties, in January, 1802. Much time was usefully employed at various places on this route, and at Quito he spent eight months in exploring the lofty mountains which environ that city, ascending several of the highest peaks. On the 23d of June, of this year, he made his famous ascent of Chimborazo, attaining an elevation of 19,300 feet above the sea. He next traversed the high chain of the Andes, and reached the shore of the Pacific at Truxillo, in Peru. Thence he crossed the desert waste of western Peru to the city of Lima. In January, 1803, he sailed from this country to the western coast of Mexico, explored its chief cities, visited the modern volcano of Jorullo, which arose from the plain in 1759; and after a year devoted to Mexico, sailed from Vera Cruz to Havana in January, 1804, thence to Philadelphia, spending two months there, and arriving at Havre in France in August of that year, after an absence from Europe of more than five years.

The results of this gigantic voyage and prolonged residence in Spanish America, were exhibited in a richer collection of objects and important facts in botany, geology, meteorology, zoology, geography and ethnology, than the world had ever before seen. Twelve years of increased labor were devoted by him at Paris to the publication of the most important of these scientific discoveries and observations, constituting a series of voluminous publications, which appeared in parts, costing in the market more than five hundred dollars each. Since 1817, the publication has gone on more slowly, and is not yet complete. Humboldt visited Italy in 1818, with the celebrated Gay-Lussac, subsequently travelled in England in 1826, and in 1829, at the particular request of the Czar of Russia, he visited Siberia and the Caspian Sea with Rose and Ehrenburg. Starting from St. Petersburg, they penetrated through central Asia to the frontier of the Chinese empire, a distance of 3000 miles, returning to that capital by a more southern route. After this Siberian expedition he settled down at Berlin, and has ever since occupied a distinguished position at that court, enjoying the favor and confidence of his sovereign, and honored by the whole civilized world.

To Humboldt is due the merit of founding a new school of scientific inquiry, based upon the relations subsisting between the different portions of the organic kingdom and man. This practical aspect given to the natural sciences has increased their interest an hundred fold, and enlisted thousands as students and observers, who never embark upon any mental speculation unless the why and the wherefore is brought home to their immediate appreciation. Humboldt had the extraordinary combination of faculties which made him at the same time a good observer and a good generalizer, and thus he was enabled to lead the way in the new system as well as point it out. He has a glorious band of followers in Europe and our own land, whose rising fame does as much honor to him as to them; but his own lamp is still the brightest of all, as witness his last comprehensive work, the "Cosmos." The noble compliment recently bestowed by him upon Lieutenant Maury, of our navy, for his valuable work upon the winds and currents of the sea, shows that the venerable philosopher is as prompt to recognize scientific merit, as he is eager to commend it.

LITERARY MEN AND THEIR WIVES.

I do maintain that a wife, says Sara Coleridge, whether young or old, may pass her evenings most happily in the presence of her husband, occupied herself, and conscious that he is still better occupied, though he may but speak with her and cast his eyes upon her from time to time; that such evenings may be looked forward to with great desire, and deeply regretted when they are passed away forever. Wieland, whose conjugal felicity has been almost as celebrated as himself, says in a letter written after his wife's death, that if he but knew she was in the room, or if at times she but stepped in and said a word or two, that was enough to gladden him. Some of the happiest and most loving couples are those who like Wieland and his wife, are both too fully employed to spend the whole of every evening in conversation.—Home Journal.

I WAIT FOR THEE.

BY M. REBECCA OSBORN.

Thy memory comes o'er me
In the lonely midnight hours,
When the soft winds waft round me
The sweet odors of the flowers,
And the leaves are all a-glowing
With tiny drops of dew,
Which glitter among the willows,
Where I used to wait for you.

The murmur, soft and silvery,
Comes floating on my ear,
Of the stream, a-down the meadow,
Where we used to wander, dear.
Here, just beside the pathway,
Where the clump of willows grew,
And the stars looked down so loving,
I used to wait for you.

The hand that gave me welcome,
And the lips that pressed my own,
Are folded in earth's bosom,
And I wander now alone.
But my heart holds in its keeping
The tender words and true,
Thou gavest me at parting—
"In heaven I wait for you."

CHARLIE HOWARD'S CHOICE.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

"GEORGIA or Julia—which shall it be?"

Charlie Howard tossed back the thick, black curls that clustered around his forehead, stroked abstractedly the silky moustache that adorned his upper lip, run his fingers caressingly through his glossy beard, and then as if these actions afforded him but a trifling relief, sprang up from his chair and paced his room impatiently. There was a faint smile parting his finely-curved lips, but the perplexed look that knit his brows and swept like a shadow across his handsome face; the rapid strides that annihilated the distance between the two ends of his apartment, and the nervous folding and unfolding of his arms upon his muscular chest, indicated that a struggle of more than ordinary power was going on in his breast.

The sunshine came through the partially closed blinds, and lay in slender golden stripes upon the carpet; the perfumed breath of a luxurious summer afternoon stole in at the open window, rippling the folds of the soft curtains, and now and then lifting with its invisible fingers the clustering curls that drooped over the white forehead of Charlie Howard. But as if indifferent both to the beauty of the sunlight, and the wooing caresses of the June breeze, he paced steadily back and forth, with that perplexed look deepening and darkening almost into a frown, the smile fading from his features, and his proud lips compressed, as if to keep his emotions in check.

Not until the long, sunny afternoon had waned away, and the yellow stripes of sunlight dissolved into the gathering purple of twilight, did he cease his restless, monotonous walk; and then only to fling himself down wearily by the window, and drop his head upon his hands with a sigh which told the weary battle was yet going on within his soul. Ah, it was a weary battle indeed! A battle such as human hearts have fought for years, and will fight to the end of time.

Two faces haunted his disturbed thoughts; one with more of womanly sweetness and serene dignity than of beauty, pervading its quiet outlines; the other queenly with the heritage of a wondrous loveliness; the one had eyes like fringed violets, a mouth that seemed ripened into redness by the kisses of angels, a forehead like the rounded petal of a lily, and set in its surroundings of nut-brown curls as in a halo; the other with eyes bewildering in their sloe-like blackness, lips crimson as the deepest hearts of tropical roses, and heavy braids of midnight hair wound, like a coronet of jet, about a head haughty enough for an empress.

There could scarcely have been a greater difference between the two, and yet the young man's heart was sorely troubled to choose between them. Not that he could not tell which was dearest, for in the violet eyes of Georgia Ellwood seemed concentrated all the light his existence had ever known. But Julia Morton would bring him lands and gold, while Georgia, alas! was portionless. One could bind up her raven hair and wreath her snowy arms with jewels; the other wore only the adornings of gentleness and purity. One had a proud old father, rich and influential, whose name would be a golden password into the mystical regions of fame and power his ambitious soul longed to enter; the other was an orphan girl, who would bring him no other dowry than the rich affections of her maiden heart.

That they both loved him he was sure, for Georgia had told him so with her young head lying on his heart, and the lids of her soft eyes drooping slyly beneath the passionate glances of his; and Julia's love had dawned upon him through all those delicately-given signs by which a proud woman signifies her preferences. The haughty face lighted up at his coming, the musical voice softened for his ear, the jewelled fingers trembling in his clasp, these had been the treacherous signals which had betrayed the sweet secret of her heart to him, its conqueror.

He was young, poor, talented and proud, and O, what a world of ambition ungratified slumbered in his heart! How thirstily he panted to drink from the fountain that sparkled and leaped beyond his reach, on the charmed heights of fame! To be known and admired, to tread the summits which only great men had trodden before him, to have the world, the cruel world, that had always flung its rebuffs and defiance in his face, bend in reverence at the mention of his name. O, that was a triumph worth achieving! a triumph for the attainment of which the labors of a lifetime seemed as nothing—for which he would be willing to sacrifice anything but one holy dream of his young manhood. And could he sacrifice that?

As the husband of Georgia Ellwood, he would have only the sweet encouragement and tender sympathy of her woman's heart. Life, though her smile might soften its ruggedness, would lie before him just as toilsome as ever. Step by step he would be obliged to win his way; one by one he must wrest his coveted victories from the grudging hand of fortune. Julia Morton's gold would be a magical key to open for him the barred gate of worldly success, and place his feet steadily on the threshold of all he most coveted. With one leap he could stand where years of patient toil might fail to carry him; the goal would be half won at the commencement, the victory half gained. Which should he choose?

And this was why the shadows grew deeper on his face, and his head drooped lower on his folded hands, as he sat in his room with the twilight purpling around him, and the first pale star of the evening glittering and winking at him through the open window, as if mocking at him for his unmanly hesitation.

"Georgia, dear Georgia, may God forgive me if I break your heart, for my resolution is taken."

He rose up as he spoke. His purpose was fixed and immovable; you would have read it in the rigid look his face put on, and the cold expression of his dark eyes, as the hollow air gave back the echo of his words. He was twenty years older for that afternoon's struggle and determination!

His step was firm as he went out from the dim room into the starlit street. The last amber of sunset had died away from the hills, and in the east the round white moon was sailing steadily up through the blue heavens. But his eye took no note of Nature's loveliness. Swiftly as if fearing his resolution might fail him, he walked along. Only once he paused. It was at the corner of the street where Georgia lived. In the distance he could see the white walls of her cottage-home, with rose-vines climbing up by the low door, breaking out in clusters of crimson bloom, and rambling with their rubies and emeralds half-way over the brown roof.

And while he lingered, Georgia herself came and stood in the doorway looking long and eagerly up the street. She was watching for him, he knew, and he thought as she stood there in her white robes, framed in the emerald glory of the climbing roses, with the sheen of the falling moonlight on her head, that she had never before been half so lovely or half so dear.

There was a moment's wavering, a moment's hesitant pause, as the angel Love troubled the waters of his soul to their depths; a moment in which all worldly successes seemed as dross in comparison with the true heart he had flung away forever. And then he turned. Close beside him the mansion of the Nortons lifted its walls haughtily. Brilliant lights flashed from the windows and strains of festal music rushed out upon the air. The strife that had re-commenced in his heart was put down by a mighty effort. Again the sweet face of Georgia was drowned in the surging waves of an unholy ambition. He had chosen.

That night on one of Julia Norton's white fingers sparkled a betrothal ring, and Georgia Ellwood went to sleep with tears glittering on her brown lashes, and sleeping dreamed of her faithless lover.

A few months after there was a brilliant wedding in church. The white brocade robe of the bride looked like stiff folds of frost-work, and the veil that floated downward from her queenly head was like a mist of snow. People said that Charlie Howard's fortune was made, and those who had hardly recognized his existence before, clasped his hand and offered their congratulations to the son-in-law of rich Mr. Norton. But they knew not his heart was freezing to ice within his breast, or how bitterly he turned from their hollow professions of friendship and kindness, to dwell remorsefully on the haunting memory of a life whose happiness he had wrecked forever.

Years went by. The name of Charles Howard was known and honored throughout the length and breadth of his native land. Wealth and honor flowed almost without seeking into his hands. And yet he was not happy. His youthful dream was realized, but it did not warm back into life the sweet hope he had crushed for its attainment. He had plucked the ripe fruits of a gratified ambition only to have them turn to ashes on his lips. He had bound his brows with laurels, but to feel the thorns budding upon his temples. His wife, learning too late that her gold and not her love had won him, hardened gradually into an icy, brilliant, heartless woman of the world. Children had been given him, but death had claimed them all in infancy, and in the prime of his manhood, he stood desolate-hearted and alone, yearning to put by all the achievements of a successful life in exchange for the peace he had bartered so wantonly. There were no gentle home-attractions for him—no tender, wifely sympathies—no loving, true-hearted woman at whose feet he could lay down his trophies, and feel that her smile more than recompensed him for all.

Georgia Elwood lived still in the little white, rose-covered cottage. She had never married, and yet he almost blamed her at times because she seemed to have suffered so little from his desertion. When they met, which was but seldom since their spheres were so widely separated, the glance of her untroubled blue eyes sought his as unconsciously as though they had never been other than strangers to each other; her cheek never flushed or paled suddenly in his presence, and he came at last to think his love had been greater than hers—by such superficial standards do men sometimes measure the hearts they have betrayed!

One night he was sitting alone in his library. His thoughts had been busy with the past all day, the past that was irrecoverably lost to him, and unwittingly they turned again into the same familiar channel. Suddenly the startling cry of "Fire!" smote upon his ears, and urged by an instinctive feeling which he did not comprehend or stop to question, he rushed out, mixed himself up with the crowd that was pouring past, and was borne along with it to the scene of the conflagration. Huge billows of purple smoke rolling up against the starry sky, the lurid glare of flames, and the shouts of excited firemen, showed him the exact location of the catastrophe. O moment of horror and unutterable anguish! His heart leaped to his throat, and his pulses quickened under the spell of a terrible fear. It was the cottage home of Georgia that was wrapped in flames.

"Are they all safe?" he heard a clear voice shout from among the crowd.

"All but one."

"And that one?"

The answer was a name that, proud man though he was, thrilled through every nerve of his being like an electric current.

"Where is she? I will save her!" And breaking through the crowd, he dashed into the burning building, leaving many behind him to wonder why the rich and aristocratic Mr. Howard should be so strangely excited as to peril his life to save that of a poor old maid whom probably he had never seen or scarcely heard of.

In vain they called to him to come back—to leave the doomed girl to her fate and save himself. With swift feet he hurried through the hall, and bounded up the uncarpeted stairway. He heard the faint, despairing moan of a voice that had once been to him the dearest music under heaven, and springing forward through the blinding gusts of smoke, stood face to face with Georgia.

Her unbound hair floated wildly backward from her shoulders, her blue eyes were dilated with terror, and her slender hands crossed tightly on her bosom in the frenzied convulsion of an unspeakable despair.

He opened his arms to her, and with a cry of joy she bounded toward him. But as a dazzling sheet of flame swept past and showed her who it was that stretched out his arms to make her a refuge, she checked herself, stepped firmly back into her place, and with a proud wave of her hand, motioned him away.

"Surely, this is no time to remember old wrongs, Georgia," he cried, impatiently. "Every moment of hesitation carries you into deeper peril. Come!" Again he opened his arms to her.

"No—not you—not you!" she answered, hoarsely. "It were better to scorch to ashes in these greedy flames, than to feel the touch of your arms about me. Years ago you trampled pitilessly my heart under your feet; I will not owe even my life to you now. It is useless to wait—go, while you can save yourself."

How like a calm, immovable statue she stood there, with her mighty woman's pride conquering even the terrible fear of death; her swan-white neck arched haughtily, her queenly head erect, her clear eyes flashing with the light of a superb disdain; while over her round arms, crossed like slender shafts of ivory upon her bosom—over her pale, proud face and graceful figure, drifted, like a baptism of crimson mist, the glow of the panting flames.

"Hear me, hear me, Georgia," faltered the proud man, pleadingly, as he shrank before the unquailing firmness of her radiant eyes. "For my own safety I care not. If you will not let me save you, at least give me the sweet privilege of dying by your side. Here, with this certain death about us both, let me tell you how bitterly I have repeated the wrong I did you. If my sufferings are any atonement, then have you been most gloriously avenged. My life, which the world has called a brilliant one, has been but a worthless mockery of success, because I had not your love to gladden it. I loved you, Georgia, with all the passionate strength of my young manhood, and here, with my premature old age upon me, in defiance of the false vows that have perjured my soul, and made my whole existence a lie, I tell you my heart worships your goodness and purity still; I love you a thousand times more intensely than ever before. See, Georgia, I kneel here before you, pleading for your forgiveness as I never plead before, even to my God. For the sake of my suffering and yours, Georgia—in the face of the awful death that awaits us, tell me that you do not utterly hate and despise me!"

His passionate, imploring words were caught up fiercely in the hissing roar of the on-sweeping conflagration. The haughty look on Georgia's face softened into an expression of unutterable tenderness, and after a moment's doubtful pause, she sprang dizzily forward and knelt beside him. He felt the clinging of her soft, warm arms about his neck, her tears upon his cheek, the cool rippling of her curls against his scorched forehead.

"I forgive you, Charlie, as I hope myself to be forgiven! And surely it can be no harm to die here, where I should have lived—in your arms!" he heard her murmur, in a voice broken into gasps by the choking billows of fire and smoke.

The blistering flames circled nearer and nearer around them. There was no hope of escape then, even if they had desired it. There was a loud crash as of falling timber—a momentary lull, and then a mighty rush and roar as the fiery tempest broke out with renewed force, a horrified shout from the crowd below—they felt themselves falling scorching, dying, in that close embrace, and then there was—chaos!

"How?—what?—where? What does this mean? Hair wet with dew—neck stiff—eyes full of tears—am I alive or dead?" And Charlie Howard rose up from his seat, by the open window, and looked about him with an air of bewilderment.

Could it be that he had been dreaming? Surely. No lurid blaze hissed and crackled around him; only the purple wings of the June twilight brooded over his silent little room. No glare of blood-red flames dazzled his eyes; only the quiet, holy stars and the peaceful face of the serene moon looked in upon him. He was not old, or famous, or wretched; he had not taken an unloved wife to his bosom. He was still young, and hopeful, and, better than all—free! He felt the bounding pulses of youth and hope in his veins, their buoyancy in his heart, their flush upon his cheek. What to him had been the dark phases of an embittered life, was but the fleeting panorama of a troubled dream! What to him had seemed years of remorse and torture, had scarcely been as many moments! His life was yet before him to choose for good or for evil, but the battle between love and pride was ended. Infinitely less than nothing, in that moment of awakening, seemed the riches and honor which might not be shared with her whose love could alone make them worth the winning. He shuddered as he thought of the precipice to which his selfish ambition had well-nigh lured him, and thanked God, with a thrill of gratitude penetrating his inmost heart, for the hour of unrefreshing sleep that had shown him, even through the tangled prophecy of a dream, the true happiness from the false.

A few weeks later, there was a quiet wedding at the village church; but instead of sweeping folds of stiff brocade, the bride's dress was of fleecy muslin, and through the froth-like whiteness of the wedding-veil glistened, not Julia Norton's raven braids, but the nut-brown curls of Georgia Ellwood.

A PHYSICIAN'S IMPULSE.

Kingsley's "Two Years Ago," like all his other works, is full of gems, of which the following is a specimen: "You are a great puzzle to me, Thurnall," said Frank; "you are always pretending to care for nothing but your own interest, and yet here you have gone out of your way to incur odium, knowing, you say, that your cause is all but hopeless." "Well, I do it because I like it. It's a sort of sporting with your true doctor. He blazes away at a disease, when he sees one, as he would at a bear or a lion—the very sight of it excites his organ of destructiveness. Don't you understand me? You hate sin, you know. Well, I hate disease. Moral evil is your devil, and physical evil is mine. I hate it, little or big; I hate to see a fellow sick, I hate to see a child rickety and pale, I hate to see a speck of dirt in the street. I hate to see a woman's gown torn, I hate to see her stockings down at the heel, I hate to see anything wasted, manure wasted, land wasted, muscle wasted, pluck wasted, brains; I hate neglect, incapacity, idleness, ignorance, and all the disease and misery that spring out of them. There's my devil, and I can't help, for the life of me, going at his throat whenever I meet him."

PHILANTHROPY.

And now philanthropy! thy rays divine
Dart round the globe, from Zembla to the line;
From realm to realm, with cross or crescent crowned,
Where'er mankind and misery are found.
O'er burning sands, deep waves, or wilds of snow,
Thy Howard journeying seeks the house of woe.

DR. DARWIN.

LINES TO ———.

BY W. JOHNSON.

Lady, I'm gazing on that star,
That star that shone so brightly o'er us;
Upon the past so dim and far,
When bright the future lay before us.
That star, it bound my soul to thee;
Nay, more, it bound our souls together;
'Twas like thy dark eyes' witchery,
Those eyes that haunt my gaze forever.

Forgotten are my glorious dreams
Of joy, and hope, and fair renown;
Dark the untrodden future seems,
But darker yet the past that's flown.
Yet mild the black clouds that surround
My life, so scarred with guilt and ill,
There is a spot with brightness crowned,
Where thy fair image lingers still.

'Tis sad to be forgotten, yet
I bid thee think no more of me,
Sweet one; I bid thee to forget,
For I must yield to destiny.
Far, far beneath another sky
My lot is cast, yet none can tell
The anguish of the bursting sigh,
That rises with the word farewell.

MY OWN STORY.

BY AN ELDERLY LADY.

It is my fiftieth birthday, and the existence which I once thought would be so dark, so dreary, so desolate, has garnered within its half century of years much of joy, and peace, and sunshine. Fifty years ago this day, the lids which veiled two dark, strange-looking eyes were first upraised to meet my mother's smile over her first-born. She was young and fair, my mother, scarcely two years a wife, and they have told me since, very proud and happy in the young infant life—which was her very own—Heaven entrusted to her keeping. Perhaps it may have damped her joy a very little that I was not a pretty baby. I never cried like other children, though sometimes a low, patient wail of sorrow would bring the tender mother to my side. But, perhaps, for the most part, I was happy and gleeful, and thriving, though visitors used to say:

"How came your baby to be so unlike you, Mrs. Emra? I supposed she would have been a beauty."

But this opinion made very little difference to my happiness during the first six years of my life. At the end of that period I went to ride one day with my parents. My little year-old sister, Helen, a most beautiful child, even in her infancy, was left at home, and we rode gaily along the mountain road, very happy, we three, in the beautiful summer day and in each other. Perhaps I was a precocious child, and understood more than children of my age in general, or it may have been the after events of that day branded its scenes and conversations on my memory; at all events, I remember every look and word distinctly.

It was a warm, bright summer's day, and my mother wore a blue muslin dress, with low neck and short sleeves, while over her beautiful arms and shoulders she had thrown a lace scarf. A light straw hat, set like a crown upon her wealth of golden ringlets, a clear carnation tint glowed upon her cheeks, her red lips were parted, and her blue eyes upraised.

From my birth I have been a passionate admirer of beauty, and sitting in my mother's lap, with her arm clasped about me, I fairly feasted my eyes on her loveliness. My father had watched her also, for some moments in silence, and then he threw his arm about her waist (for in that unfrequented road there was no one to see us), and guided his fiery horse onward with his right hand.

"Helen," he said, tenderly, "how beautiful you are. Never were you lovelier than now. They say marriage brings changes, but every change only makes you fairer. Our little Helen will grow up like you; she will be very lovely."

"Yes, but I am afraid I love Lucy best." And my mother drew me closer to her. "Perhaps it is because she is my first-born; and then, Robert, those great, dark, thoughtful eyes are her father's own."

My father laughed. "The child is not a beauty, certainly; but if her eyes are mine, you'll admit they are the best part of her. Helen, I've been thinking of late what my life was before your love came to brighten it; so dreary, so desolate, so unloved. When I saw you, I knew I could never live any more without you."

She laughed her little silvery, bird-like laugh, and said:

"I know it, Robert, and you wouldn't wait; how you hurried me. We were married, you know, in six weeks after you saw me first."

"Yes, but if you had looked into my heart you would not have wondered. It was all dark, there—dark—dark. I was an orphan, whom nobody cared for or understood; and you, you were to me in place of all things—home, friends, parents, brothers and sisters. You made a halo bright as a rainbow above, around that dungeon life where my heart was groping."

"And yet, Robert, you are such a great man—an author, a novelist—all the world, that is, all the world that is good for anything, knows you, and admires you. And I, I am only the great man's little Helen; I almost wonder, sometimes, you could have loved me at all."

My father turned towards her his unfathomable eyes, luminous with unshed tears, and said, tremulously:

"Helen, you are more: you are my life, my sunshine, my inspiration, my ever-patient guardian angel; without you I should be nothing."

Then for a few moments we rode on in silence, but the tears still stood upon my father's lashes, and still his rapt gaze rested upon the beautiful face of the true woman who had given the hoarded riches of her love into his keeping, content, if so she might brighten his darkness.

At that moment, while he still carelessly held the reins, the sudden report of a gun caused our horse to plunge and rear, and become unmanageable. His first quick leap wrenched the reins from my father's hand, and while he strove in vain to recover them, the frightened animal dashed along the narrow road at a fearful pace. On our left was a rocky mountain, just around whose base we were driving; on our right a river, lying at some distance below the road, with no fence between. There was a sudden turn in the road, a faint shriek from my mother, who, until that instant, had been frozen into silence, and then down, down we went. My father escaped unhurt, but my beautiful mother was taken up dead, and I—God knows there have been years since, when I thought I had ten thousand times better have died than live to be what I was.

I was borne home in the arms of strangers. My father rode home in the long wagon which contained my mother, holding her head upon his breast, and looking on her white face with the fixed, steady gaze of tearless despair. I was suffering acutely; but, child as I was, I strove to restrain my moans, and bear meekly and in silence, lest I should add to his grief.

It was needless care; had all the world shrieked, groaned, or gone mad around him, he would not have known it. He felt nothing, saw nothing, but the dead face lying on his bosom. They bore her into the house; they laid her on the bed where she had slumbered like an innocent child, on the first night of her bridehood; where for eight peaceful, happy years thereafter, she had dreamed by his side her pure wifely dreams, with her bright living head lying upon his breast.

Not even then would he be separated from her. He threw himself down beside her, and lifted the sunny, golden head to the place it had filled so many blessed nights; he folded his arms around her, and then, like one unsuspecting of the truth, he murmured:

"Sleep on, be thy rest soft, my Helen!"

I was tenderly cared for by one who had been my nurse in infancy. They have told me since that I bore my sufferings with a martyr-like patience which it was very pitiful to see; and only when Dr. Strong said there was no hope—that I, Lucy Emra, must be a cripple for life—did I even weep. Then, indeed, I turned my face to the wall, and sobbed out the bitterness of a deathly agony; a grief more like a woman's than a child's. But nothing of all this was communicated to my father; he had enough else to bear.

At last they buried my mother. My father took no part in the arrangements, but he opposed nothing. After the funeral came the blessed rain of tears. When it was over the minister came forward and took his arm.

"You must not stay here," he said. "Come go with me." And meekly as a child, the stricken man obeyed him.

"I think she was happy; I think I made Helen happy," he said, as they drew near the house. "She never suffered any pain or sorrow from which my love could guard her; and yet, at last, my carelessness killed her."

He then broke from the kind hand that sought to detain him, and rushing into the room from whence she had been borne outward, he locked the door, and no eye saw him again until the morrow. He came forth then, and confronted Dr. Strong, as he was leaving my room, with trouble on his face, and said, resolutely:

"Doctor, I have been neglecting my poor Lucy, Helen's first-born; I am going to see her now, and you must tell me the worst."

There was that in his voice and eye which could not be gainsayed, and Dr. Strong faltered forth:

"She is not suffering so much to-day, sir; but she must be a cripple for life." And then rushed hurriedly from the house.

My father came to me, and sat down by the bedside with his white, sorrowful face.

"Lucy," he said, "my poor, suffering little Lucy—" I burst into tears. "What is it, little Loo, are you suffering?"

"Not in my limb, papa; but I feel so here." And I placed my hand upon my heart, which then, as now, had a habit of fluttering tumultuously with every powerful emotion. "Mother loved me, and she's gone where I can never see her again. All these days I have longed so to have her kiss me just once, and say she pitied her poor, crippled child, and just now you seemed so much like her."

"Then you know it all, darling? They have not spared even you, my poor lamb? But your father's love shall comfort you. I will love you as mama would if she were here."

For a few minutes he looked at me in silence, then he said, abruptly:

"You are tired, lying here; I know it. You want to see the sun shine on the green fields, and feel the wind through the tree boughs. I will carry you; I know I can take you up without hurting you, for I will be as careful as no one else would."

With womanly, mother-like tenderness, he adjusted a support for my crushed foot and limb, and taking me up in his arms with my head lying in my mother's old place upon his breast, he carried me out into the sunshine.

That morning was the commencement of a more intimate relationship with my father. During the weeks of my convalescence, he was with me constantly, and soon he seemed to forget that I was a child of six, and talked to me more like a woman and a companion.

"You must get better," he said one day, in the low, solemnly tender voice that had become habitual to him. "You must get better, so you will not need me so much when I die. Before the last flowers of the summer have faded, or the last leaves of the autumn have fallen, I shall go to Helen."

I fully comprehended him. From that time I grew stronger rapidly, so that at last, with a crutch, I could make my way slowly about the lower part of the house, and this I knew was all to which I could ever look forward. One day I stole into my father's study; the ink was dried up in his inkstand and rusted on his pen.

"You do not need me so much now, Lucy," he said, tenderly, "and it is well. My time is almost come." The nurse was in the garden with my baby sister, and he called her to him. "She looks much like Helen," he said, lifting the child up, and placing her on his knee. "Lucy, you are the eldest."

I knew what those words meant, as well as though he had spoken volumes. I was the eldest. Mine then be the baptism of suffering. I was to shield the little one as far as in me lay, from care and trouble. In after years I obeyed him faithfully.

"But I have much to say, I may not linger."

It was even as he had said; not all the flowers of the summer had faded, not all the leaves of the autumn had fallen, when he went to her.

"You will be very desolate when I am gone, my little daughter," he said, tenderly, "but God will care for you. Death is very sweet to me, little Lucy, for I shall be once more with Helen; already her blue eyes look on me from the distance." He lay in silence for a few moments, and then he drew me towards him, and kissed me. My little sister was also lifted to his arms, and he embraced her tenderly; then laying his head down, as if weary, he whispered, "Hold my hand in yours, Lucy, till I go to sleep."

For half an hour I sat there, still resolutely keeping back my tears, lest I should waken or disturb him, until at last the rays of the setting sun poured in at the window, and lit up the pale lips, the dark hair, and the massive forehead, looking more giant-like than ever, contrasted with the wan thinness of the lower face.

"Will you please to draw the curtain?" I said to Dr. Strong, who was also watching beside him.

"It needs not, dear child," he said, solemnly. "It will not wake him—he is dead!"

Then I wept; I was alone on earth, save the little sister chattering now and laughing, all unconscious of my grief. Nor was this all: I was a cripple, debarred from love, from society, from all that makes the coming life like a pleasant land of promise. But in that hour I drew near, child as I was, to the Infinite, and out of my very sorrow was born strength.

I was fifteen when Duncan Claverling became my teacher. He was the new minister of our parish. The gray-haired man who had buried my father and mother, and had been the dearest and truest friend of my childhood, had gone to his long rest; and in his stead had come to us this Duncan Claverling.

He was a man of thirty; calm, self-reliant, earnest; a different type of manhood from any I had ever known. He seemed like one who could stand up alone and battle against all the world. He needed no circling arms of wife or children. Alone he labored in his Master's cause. He had not my father's ardent temperament, and his creative imagination, and yet his sermons were full of burning, fervid eloquence, and he was the finest critic I had ever known.

By this time I had grown to understand something of my own nature. I had been brought up in the same house where my father died, for such was his wish. Mrs. Newell, the lady who had charge of our home and ourselves, loved my sister passionately; but she had no attachment for the unsightly little cripple, and she took no pains to assist or understand me. My love of knowledge was intense from my earliest recollection, and for several years, my father's study, containing his fine library, had been tacitly abandoned to me. I read many books; works of the imagination, poems and novels. The theme was too often love, and poring over these enchanted pages I grew rebellious over my own sad destiny. I read of fair ladies and gallant knights, and anon of peaceful, happy homes, and all this glorious world of poetry, and passion, and sentiment was shut out from me—I was a cripple! I read it in the very glances the children raised to my face as I passed along the street in my little donkey-wagon. They looked up kindly, but in their eyes was only pity, never admiration or love.

And yet, even in those early days, I felt that my own heart was capable of intensest devotion. I could love, I knew it, with all the passion of which novelists had dreamed, or poets sang. But no one would ever, no one could ever, love the dwarfed, crippled temple which enshrined this passionate, beating heart. I looked in the glass, and saw there a dark, sallow complexion, wild-looking eyes, straight, black hair, and a thin, nervous-looking figure; but not one pleasing lineament.

A contrast was ever beside me—my little sister Helen. She was bright, joyous and beautiful as our mother had ever been, and the beauty-loving element in my nature was gladdened every time I looked on her; I loved her, too. I cherished with more than a mother's tenderness, this gladsome creature, five years younger than myself. I believe I well-nigh worshipped her; I would have died for her at any time, but this was not much, for life had never been dear or precious to me, and I longed to lay the burden down. Helen loved me too, in her own cheerful, light-hearted fashion, and depended on me to do her tasks and perform her duties.

But at fifteen there came to me the dawning of a great change. Duncan Clavering taught me that I, unloved, unsought as I must ever be, even I, had something for which to live. For a week he had been my teacher, and now I handed him my first composition. "How the thorns came on the rose" was its subject. It was a fantastic legend of a lovely flower dwelling among those who cared not for it; it put forth thorns one by one as defences against feet that would crush it, against hands that would grasp it rudely. Into this legend I had woven the wild plaint of my own heart. It was a passionate cry which I thought no one could recognize or understand. Duncan Clavering read it in silence and slowly; then he said:

"Lucy, you have suffered much."

"Yes, sir."

"In this composition, my child, there is morbid feeling, a sort of defiant hopelessness. But I have made another discovery. There is something for you in life, better and brighter than any of your dreams. Lucy, not in vain have you been baptized with the baptism of suffering. You are destined to be an author—you will win fame—you will do good."

The fame had been his first thought, and in the flush that mounted to his dark cheek, I read his besetting sin. Until that hour I had not known that I was ambitious. I had, indeed, something now for which to live. All my father's soul rose within me. Lonely, unloved, my life might be; but the world should know that Lucy Emra, the little cripple, had dwelt in it.

I found Duncan Clavering a hard master. He expected incessant toil. He taxed every nerve and sinew to its utmost tension. And yet he was not unkind; I grew to like his quiet, resolute, governing manner. His silence and terseness were not displeasing to me. And the only sentence of praise he ever uttered—"This is worthy of you, my pupil"—grew in time to be more to me than all other applause.

I no longer missed love, or sighed for it. Heart and soul were full. At twenty, I found myself already a well-known and popular writer. It was at this time Charles Stanley came to our neighborhood—he was an author—his ostensible object was to find, for a few months, a quiet home wherein to read, wherein to write; his real one, as I afterwards found, to become acquainted with the Lucy Emra of his favorite periodicals. He soon called upon me. He was brought into my own especial room, the study which had been my father's.

"I am happy to see you," I said, quietly, "but you will excuse me from rising, as I am lame."

He looked at me with an expression of blended amazement and compassion.

"I wished to see Miss Lucy Emra," he said, hesitatingly.

"I am she," was my calm reply.

"Forgive me—I beg ten thousand pardons—but I had been told that Miss Emra was very young, scarcely twenty."

I glanced at a mirror opposite—his mistake was not strange—I looked at least thirty. Good as Duncan Clavering's discipline had been for my mind, it had made me sallow and thinner than ever; I had grown very old. There may have been a little bitterness in my smile, as I said:

"I am, indeed, no older than that, sir; but I have suffered much. I have been lame for many years, and I know little about the beauty or brightness of life."

I could see he was touched; that argued well for his disposition. I exerted myself to relieve his embarrassment; soon the conversation flowed into an easy channel, and he left me at length, with the impression that I had passed one of the most agreeable hours of my life.

For the next few months he passed a portion of every day in my society. Sometimes he read to me, while I sat in my low chair at the open study window, inhaling the perfume and fragrance from without. He was very gifted, and his tastes and pursuits were so much like my own that I gave myself up to the delight of his society, without asking myself whither all this would tend? Helen, too, was almost always with us. She was a blooming, graceful creature of fifteen now. She had never in her life met any man that seemed to her Charles Stanley's equal. Unlike Duncan Claverling, he was very handsome. His manners possessed that polish which is only imparted by extensive intercourse with good society, and his conversation united the fascinations of playfulness, poetry, and subtle analysis.

It was not long before I made the discovery that Helen loved him. My only little sister—the one being I had been accustomed to call my own—had cast out my love from the chief place in her heart, and yielded it up in tremulous joy to the handsome stranger. This knowledge came to me fraught with deepest anguish. It was revealed to me one morning by a chance expression on her face as he read aloud "The Lady of the Brown Rosary."

Suddenly, though the summer sunshine was never brighter, the day seemed to grow black and dark. I could not bear their presence; I sent them both from me.

"I am tired of you," I said, with a forlorn attempt at playfulness. "That poem always excites me; and I am not strong. Go out, both of you, and play, like good children; don't let me see you back for an hour."

Laughingly they obeyed me; but Charles came back when he had reached the door:

"You might let me, Lucy, I would be quiet."

"No, go along, both of you; I will have my own way sometimes."

I laughed as I spoke, but I felt ready to burst into tears. They shut the door. I crept across the room with my crutch and locked it; I would have no interruption. I came back and sat in my writing chair by the table, and all this time not a tear fell. Until that hour I never even fancied I loved Charles Stanley. Now I could see that a feeling had been growing up in my heart which was not perhaps exactly love—a feeling that he belonged to me and no other.

To do him justice he had never striven to win Helen's regard. Of course, with his nature, he could not remain insensible to her wonderful beauty, but he had never seemed to take much interest in her society; his thoughts and attentions had all been for me. But she loved him; and I—I would not have married him, knowing this, had his heart broken for love of me. But did he love me, a poor, unlovely cripple? With his nature this was not possible. Thank God, I saw the truth plainly: my genius he might admire, but he did not love me, he never could. I remember at the time I wondered why this knowledge did not bring me a deeper thrill of pain. It was not this which gave birth to the wild throbs of agony which rocked my slight frame.

I believe that the thought that Helen's love was mine no longer, grieved me still more than the feeling that I had no power to retain the chief place in Charles Stanley's heart. Worst of all, was the old, desolate sense, that I was, and must ever be, alone in the world; set apart, isolated from human love, by my misfortune. Helen would go away from me; the love which could never be for me, would brighten her blue eyes and deepen the blushes on her cheek. All the rest of the world might find kindred hearts and husband's and children's love, but I—God help me—I must be poor, crippled Lucy Emra all my life! O, in that hour, fame seemed how worthless! For one heart to love me, I would have given all the glory of the universe.

Wildly I threw my arms upward, and groaned and sobbed in my despair. And then an angel came down from heaven, and stilled the troubled waters of my soul, and brought the bright waves of healing to my very lips. I prayed. The peace of the Infinite seemed to overshadow me. The cloud and the darkness passed over.

That evening I went to the minister's house. I had a question for Duncan Claverling's solution in a new study I had undertaken. I rose up to go, at length, for Charles Stanley had come for me, and was waiting at the door. Duncan looked at me gravely and kindly:

"You know I predicted good things for your life, Lucy, my child," he said, in his calm, low tones, "and they have come. Fame is dawning for you; already I see its dawning in the east; and now this young Stanley loves you—you will have happiness."

Was it my fancy, or did a shadow cross his face as he spoke—a look of intense physical pain? I made no reply. I went to the door, and bade him, as was my wont, a respectful good-night; but I looked back afterwards, and saw him still standing where I left him, watching me moving slowly onward, with my crutch in my hand, leaning on Charles Stanley's arm, and his face wore an expression I had never seen on it before.

That night, on my way home, Charles Stanley asked my hand in marriage—Charles Stanley, poet and dreamer! A moment I was silent. A little of the morning's pain came back to me—I, who needing sympathy and tenderness so painfully, must yet put away the cup of love with my own hand. But I put the feeling resolutely down, and answered:

"No, Charles, I must never be your wife. I am not what your nature craves. You need, appreciation, not rivalry in a woman. You need one like Helen. You shall have her; I will give her to you, and you shall be a brother to me."

"But it is not Helen I want; it is you," he replied, with a bewildered look.

"No, Charles, it is not I; it is Helen. Listen and you will believe me. You are very romantic." He winced. "Well, then, enthusiastic, if you like that term better. You had a very pretty theory about souls loving each other. Love was to be very exalted—mind, not matter. You read my writings—they pleased you—you thought you discovered in them a kindred spirit. You resolved to make my acquaintance. You came here with the fullest intention of loving and marrying me. When you saw that I was lame, you were disappointed—I could see that—but your beautiful theory, you thought, must be true. You continued to visit me. Our tastes harmonized. I had seen little of the world, therefore I was original. You liked to hear me talk, you became pleased with my society, and now you think you want to marry me. But you have not one emotion of passionate love for me in your heart, such love as man garners up for the elect woman who is to be his wife. You would do me grievous wrong to wed me. Look into your own heart, Charles Stanley, and answer me as you would answer to God—have I not spoken truly? You need, with all the longings of your nature, a beautiful woman. You need beauty, I say, you must have it in your wife. You have all a poet's waywardness; you need a sunny, cheerful woman. I am old and sad, and withered before my time. You need peace; my life, quiet as it is, must be always restless. I should not suit you. Answer me truly, Charles Stanley, am I not right?"

"Thanks!" he faltered, "thanks, Lucy, you have shown me my own heart."

But his eyes did not turn to me; they were fixed on Helen, who was bounding down the path to meet us, for we were almost home. O, how beautiful she looked, her dress of flowing white muslin, bound round her slender waist with an azure girdle, her garden hat upon her arm, her eyes bright, and her cheeks flushed with exercise, her golden curls floating on the gentle evening breeze. No wonder Charles Stanley watched her; but she was mine no longer.

I remembered with a slight pain that he had accepted my words so readily, that he had not even sought to ascertain if I loved him. I thought I never could have loved him with all the fullness of my nature. Ah, perhaps if I had I could not have given him up so easily.

One more pang came to me; it was a selfish one. I sat down by my study window, and looked forth into the garden; they were there together, and I could not help thinking what a handsome couple they were. He was helping to tie up a rosebush, and I heard him say that its blossoms were no brighter and blither than herself. And this was the man who had asked me to be his wife only yesternight—the only lover I ever had. I had given him up to Helen—they were both forgetting me. "Is this you, Lucy Emra?" I said, with a twinge of contempt for my self-pity, and then I took my pen, and resolutely turning my back upon sorrow, commenced to write a new book. In six weeks Duncan Clavering married them.

I was twenty-five years old, and I looked ten years older than that. Five years had passed since my sister's marriage, and for the last twelve months she had been in her old home again—Charles Stanley's widow. Her post-husband was dead, and she, always sensitive, but transitory in her emotions, though she grieved for him, had speedily regained her cheerfulness. They had been very happy; she had exactly satisfied the needs of his nature with her brightness and her beauty.

I had never had another lover, and Duncan Clavering had been my only friend. I had by this time won the fame he had prophesied, and far more than myself, he gloried in it. Physically, I had not grown much stronger. There were hours when I would have given worlds for human love—to have rested my throbbing brow for one instant on some true heart which was mine own. But I knew this was not for me, and resolutely put the thought away.

Of late Duncan Clavering had come to see us very often—far oftener than before Helen's return. She had matured into a very accomplished woman. He would sit for hours and listen to her voice as she sang to the harp or piano, and I, sitting beside him, would listen also, thrilled even to pain by the melody; and then, when he saw the tears stealing silently down my cheeks, he would say:

"Come Helen, put away your music now, it is not good for Lucy any longer." Uttering the command in a calm, kindly tone, as if somehow, she belonged to him.

He was forty now, and his dark hair was thickly streaked with silver, and yet Helen, who used to annoy me, by calling my master the ugliest man in the world, insisted now that somehow he had grown handsome.

I saw all this with a strange sense of heart-crushing pain, such as I had never experienced before. I had always thought of the minister as one who would never marry. I had accustomed myself to believe that I should always be his friend, his pupil nearer to him than all others; and now a wall seemed springing up between us.

It was a beautiful morning in summer. Once more I sat down by the study window, and looked forth. I could see the churchyard in the distance where my father and mother lay buried.

"O, how happy they were," I murmured. "Their lives were short but sweet, for they loved each other, and they sleep now in one grave. O, father! O, mother! why may not your crippled, helpless child come home to her rest beside you?"

A low, gleeful laugh came from the garden. Duncan Clavering was helping my sister tie up the very same rosebush Charles Stanley had helped her to tie five years before, on the morning after their betrothal. Had she forgotten, that she could laugh over its crimson blossoms with another now? I could not see his face, but he was bending eagerly forward, and once his hand touched hers.

In that moment my own soul's secret was revealed to me. I fell upon my knees, then I threw myself prostrate on the floor, and buried my face in my hands. A cry, a wail of anguish went up from my breaking heart.

I know not how long I lay there—it might have been hours—it might have been moments. A voice roused me, which could almost have summoned me from the sleep of death.

"My poor Lucy," it said, "my little darling!"

O, I knew then that he loved me. I needed no more. Never before had such tones fallen upon my ears; such cadences of protecting, tender, absorbing love! He lifted me in his arms. No other had ever done this since my father died. He carried me across the room, and sat down, still holding me. Then he kissed me. It was the first kiss any man, save that dead father, had left on the poor cripple's lips.

"You are weak, my pupil," he said, gently, "let me be your strength. Will you be my wife?"

I raised my head from his shoulder; I looked at him. "Would you take me, my master?" I faltered, "me—a cripple?"

"Listen to me, my pupil. I love you. I have loved you for years; but I would not ask your love, for I thought your vivid fancy—your exacting nature—would never be satisfied with one like me: plain, poor, and no longer young. God only knows what I suffered when I saw that Charles Stanley wished to marry you. I thought, with his gifted, sensitive nature, you must love him. He married Helen, and I was content; but still I could not ask your love. I would not give you the opportunity of refusing me—of blasting all my hope. While I did not know your heart, I could still hope. But you have not told me yet—do you love me, Lucy?"

"You know I do, my master. But I shall shock your taste. You will blush for me." A painful glow overspread my own cheek.

"Listen, my pupil. You were a very obedient little pupil, Lucy; listen, and then never let the subject be mentioned between us hereafter. To me, your face is fairest and sunniest among women. I am proud, O, how proud of your genius which I have helped to cultivate. Your lameness I regard, under God's providence, as a blessing. Without it you never would have been the woman that you are—so gifted, yet so humble. There is another reason why I am thankful for it: I am a jealous man; I could never bear my wife's person should possess the same charms for other men it had for my own eyes. This will prevent it. Forgive me, Lucy. God made us for each other."

"And Helen?" I could not help questioning.

He answered me with a look that satisfied me perfectly.

"That was but your fancy; Helen is your sister."

"One more question, my master—forgive me for asking it—is this your first love? Crippled as I am, do you indeed love me with all the dreams of your youth?"

"I do—it is my first love—I love you with all the dreams of my youth; with all the hopes of my manhood. Lucy, you are as my own life."

We were married in a few days, for I had no preparations to make. In a few months, Helen was also married to one who loved her, and she is happy. I am fifty years old now; for just half my life I have been his happy wife. He has indeed been "my strength."

THOUGHTS.

BY MYRTA MAY.

There are thoughts, that like a sunbeam,
Clothe our pathway all in light—
There are thoughts, that like the mildew,
Cast o'er all a withering blight.
Thoughts will come, like strains of gladness,
From an unseen spirit-love;
Thoughts will sting the soul to madness,
Thrilling every vein with fire!

Thoughts are ever softly winging
To the heart their silent flight,
Some on angels' snowy pinions,
Others on the wing of night.
Oft they come, so gently stealing,
At the solemn hour of even,
To the spirit half revealing
Glimpses of the far-off heaven.

Often dark temptation cometh
In such fair and smiling guise,
That the heart almost believeth
'Tis a vision from the skies.
O, beware! and ere the tempter
Flings o'er you his witching spell,
Close the portals of thy spirit,
Guard the sacred entrance well.

Though the good be e'er so lowly,
Shrine it in thy inmost heart—
Cherish all that's pure and holy,
Bid the evil all depart.

PIERRE PALLIOT'S WEDDING:

—OR,—

MARRYING FOR MONEY.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

THE shades of night were falling fast upon the great city of Marseilles and all that it inherits, including a young gentleman of rather picturesque and seedy appearance, who was striding with agitated steps up and down a deserted quay, occasionally stopping to gaze at the dark waters that flowed beneath, as though undecided whether to plunge in or not, and then resuming his objectless and unsatisfactory walk. Presently he paused at the extreme end of the quay, and gave vent to his feelings in an audible and long-winded complaint.

"Was there ever such an unfortunate and miserable wretch on the face of the footstool as myself, Pierre Palliot, medical student? It is hardly possible that any person can be so hopelessly insane as to answer in the affirmative. Here am I, with Lucille and perfect happiness all ready to precipitate themselves into my arms at the word 'go,' and am prevented by a rascally destiny embracing either of them—though, for that matter, as the two are inseparable, I couldn't very well embrace the one without hugging the other. At the hour of five, this present afternoon, overcome by the ardor of my affections and a bottle of particularly fine-flavored wine, I presented myself before the atrocious progenitor of the adorable Lucille and demanded his consent to an instantaneous union. The old griffin having listened to my modest request, asked if I was fond of travelling. Thinking, in my innocence, that he intended to furnish Lucille and myself with the necessary funds for a wedding tour all over the known world, I unhesitatingly replied that I was frantic with delight at the idea of a journey. 'Then,' said the brute, savagely, 'oblige me by setting out on your travels—at least from this place—this very instant.' 'Sir!' I ejaculated, in disappointed astonishment; 'I don't exactly understand.' 'You know the way to the door,' he continued, sternly pointing towards that well-known aperture. 'Intimately,' said I, retreating in the direction indicated. 'Well, sir,' said he, 'just put your earthly tabernacle on the other side of it, and return whenever you feel a desire to be first horse-whipped and then kicked into the street.' Not being naturally very thick-headed or dull of apprehension, I had no hesitation in construing his remarks into a delicately expressed request for me to retire, with which request I forthwith complied.

"Now, some people might think me uncharitable in applying opprobrious epithets to the old demon who stands between me and my Lucille, and who refuses to give her to me because she has a small fortune of her own, which he wishes to control, and I have none, and because he wants her to marry some scalawag of a fellow that he has selected for her. But I am not uncharitable; on the contrary, my charity is unbounded, and of a purely scriptural sort. Nothing in life could give me greater pleasure than to see him an hungered and athirst and naked, that I might feed and clothe him; or sick and in prison, that I might minister unto him; and so, by treating him with kindness, heap coals of fire upon his head, and see if it wouldn't warm up his rascally old brains a bit.

"Quitting the apartment, as the unnatural old fiend had desired, I flew to meet the lady of my love. 'Lucille,' I ejaculated, 'light of my eyes—beloved of my soul—guardian angel of Peru—we must part!' 'Part?' she echoed, wildly. 'Ay, and forever-r-rr!' I exclaimed, spreading out my legs, slapping my forehead, and rolling out the r's at great length, as was the practice of the immortal Talma upon such occasions. She would have fallen to the ground, had I not caught her in my arms; and for a time our combined lamentations took the starch completely out of the similar performance of the late Jeremiah, Esquire. Suddenly a brilliant thought occurred to me. 'Lucille,' I said, 'let us fly! Let us forsake this detestable country and seek an asylum in America—the land of the free and the home of the brave—and there in the sylvan solitudes of the primeval forests whose luxuriant foliage shades the contiguous rural hamlets of New Orleans and Boston, we will pass our peaceful days in Arcadian simplicity, far from the hum of men.'

"To my inexpressible joy, she consented to fly with me in the morning, immediately after our having been made one flesh. Having minutely instructed her when and where to meet me, I left her to pack such articles as she saw fit, while I hurried towards my own lodgings to perform a similar operation—though as I happen to have my entire wardrobe upon my person, there was not the slightest shadow of necessity for leaving her on that account.

"Arrived at the head of this pier, on my way homeward, it suddenly occurred to me that one hundred dollars, Federal money, was the very lowest figure for which two persons could hope to be transported, even in the poorest style, to the glorious land of Washington. Thrusting my hands into my breeches pockets, I discovered that a coin of the value of one franc was the extent of my available capital, leaving a balance of ninety-nine dollars and eighty-one cents, Yankee currency, to be procured. But how? The paltry consideration of money had not suggested itself to me before.

"As all the bank notes, bullion, and bills receivable which I possess, are now in my pockets, and as all my friends together could not raise the sum required, I feel that it is useless to return home with the expectation of finding the amount in my apartments, for I am positive I didn't leave any funds there, and I don't believe any one has taken the risk and trouble of breaking in for the purpose of leaving his pocket-book. Such a thing is within the bounds of possibility, certainly; but not sufficiently probable to calculate upon with any reasonable degree of certainty.

"A citizen of this empire, it cannot be denied that I am entitled to a considerable amount of property. My share in the various public works, the numerous palaces, fortifications, court-houses, light houses, hospitals, arsenals, prisons, ships-of-war, public parks, et cetera, and so forth, and so on, must foot up something quite handsome; and, as I am about to leave the country, I am determined to close out this description of property at the most tremendous sacrifice. Still, in the present depressed and unsettled condition of the money market, I fear it will be extremely difficult to realize even upon the most ruinous terms. How the deuce am I to raise a hundred dollars? that's the question. There's no use going home, and I can't stay here prancing about on this wharf for the remainder of my natural life. O, for a hundred dollars! I'll do anything for a hundred dollars—I'll sell myself for a hundred dollars! Who bids? Here's a tip-top young man, warranted sound and kind in all harness, going for the insignificant sum of a hundred dollars—only one hundred—going—going—last bid—going—"

"Gone!" said a voice at his side; and a heavy hand was laid upon his shoulder.

"Eh?—hullo—you don't say so!" ejaculated Pierre, not a little startled by the unexpected advent of the proprietor of the voice, who, under cover of the darkness, had approached unperceived, and listened to the concluding portion of our hero's soliloquy.

"I do say so," returned the stranger, "provided you are willing, as you say you are, to do anything for a hundred dollars."

"Do anything for a hundred dollars?" echoed Pierre. "Of course I'll do anything for a hundred dollars—I'll do several anything for a hundred dollars—I'll jump out of my skin for—"

"That would be altogether superfluous," said the stranger, taking a purse from his pocket and shaking up the coin most temptingly. "Here is the sum you require, and if you faithfully follow my instructions, it shall be yours."

"Pitch in, my generous benefactor!" said Pierre, listening to the jingling of the money with great satisfaction. "Fire away with your commands, and you will find me the most devoted and reliable of medical students."

"What I require of you is a matter of so little importance to a person in your situation that you will scarcely hesitate."

"Well?"

"I wish you simply to marry a certain young lady—a very charming young lady—who adores you, at seven o'clock to-morrow morning."

"Eh, what?—marry?" faltered Pierre, much distressed. "Who, for instance?"

"You are not to know who, for the present—not even to see her face until after the ceremony, when you will be at liberty either to take your bride to your own home, or to leave her to me; and I will guarantee she shall never trouble you after. What say—is it a bargain?"

"No, sir; not the least little bit of it," returned Pierre, stoutly. "As all I want of the money is to enable me to carry off the girl of my heart, it isn't very likely I'll go to work and marry another, is it?"

"O, very well; suit yourself," said the stranger, returning the purse to his pocket. "I can easily find a young fellow less scrupulous than yourself, who will not object to earning money so easily, particularly as he will remain to all intents and purposes quite as much a bachelor after the thing is accomplished as before."

"Stop—hold on—don't be in such a hurry!" exclaimed Pierre, as the stranger was moving off. "Is there no other way—nothing else I can do besides making a bridegroom of myself, that will do your business for you?"

"Nothing," replied the stranger, turning away. "But I will give you five minutes to consider of it, and if in that time you have not decided to agree to my proposition, why, our business is at an end and I'll look out for some one else to take my money, that's all!" And he vanished in the darkness.

"Well, I never!" mused Pierre, as, left to his own reflections, he recommenced his solitary promenade. "Who the deuce can this very sensible and discerning female be that has taken such a shine to the subscriber? And above all, what's her object in wanting to marry me in such a confounded hurry? It must be for some state reason. Perhaps now—who knows?—perhaps I'm the lost Bourbon, or the lost Bourbon's son, or some other lost individual of immense consequence, and this young and lovely female is doubtless the sole representative of another branch of the family whose union with myself is necessary to reconcile conflicting claims. Yes, that must be it. I see it all! I shall be forthwith proclaimed the rightful heir to some thundering great title or other. I fancy I see myself now, taking triumphant possession of my ancestral halls, surrounded by a crowd of nobles and courtiers in slouched hats and feathers, and yellow sheep-skin boots much too large in the legs; while I, with very black eyebrows, a fierce frown, and a velvet mantle all covered over with little tin spangles, stride back and forth across my largest ancestral hall, shouting: 'What ho! within there!' and calling everybody 'sirrah,' and all that sort of thing. Then, how all my peasantry in peaked-crowned, pasteboard hats, red breeches and silk shirts, will cheer and take hold of each other's hands, and dance edgeways round in a ring, when I allow them to behold their mistress, the adorable Lucille!"

"Yet stop! the adorable Lucille wouldn't be their mistress, after all. To obtain possession of my ancestral halls, I must give up all thoughts of the adorable Lucille forever. No, no; that won't do at all. What would ancestral halls be to me without the adorable Lucille? Nothing. What would the adorable Lucille be to me without ancestral halls? A great deal. Therefore, ancestral halls may go to thunder, and I cleave unto— But stop again! unless I raise the hundred dollars, it's not going to be so easy to cleave. I shall lose her, if I accept this fellow's proposition, and I sha'n't get her if I decline. A pleasant alternative, certainly! Let me see: This fellow, who I make no doubt is Satan himself, must have some personal motive in thus tempting me. Now if I can only be smart enough to outwit him in any way, I shall not hesitate to do so; for it's very meritorious to foil the schemes of the adversary. I must marry this unknown female, he says, at seven to-morrow morning, when I shall be at liberty to take her or leave her, as I choose. Now what's to prevent me, as soon as the ceremony is over and I have got the money, flying with Lucille and marrying her out of hand, just as if this other thing had never been? To be sure, I should have a wife on both sides of the Atlantic; but she must know nothing about my first, and as for the bigamy, why, there are crowds of gentlemen to keep me in countenance on the other side of the water, or common report most atrociously belies a vast number of highly respectable individuals who have emigrated lately. Yes, by Jove! that's an idea worthy of anybody's folks, in their palmiest days. Now for the tempter to clinch the bargain," he headed aloud. "Abaddon, come forth! Sathamus, turn up!"

"Well," replied the voice, close to his ear, "have you decided?"

"Eh? Hullo! You've got a serviceable pair of ears of your own. Yes, I have decided, and it's a bargain."

"I felt sure it would be," said the stranger; "and now you've only to be at the address you will find upon this card, at seven precisely, and the money's yours."

"By the way, Satan," exclaimed Pierre, struck with a new idea, "it wouldn't be convenient to let me have the money to night, would it?"

"Perfectly convenient."

"You don't say so!" ejaculated Pierre, in delighted surprise, and reaching out his hands expectantly.

"Perfectly convenient, but wretchedly unbusiness-like," returned the stranger, moving off. "I shall therefore withhold it until our meeting in the morning, and shall trust to your necessities for finding you promptly on the spot. Good night." And he strode rapidly away in a direction opposite to that taken by our hero towards his own lodgings.

The stranger, having satisfied himself that he had not been followed, entered a house at no great distance from the wharf, and passed directly to a room where an elderly gentleman, with the snows of sixty winters on his head and the mud of one damp summer afternoon on his boots, sat writing at a desk.

"Well?" said the old man, inquiringly.

"It's all right," replied the stranger, who would have been a good looking fellow enough, but for the absolute necessity of having the villain of a story made of second quality materials. "It's all right; I tracked our customer to a quiet spot by the river side, and while debating with myself whether it were the more sinful to blow out his brains or to put a knife into his soul-case, overheard him praying the gods for a hundred dollars, for which sum he professed himself willing to do anything; in short, to sell himself—"

"Exactly," interrupted the old gentleman; "he wants that money to pay for his own and Lucille's passage to New York. Lucky I overheard their infamous plot. Well?"

"Well, it occurred to me to offer him the sum he desired, provided he agreed to my conditions."

"Which were, either to leave the country or hang himself, of course."

"On the contrary, he is to remain at home and alive as long as he pleases."

"Eh?"

"And be married at seven o'clock, to-morrow morning."

"Married?" echoed the old gentleman, in astonishment. "What do you mean—who to?"

"It is in the bargain that the bride be closely veiled until after the ceremony, and I fancy we shall find no scarcity of females in Marseilles who would be married a dozen times a day, for a consideration."

"And did he agree to this arrangement?" asked the old man, eagerly.

"He refused at first, but finally consented, thinking, probably, that Lucille, being ignorant of the matter, would elope with him as they have arranged between them."

"And to prevent that, you propose for me to acquaint my daughter with her lover's perfidy?"

"Better still; let us both be concealed witnesses of the ceremony and confront the fellow immediately it is over. He knows you, of course, and would probably know me by daylight. The certainty that Lucille would be informed of the affair, would render him desperate; and he would, without doubt, take himself out of the country or out of the world, without being urged to do so."

"Excellent!" exclaimed the old man, rubbing his hands with delight. "And Lucille, in a rage at being jilted, would cease her silly opposition to my wishes, and marry you out of spite, if for no other reason. Yes, I think that will—what in Satan's name is that?" he added, as an indistinct rustling sound from the hall caught his ear.

The stranger rose, went to the door, opened it and looked into the passage.

"I see nothing," he said, as he returned to his seat. "It was the wind, perhaps, or may be the rats in the wainscoting."

"Yes, doubtless the rats," said the old man. "Now to find this accommodating female—do you know such a one?"

"Many such," returned the stranger, going towards the door. "I will be back with the one I have already decided upon, in less than ten minutes."

In a good deal less than the time mentioned, the stranger returned, accompanied by a young woman whose bright eyes and handsome features would have been quite prepossessing, but for the bold and confident expression which rendered most unpleasantly evident the fact that she was up to all and every variety of snuff, and that what she didn't know wasn't worth knowing.

"This is the person I spoke to you about," said the stranger, addressing the old man.

"Ah!" ejaculated that individual, turning towards the girl. "What is your name, my good girl? and where do you live?"

"I'm not a good girl," returned the young woman, with a saucy laugh. "My name is Marie, and I live at number seventeen this street."

"Well, Marie, what do you say to being married to-morrow—eh?"

"I should say that such an old reprobate as you ought to be thinking of something else at your time of life," returned the girl.

"O, the deuce! I don't mean myself," exclaimed the old man, hastily. "But I suppose you don't care much who your husband is to be, so that you are well paid—eh? Besides, the young fellow is not an ugly one, and you'll have no occasion to be afraid of him."

The girl smiled and tossed her head contemptuously at the idea of being afraid of any sort or condition of man.

"Very well," continued the old man, "I will come for you at seven, to-morrow morning, and conduct you to the notary's office; and if you play your part satisfactorily to us, the compensation shall be made equally satisfactory to you. By the way, you must be very closely veiled, and speak as little as possible, for the young fellow might know you."

"Very likely he might," returned the girl. "I'm no stranger in the city."

Everything having been satisfactorily arranged between the parties, the girl quitted the room, leaving the two men to mature their plans.

While the preceding conversation was taking place, the rustling sound that had before attracted their attention, was repeated; but as both had decided it to be produced by rats, and as neither considered himself a cat, and consequently in duty bound to hunt them up, no further notice was taken of it. Neither did they perceive, when the girl Marie left the room, that she remained an unnecessary time in the hall, and that nearly fifteen minutes elapsed before the outer door was closed softly behind her, and that as she departed down the street, another young female, on the inside of the door, sped swiftly and silently across the hall and up the stairs.

At seven, on the following morning, four persons were assembled in the office of an accommodating notary. One was the justice himself, the second was a female closely veiled, and the other two were the plotters of the night before.

"I think this will do," said the old man, confidently. "By Jove, Marie is muffled up so closely that her own father wouldn't know her! So the young scamp wont be likely to suspect anything, unless he has better eyes than I have."

The girl laughed, and drew her veil still more closely over her face.

"You think there is no doubt of his coming—eh?" continued the old man.

"Not a bit," replied his companion, approaching a window and looking into the street. "In fact, here he comes. Now to secrete ourselves; for if he should get a glimpse of either of us, the game would be up in no time. Let the job be done as quickly as possible, so that he wont have too much time to consider," he added, to the magistrate. And with his anticipated father-in-law, he passed into an adjoining apartment and closed the door, just as our friend Pierre entered from the street, looking very much frightened and as though he hadn't slept very well over night.

"Ah, you're the man, I suppose?" said the justice, preparing to commence operations.

"I'm a man—I suppose," hesitated Pierre, with a dubious look at the veiled figure.

"Well, our man, Pierre Palliot, medical student?"

"You've hit it the first time. But I expected to find some one else here—somebody with—"

"With the money," said the justice.

"Gracious, what a fellow to guess! You've hit it again!"

"Well, the money is ready for you; here it is. And if you've no objections, we'll proceed to business at once."

"Go it! said Pierre, with an air of desperation, as he pocketed the cash. "I'm resigned. I'm an unresisting lamb; lead me to the slaughter, for I must be sacrificed before eight o'clock, or not at all, as I have an appointment of some moment at that hour. So hurry!"

The justice went into another room to procure a couple of persons to witness the ceremony.

"I don't wish to be anyway disrespectful, or make any unreasonable demands, madam," said Pierre, approaching the girl, "but it seems to me you ought to grant your husband his first and only request."

The girl, without speaking or raising her blanket of a veil, made a motion to indicate that she was listening.

"It's very simple—nothing more than you will do without asking, one of these days; it is, that you will try to make it convenient to shuffle off your mortal coil very early this forenoon, and be gathered to your fathers sometime between now and eight o'clock, as at that hour I have got to be married to another person, and I would like, if possible, to avoid the bigamy—as, bigamy or trigamy, the thing must be done."

The girl chuckled away under her veil, as though very much amused, but made no reply.

The justice having returned with the witnesses, the ceremony began—the girl making her responses in a very low tone, and Pierre turning very red in the face and speaking as though he had a toad in his throat. At the instant these twain were pronounced one flesh, the door opened and the two plotters entered triumphantly.

"My dear Monsieur Pierre Palliot," exclaimed the old man, with taunting cordiality, "permit me to congratulate you on this happy occasion. It was really unkind of you not to invite my daughter and myself to witness your marriage; but thinking, in your happiness, you might have forgotten us, I have taken the liberty to come without an invitation, and also to bring Lucille, who will soon be here to wish you joy."

Pierre staggered up against the wall, thunder-struck, and turned as many colors as a dolphin in articulo mortis.

"But you don't salute your bride!" continued

the old man, maliciously, pushing the girl towards her newly made husband. "Don't let our presence make you inattentive towards your beloved wife."

"She aint my wife—I wont have her!" shouted Pierre, pushing her away in an agony of rage, disappointment and disgust. "Here, you fellow! unmarry us, and I'll give you back the hundred dollars and everything else I've got in the world."

"Nothing but death or a legal divorce can separate you now," said the magistrate, who appeared to enjoy the joke as well as the other two gentlemen, who were dancing about the room, fairly shrieking with laughter.

"Well, I'll have a divorce," sobbed the wretched Pierre. "I've been cheated, and I wont have anything to do with her."

"I didn't think you would be tired of me so soon, Pierre, or I wouldn't have come," said the girl, reproachfully, as she threw back her veil, disclosing just the prettiest and most mischievous face that ever was seen.

"Lucille!" ejaculated Pierre, whose first act was to fall spank down into the chair behind him, as though somebody had suddenly cut his legs off, and the next to jump up again and throw his arms about the girl, and make such a complete fool of himself, that for his own sake I'll keep shady.

The feelings of the other actors in this little drama can better be described than imagined; but it will be impossible for me to describe them, for "I came away then."

KEEPING WOMEN'S LETTERS.

If there be a man entitled to the name of dastard, it is he who hoards up a lady's letters, written in all the confidence of affection, and then leaves them to imperil her good name in the hands of utter strangers. We have no regard for such a Silenus while living, and no respect for his memory when dead. And this is why no amount of ingenious sophistry, no expenditure of verbal varnish by his biographers, can induce us to think amiably of Aaron Burr.—N. Y. News.

IMAGINATION.

Queen of the fairy world, Imagination,
Responds unto her sister's invocation.
From distant shores, from skies of azure hue,
From rippling waters of transparent blue,
From mountain-tops where first the morning beams,
From caverns dark where sunlight never gleams,
From coral caves, from ocean, earth and sky,
Call but imagination, she'll reply
Welcome, my dear companion!—M. L. BLANCHARD.

He that would pass the latter part of his life with honor and decency, must, when he is young, consider that he one day shall be old, and remember, when he is old, that he has once been young.

LOVED AND LOST.

BY W. FELIX TIMBER.

Dear girl, embalmed in holiest love,
Jewelled with many tears,
Thy image, bright and beautiful,
Mid bowers affection rears,—
Deep in the chambers of my heart
Dwelleth in peace. And O, 'tis bliss,
In a weary, weary world like this;
(Where folly flies a gilded dart,
And flattery lulls life's troubled waters)
To have the queen of earth's fair daughters
As guardian of the noblest part,
There dwell forever. Like the star
That led the wise men from afar,
To where the Saviour lay;
Guide thou, through life's all bitter task,
My yearning soul, till it shall bask
In God's all-glorious day.

THE POLISH DAUGHTER.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

In the happy days of Poland, before her powerful neighbors had banded to blot her name from the roll of nations, none of her lords could boast of a more peaceful life than the Count Eustace Altemayne, a noble in nature as well as title. His youth and manhood had been devoted zealously to the service of his king and country, and it was not until his hair was thickly sprinkled with gray, that he thought of retiring to the happiness of private life. There was too much unswerving patriotism in his nature to admit of being swayed by the love of popular applause or kingly favor, and with no selfish end to gain, it became a second nature for him to yield to the wishes of those about him as regarded his continuance in the service of the state.

His fiftieth birthday came, and as he listened to the congratulations of those around him, he took a new determination, resigned his office, bade adieu to court, and forming an alliance with the young daughter of a noble Polish house, he retired to an ancient castle which overhung a mountain stream, to spend his remaining days.

Deeply absorbed in study and contemplation, from year to year, he noticed not the gradual decline and wasting away of his lovely bride. He had taken her away from the bosom of a happy family, from the pleasant valley where all her days had been passed, and the recollection of this in her rocky home, could do no otherwise than render her unhappy. Daily and almost perceptibly the bloom vanished from her cheek and a slow consumption fretted away her life; but the dissembling smile was ever at hand when in the presence of her husband, and he marked not her decline. The secret was jealously guarded until the last, and then Count Eustace awoke to the bitter knowledge of his abstraction and unintentional neglect when too late.

"Leila!" he cried, in anguish, as he bowed his head and wept beside her couch, "why would you not admonish me of my cruel neglect and selfishness in bringing thee to this harsh and dreary place? Wretch that I was to tear thee from the arms of loving parents, of fond brothers and sisters, to languish and die unnoticed! And that thou shouldst simulate happiness when the worm was gnawing at thy heart! Darling Leila, thou wilt surely forgive me, but my life henceforth must be given to remorse!"

"Eustace," said the dying wife, "never reproach yourself for my death, nor despair of future happiness! Was it not for love of thee that I came hither, that love that has given me strength to suffer in silence rather than pain your heart by revealing my disease? The seeds of death were planted within me long ere I became your bride, and death has but fulfilled his appointed time. Speak not," she continued, "of a life of bitterness. I entrust to you a precious charge, and as you fulfil your trust, so shall be the happiness of your life. In our child, the infant Flora which I leave behind, behold me, my husband! All the care and tenderness which you reproach yourself for sparing me, lavish upon her; be to her all that her tender years require, and thus gain happiness for both."

The countess died that night, and, in pursuance of her latest wish, her remains were conveyed to the home of her childhood; and buried beneath the trees which overshadowed the mansion. The stricken Count Eustace there took up his abode with his orphaned daughter, and prepared to religiously guard and watch over her, true to the promise made her dying mother.

The little Flora, then a child of twelve, had in the eyes of an apprehensive father, the same pale mournful beauty as the dead countess. There was a spiritual loveliness about the dark, slender maiden which early spoke to him of disease and death. He even fancied that the large and sadly expressive eyes which looked into his were those which had regarded him fondly yet mournfully from the bed of death; in the hand-clasp of his daughter, he seemed to feel the gentle pressure of his lost Leila's fingers, and the words were ever in his ears, "In the infant Flora which I leave behind, behold me, my husband!"

Daily she sat beneath the tree which shadowed her mother's grave, and often she lingered for hours, wrapped in meditations of which she alone could tell. Sometimes at night she sat by her window and gazed fixedly out upon the grave, still thinking thoughts which never grew monotonous, and finding strange consolation in the soft breathing of the wind through the cypress tree. It was here that her father surprised her as he wandered at night through the halls and chambers of the house.

"Child, child," he exclaimed, "why dost thou look so earnestly at that lonely grave? Surely thou art unable to remember thy mother, and thy sorrow cannot be as deep as mine."

"Nay, father," replied Flora, sadly shaking her head, "I was present when she died, and heard her words concerning me that I should be like her in your eyes! Well, I remember her, but above all I think of those words. Am I not like her?" she said, rising and throwing back her black hair.

"Strangely, wonderfully!" responded Count Eustace. "I could well imagine that my buried Leila stood before me! The words of thy mother were true, my child; in thee I have a living picture to remind me of my loss."

The count had now been many years removed from affairs of state, and had heard nothing of the expected storm which was to destroy the kingdom of Poland. The united sovereigns of Russia, Austria and Prussia had decreed the destruction of the unhappy country, partitioned it among them, and dethroned the unfortunate king. Thus the brave Poles saw with overwhelming grief their liberties demolished at a single blow, and themselves deprived at once of a country they might call their own and the Polish name their fathers had worn so proudly. Resolved upon one desperate attempt, they flew to arms, and the rallying cry went over the length and breadth of the land. With the indignation of a devoted patriot, Count Eustace heard the intelligence of the dastard act of the surrounding kingdoms, and despite his extreme age he nobly buckled on the sword and joined the ranks of the defenders. The strength of patriotism, and the old fire of devotion to his native land burned in his breast and nerved his arm.

"Farewell, my beloved Flora," he said, at parting, "I leave to God the issue of this fight! If he shall see fit to favor our arms, I may return to you in safety, but if the tyrant of Russia must indeed prevail, I will not ask to live."

"Father," replied the maiden, "I can see the issue plainer than thou. Alas, our country is destined to lie for many years beneath the oppressor's heel; and still, my father, go forth and fight, although the end will be sure defeat and exile from our home."

"Flora, how is it that you speak with this certainty?"

"I feel it to be true! Something prophesies within me that it is even so!"

They parted, and Count Eustace hastened to Warsaw where the brave Kosciuszko was marshalling his troops for the defence of the city. Everywhere there was an earnest determination to fight to the last, but few or none were hopeful of victory. Russia had poured her myriad legions into the devoted country, and the city of Warsaw was doomed from the beginning. The plains were all black with countless assailants; opposed to them were a few desperate Poles, a mere handful in the comparison. For a time the city was resolutely defended and the Russians beaten back, but as the little band of defenders grew weaker, the swarming thousands scaled the walls and gained possession of the fortifications. Ill-fated Warsaw was abandoned to all the horrors of sack and pillage, and the infuriated enemies sated themselves with blood and violence through that night of horrors.

Count Eustace Altemayne had fought desperately but without hurt through the whole conflict, and when at last there remained no hope, he had made his escape from the city and hastened across the country to secure the safety of his daughter. Already the decree of proscription had been published, and the aged count, among others, was outlawed and commanded to leave the country on pain of death. It was a hard alternative to the old man whose life had been spent in the service of his native land, and doubly hard because the remains of his lost bride were buried there in that quiet valley. The father and daughter stood by that spot so dear to their hearts, and bade it a long, last adieu. The old man's tears fell like rain as he bowed himself upon the grave, but Flora gave no token of her grief except that her saddened face grew sadder still, and her mournful eyes were fixed long upon the grassy mound, as if seeking to picture it indelibly upon her heart. Carefully she removed a tiny floweret, one of many which her own hands had planted, and then the desolate exiles turned away to seek for a home in a strange land. * * *

"Father, it will not live! It is dying, surely dying."

"What is dying, my child?"

"The flower which I plucked from my mother's grave. See how it hangs its head and how its withered leaves droop; I have tended it carefully. I have watered it with my tears, yet it dies!"

The exiles had journeyed far from their Polish home, and found, at length, a refuge upon the harsh Baltic shore of Prussia. In a dilapidated fisherman's hut these noble victims of royal tyranny were dragging out their lives, seeing no human beings but the coarse inhabitants of the fisher village, yet living uncomplainingly in this bleak spot.

The flower which Flora had plucked from her mother's grave she had planted carefully in a sheltered corner of the rocks, and tended by her zealous hands it seemed at first to give promise of flourishing in this uncongenial soil, but after a time it faded and drooped.

"But why, my child," said the count, "should you care for a little flower like this?"

"I know not how or why it is," replied the daughter, "but something tells me that my life and the existence of the flower are one. I felt this when I plucked it, and when I saw that it gave promise of life, the grave seemed further off, but now that it droops, I am faint and weary, and know that with it my life must end." The old man gazed upon her in awe. Her face was paler than ever before, and there shone a strange light in her eyes.

"Child of mystery," he exclaimed, "art thou Flora or Leila? Thou art so like her whom I wept over years ago, that I could believe she had come back to earth. But thou wilt not die! I am aged and feeble, and should be unable to live without thee."

But from that hour his pale, spirit-like child sickened and grew weak, and when at last she closed her eyes in death, so calmly and peacefully that the aged mourner knew not when it was, she held a withered flower in her pale, cold hand.

At her lonely grave among the rocks, the bowed form of the heart-broken Count Eustace was sometimes seen, but at last he disappeared from the neighborhood. The peasants of the Polish valley soon after found him stretched upon the grave of his bride. They called to him but received no answer; they raised him up and looked wonderingly at the pleasant smile upon his face. It was the smile of death.

THE PRESENT.

Seek not to know to-morrow's doom;
That is not ours, which is to come.
The present moment's all our store;
The next, should Heaven allow,
Than this will be no more:
So all our life is but one instant now.

CONGREVE.

When some of his courtiers endeavored to excite Philip the Good to punish a prelate who had used him ill—"I know," said he, "that I can revenge myself, but it is a fine thing to have a revenge in one's power and not use it."

MUSIC.

BY KITTIE KING.

There is music in the murmur
Of the swiftly gushing rill,
As it windeth through the valley,
Round the green and mossy hill;
There's music in the merry laugh,
And in the sunny smile;
O, in all things there is music,
When the heart is free from guile.

There is music in the sighing
Of the sad and moaning breeze,
When the autumn leaves are dying,
Falling sadly from the tree;
There is music in the breaking
Of the waves upon the sea;
O, in all things there is music,
When the heart is light and free.

There is music in the roaring
Of the thunder's deafening crash,
While the heavens are all illumined
With the lightning's brilliant flash;
There is music in the tempest,
Howling wildly through the wood;
O, in all things there is music,
When the heart is pure and good.

There is music in the singing
Of birds within the dell;
There's music in the ringing
Of the holy Sabbath bell;
There's music in a low, sweet voice,
To cheer us on our way;
O, in all things there is music,
When the heart is light and gay.

THE YOUNG BRAKEMAN.

BY M. A. AVERY.

"Go it, Ned, you're a gallant fellow," shouted the railroad boys, laughingly; as Ned Lovell unexpectedly caught a fair lady in his outstretched arms. She had missed her footing in stepping from the cars at the Launay station, upon a cold winter's day; and but for Ned's observant eye and ready hand, would have had a severe fall.

"Are you hurt?" he asked, anxiously, as he placed the lady upon her feet and looked into her beautiful, blushing face.

"No, only vexed that I should make such a ridiculous blunder," she replied.

"It was nothing. Let the fools laugh. Are you alone?"

"I expected a friend, but I do not see him anywhere."

"Condescend to take my arm then, and I will conduct you into the station-house;" said Ned, gallantly.

"Thanks; you are very kind," she whispered, as she did so.

"No, the kindness is all on your side. You honor a poor brakeman by your condescension. Good-by."

Edward bowed himself out, sprang up to his station, and was whirled away by his snorting steam-steed, with a heart so full of new and surprising sensations as to make him forgetful for a time, of his necessary duties.

"What a fool I am," he mentally murmured, when reminded of his neglect, "to be so upset by a pair of bright eyes and rosy lips; whose owner is evidently as far above me as the heavens are above the earth. Her ermine tippet alone would buy my whole wardrobe a dozen times over, to say nothing of the plumes, silks and velvets. I must forget this brilliant vision."

Did he ever forget it, or cease to look for that passenger when the train stopped at the Launay station? We think not. But spring came and went without her, and the smiling summer had already clothed the earth with her flowery carpet, when he one day neared the well remembered station again, with the beautiful image in mind.

For some distance before reaching Launay village, the road ran through a deep cut, with steep banks on each side, at an angle of thirty or forty degrees; upon the top of one of which, guarded only by a slight railing, ran the public highway. As they neared the location, letting off steam as usual, to stop the train at the depot, Edward noticed the advance of an elegant equipage towards them upon the highway; and presently saw that the horse was rearing and plunging, frightened at the shrieking engine, and quite unmanageable.

Nearer and nearer it came, and just as it was within a few yards of the train, the wheel crashed against the railing, the carriage upset, and its occupant, a pale, white-haired old man, was thrown forcibly over, and came rolling helplessly down towards the railroad. In an instant he would have been crushed beneath the remorseless engine, had not Edward, quick as thought, bounded from the train and caught him just in time to save him from a horrible death, which he would have shared with him but for the frail support of a sprig of laurel, at which he caught as he was himself slipping down with his helpless burden.

He dragged the frightened old man up the steep bank, helped him over the railing, and then without waiting for thanks, ran back towards the station-house, fearing the train would start before he could reach his post. As he did so, a glittering object at his feet arrested his attention, and stooping down he picked up an elegant gold watch, with a part of the guard chain attached, which the old gentleman had evidently lost in his unlucky gyrations. He had but just time to get to his post before he was whirled away amid the cheers of the bystanders, who had witnessed the spectacle, and before his terrified protege had at all collected his scattered senses.

"You're always in luck, Ned Lovell, whether it's for catching up pretty girls, or miserly old curmudgeons;" shouted Bill Snooks; "but hang me if I'd risk my life for such an old wretch as Phil Lee."

"You know the gentleman, then?"

"I've reason to know him, the hypocritical old reprobate. He's as rich as Cæsus, but as tight as the bark of a tree to his help."

"But why do you think him so mean and miserly?"

"Because he pretends to piety, and yet all the time keeps heaping up riches, in the shape of stocks, and mills, and city lots, and broad acres, which he'll most likely take to another world with him when he goes, for fear it would do somebody some good here if he left it. I expect he starved his wife to death, when she died; and his only daughter I've no doubt he'd swap away for a gold piece any day."

"You seem very bitter against him, perhaps your judgment is warped in some way."

"Not at all. Wight will tell you that I speak the truth. We've both been in his employ, I reckon."

"Yes, indeed," echoed Wight, "and a meaner man I never wish to see. Your heroism in thrown away in saving the life of such a man, Ned Lovell. You'd better let him have gone to the deuce, and done with it."

A few weeks after this, as Edward was stepping from the train in the Boston depot, he unexpectedly encountered the same old gentleman he had picked up on the road, and taking the watch from his pocket, he stepped up and asked if it belonged to him.

"Yes indeed," said the gentleman, with a smile, "here are my initials engraved on the back. But how—where—" he looked up, but Edward had vanished. He would not wait to be questioned, or thanked by a character so despicable as he supposed Phil Lee to be; and he scorned the idea of taxing the generosity of a miser for a reward.

But Edward was deceived after all by his associates, who had been dismissed from the gentleman's employ for gross neglect of duty; for he was really a good, generous, and noble-spirited man, though a proud one; rapidly increasing in wealth, it is true, but getting it honestly, and spending it for good and philanthropic purposes.

He knew Edward at once, and being deeply grateful for the life he had saved, and highly pleased with the honesty he displayed in returning the watch so promptly, he was a good deal disappointed at his leaving him so suddenly.

"This young man evidently wishes to remain unknown to me," he said to himself. "I discover the ingenuousness of modest diffidence in his countenance, as well as an uncommon share of energy and good sense. They tell me he is only a common hand upon the road, but I am very sure he is capable of filling much higher positions. I must look to it by-and-by."

Being an ingenious, witty, good-looking and generous-hearted fellow, Edward was admired and appreciated by his set; but as he was young, poor, unpolished, and had no powerful friends to recommend him, he had hitherto been compelled to toil in the ranks, with little prospect of promotion elsewhere.

But a change came at last, and promotions followed so rapidly that he himself wondered how his merits came to be discovered and appreciated. He proved himself capable of every trust committed to his charge, however, and now that the spirit of ambition was fairly roused, it seemed astonishing how fast he improved in person, mind and manners.

After confining himself to his dangerous business for many months, Edward got a month's leave of absence, and went to visit his widowed mother in the country.

She was poor and partly dependent upon his exertions for a support. But since he left home she had taken a few boarders from the fashionable school lately established there, and when he had visited her since, their presence had been rather annoying to him. But now it was vacation, he reflected, and they would all be gone, and when he left the cars a mile or two from home, and marched off across the fields, in preference to taking the stage, he looked forward with pleasure to the long and uninterrupted interview he should have with a mother who was very dear to him.

His course led along the banks of a little lake, where he had often wandered and sported in childhood, and he was standing in a deeply shaded nook that overlooked the lake, thinking intently of the past; when his musings were interrupted by the rustling of the leaves and branches near him; and a minute afterwards, a female form crept into view, upon the lower branch of an old tree that grew out horizontally over the water, some twenty feet.

Her face was half concealed by an odious bloomer hat; but the fine form, and graceful motions, could not fail to arrest his attention; and the trouble she had in arranging her fashionable skirts excited his mirth to such a degree, that decorum alone prevented his indulging in a hearty burst of laughter. Having arranged them at last to her satisfaction, the young lady sat down in the crooked seat he remembered of old, took a book from her pocket, and went to reading.

But her mind evidently soon wandered from the printed page to the works of nature around her; and in looking up she discovered the tiny nest of a humming bird upon one of the drooping branches. She rose suddenly, and in stepping forward with the book in one hand, and the other outstretched towards the prize, her foot slipped, and she was precipitated down.

But O, Shade of Eugenie! what a fall was there! Those abominable crinolines, ropes, hoops and what not, caught firmly upon a broken branch, and in spite of her shrieks and struggles, hung the fair lady up between the heavens and the earth, with her head and shoulders submerged in the dark waters.

Edward forgot to laugh at the ridiculousness of her position, when he saw the imminent danger she was in from drowning; but with his usual readiness, he pulled out and opened his jack-knife, while running with all speed to the rescue. The water was not more than waist deep; and rushing in as quick as possible, he raised the fair maiden out of it with one hand, while he hacked off the odious hoops with the other, and then brought her safe to land.

She had struggled and swung herself out of the water, and shrieked and tore at her stout garments, till she was strangled, and her strength exhausted, and now she was black in the face and nearly senseless.

He laid her down gently upon the soft, mossy bank, and was parting the dark, dishevelled hair from her face, when she caught her breath and began to revive. He then raised her to a sitting posture, and supported her with his arm, till she became sensible of surrounding objects. He watched the changing hues upon her countenance with the deepest interest, and when it resumed its natural color, he ventured to ask in a low tone if she was better.

As she turned and looked up eagerly in his face, the truth flashed upon her palsied mind, and overcome with shame and confusion, she covered her face with her hands and burst into tears.

"Do not let it distress you," he said, guessing her feelings; "we are all liable to accidents, and let us thank God that this did not end fatally."

Deeply mortified at the accident, and frightened to find herself in the arms of a stranger, the girl started up as soon as she had collected her senses and ran away with the speed of an antelope.

"That's cool, any way," exclaimed Edward, as he looked after her with an eager, half-provoked air. "She didn't even stop to thank me for this ducking, to say nothing of all the anxiety she has given me for a year or more." For in this pretty wood and water nymph, he had discovered his fair innamorata of the Launay station.

He sat down and mused upon it for a while regretfully, and then hunting up his carpet bag, he took out a pretty, white summer suit, made himself presentable, and marched on towards home. He had sent no word of his coming, hoping to give his mother a pleasant surprise, so in he walked without ringing, just as they were sitting down to dinner.

"Why, Edward, did you rain down to us?" said his mother, as she rose to greet him; and then turning, she presented, "my son" to "Miss Jennie Le Roy, one of my boarders, who is spending the vacation with me, in the absence of her father from the city."

Edward could hardly command his countenance, when in Miss Le Roy he recognized the heroine of the morning; and the maiden herself sufficiently betrayed her confusion at the sight of him. She rose, as if to fly from the room; then sat down again, blushing to the roots of her hair, and seeming more than half inclined to cry. He saw it all, and charitably withdrew his mother's attention from her till the meal was nearly over; and then the old lady being called out of the room, he said, "I hope you feel no bad effects from your accident this morning?"

"No," said Miss Jennie, and her face flushed up in an instant. "But I will not stay here to be the butt of your ridicule and the laughing stock of the whole village. I will go home this very day." And up she rose to leave the room.

"Forgive me," said Edward, as he intercepted her flight, "if I wounded your feelings by alluding to the subject; and believe me when I say that you will meet with no ridicule or exposure from me, and no one else knows anything of the occurrence."

"But it mortifies me to think—" she began.

"Think nothing about it then; or if you do, remember that you were saved from a fearful death," said he, seriously.

"You must think me an ungrateful girl, but I am not," said she, feelingly; "I am deeply sensible of the value of the service you rendered me on this, and I believe on a former occasion; but I must confess that I am foolishly sensitive to ridicule. Will you pardon my rudeness and seeming ingratitude?"

"Yes, if you will promise not to run away because of my coming home," he answered, laughingly.

Whether she promised or not, the young lady did not run away, and strangely enough, before the month was over, she forgot that she was a rich man's daughter and he a poor woman's son. Young and unhackneyed in worldly wisdom, she thought of no harm from the intimate companionship that grew up between them; nor did she analyze her own feelings enough to know why it was she derived so much pleasure from his society. Gradually as their acquaintance progressed, she forgot rank and caste, in looking into his handsome face, or listening to his eloquent voice; and when leaning upon his arm in their pleasant woodland rambles, or mingling in the home circle which his presence made a paradise, she little dreamed how immeasurably her friends would think she was descending in the social scale by such companionship. But their parting at the end of the month, and the feeling of desolation that came over her after he was gone, gave her some clue to the secret of her heart's mysteries.

But Edward himself was not so ignorant of the state of his own feelings. He knew that he loved her from the first; but he also knew how wide a chasm separated them; a chasm which hope and ambition whispered he might o'erleap at some future time, if he could inspire her with kindred sentiments. He dared not ask her if he had done this, as yet; though the question trembled upon his lips in the hour of parting; but he resolved to accept the invitation to call upon her in her city home, and did so a few months afterwards. He knew that she was then moving like a brilliant star in the most fashionable circles, and hardly dared to approach her in her splendid mansion; but he did so, and was received with evident pleasure. He repeated the call again and again, with like success, and each successive visit his hopes grew brighter.

"What young man was that I met upon the steps as I came in to-night, Jennie?" said that young lady's father to his daughter one evening.

"I suppose it was Mr. Lovell," said Jennie, with a blush.

"Lovell—Lovell—I know of no respectable young man of that name, I am sure. Pray tell us who and what he is?" And he gave her a keen, searching look.

"He is the son of the lady I boarded with in the country last year," said Jenny, faintly.

"What, a poor country clown! Surely you are not keeping up a clandestine acquaintance with such a fellow as that. Tell me, has he been here before?"

"He has," said Jennie, firmly.

"How many times?"

"I cannot tell."

"Ah, then I have purposely been kept in ignorance of the fact," said he, frowningly. "Is it not so?"

"No, dear father, but he always happened to call in your hours of business, and I am sure I thought no harm of it."

"Well, it's time the acquaintance was dropped, and you may tell him so if he calls again."

"But father," said she, beseechingly.

"Let there be no buts about it. Those people were poor and low, and not fit associates, for the heiress of all my wealth; and if I had known the woman had a son, I would not have allowed you to remain there so long."

Jennie dared not reply to this, for she had been taught to yield unquestioning obedience to her father's wishes, but from some cause her pillow that night was wet with tears.

When Edward called again he thought Jennie looked pale and discomposed, and was more silent and reserved than usual.

"Are you ill, Miss Le Roy, or am I an unwelcome visitor?" he asked, unable to endure the suspense it cost him.

"Neither," said Jennie, hesitatingly, "or at least, not unwelcome to me, but—but—I wish you would not come here again at present. My father is displeased; and perhaps I have done wrong in receiving you without his knowledge."

It evidently cost her a great struggle to say this, and she colored painfully under his searching gaze, as she did so.

"He knew nothing of my coming then?"

"No, I believe not," said Jennie, with downcast eyes.

"Miss Le Roy, did you mean to deceive him, and bewilder me, with the vain hope that I might one day win a return of the passionate love I bear you, for the pleasure of casting me off at last?" said he, passionately. "O, must I believe that you, whose image is enshrined in the holiest recesses of my heart, could deceive me with the wiles of a coquette?"

"No, no," said Jennie, "do not believe it."

He got up and paced the floor as she said this, and at last stopping before her, he said, "I see how it is. I ought not to blame you that I have deceived myself with false hopes. I should have known better than to raise my eyes to one so far above me in wealth and station. I should have known that your friends would scorn me, and that with your education, intellect, and high social position, you yourself would look down on one so poor, unpolished and superficial as myself; and only tolerate my presence from motives of generous pity. But it is all over now. I shall trouble you no more by my presence. I go, and must bid you an everlasting farewell."

"Edward," she sobbed, "it were better I know, but I cannot allow one to whom I owe my life to go, believing that I have carelessly deceived and sported with his feelings. I was grateful for the great service you rendered me at first; and my treatment of you since has ever been but a reflex of my feelings. What can I say more?"

"Say, O say that you do return my fond love."

"Well, I do, though I ought not to say it."

"O, may I believe this, dear Jennie," said he.

"It is true, what else is false," said she, blushing.

"And yet you bade me leave you."

"I knew not that you cared for me then, and only did as my father bade me."

"And is there nothing that will win his favor but the gold for which so many give their lives?"

"I fear not; he has ever favored the richest of my suitors."

"Then I will remove mountains but what I will win it, if you will wait for me, dear Jennie. I have this very day received a tempting offer to go to the land of gold, which for your sake I will accept to-morrow. If I win what I go to seek, I will return and claim your hand. If I die, drop a tear to one who loves you better than life."

"It were a pity to spoil such a beautiful romance as this," said Jennie's father, stepping out from behind the shadowy damask window curtain, and looking from one to the other with a quizzical air. "I little thought," he continued, "when I dropped off into a doze upon that window seat this evening, that I was to be a witness in my dreams of such an interesting theatrical performance as this."

Both gazed upon the old gentleman for a moment in astonishment; and then Jennie, with the exclamation "Father!" upon her lips, sank into a seat, and covered her face with her hands, while Edward drew himself up proudly and defiantly, as if prepared for a storm, being none the less astounded at his sudden appearance, than at the discovery that it was the father of the girl he loved so fondly, whose life he had saved upon the railroad.

There was a silence of some minutes, and then the old gentleman said, "Do you remember me, young gentleman?"

"I think I do," said Edward, drily.

"And do you think I owe you anything?"

"A few curses, perhaps, for stealing your daughter's heart."

"And how much gold for the life you perilled your own to save?"

"None. I never peril my life for gold."

"Ah, but you do it every day; and did I not hear you just now, offering to do it for Jennie?"

"That is a different matter altogether, and for her no sacrifice were too dear."

"I see, you value her life a great deal higher than mine; but it suits me just now to estimate both at the same price. You evidently think me a stingy old fellow, who values a copper higher than he does his life; and I shall have to give you my Jennie, and my whole fortune, before you will change your mind."

"You mock me," said Edward, disdainfully.

"We will see. Come here, Jennie."

She obeyed tremblingly.

"Now, Jennie, is what you told this young fellow just now true, about loving him, and so on?"

"Yes, father," said Jennie, hanging her head.

"And you love her, do you sir?"

"Better than the whole world beside," said he.

"Well, then, I shall not be the one to separate you; for my daughter's happiness is more precious to me than my whole fortune. It is true, Edward Lovell, that I should not have selected one in your station for my daughter's husband; but knowing that she has made her own choice, and that it has fallen upon one to whom I owe a deep debt of gratitude, I cheerfully acquiesce in her decision; and the more readily, as I know she has chosen worthily."

"I am deeply grateful for your kindness and forbearance," said Edward; "but how know you aught of my merits?"

"Do not think because you avoided my acquaintance, that my watchful eye has not been upon you," said Le Roy, smilingly. "I heard of your filial devotion; of your triumphant resistance of strong temptation; of your native talent, courage, and nobleness of soul, till I learned to admire your character; and unknown to you, my influence as director of the road, has been at work in your behalf ever since our first fortunate meeting. But for all that, I did not know that it was your mother to whom I sent my daughter in the country, at the recommendation of a friend, or your mother's son I bade her dismiss the other day from her presence."

"Nor did I know that you were Miss Le Roy's father till this evening, as I had heard you called by another name," said Edward, smiling.

Jennie was surprised and pleased to find that her father and Edward knew each other. Mutual explanations followed, and the evening passed pleasantly to all parties. Before long the old firm of Philip Le Roy received the addition of a new partner in Jennie's husband, who proved a valuable acquisition to the establishment.

THE OLD YEW TREE.

BY CHARLES GRISWOLD.

The old yew tree, by the cottage door,
Which sheltered my boyhood's home,
With twisted trunk and branches awry,
I see thee wherever I roam.

In summer days, as the hours pass by,
Sweet visions of boyhood I see;
What hopeful dreams of coming years
Were nursed 'neath the old yew tree.

The sunlight played on its pointed leaves,
Which shaded the ivy-capped walls;
Far sweeter to me is the old yew tree
Than the glory of festive-lit halls.

The frosts of old age have silvered my hair,
Once golden and waving in glee;
But memory's pinions my spirit bear
Far back to the old yew tree.

When shadows of death my eyelids shade,
And the old man no more you will see,
Let the green grass wave where my body is laid,
At the foot of the old yew tree.

KIDNAPPING A BRIDE.

BY ERNESTINE HAMILTON.

HENRY MURRAY, a young man of twenty-four years, tall and manly, was riding on a spirited horse through a lovely part of the State of New York towards the metropolis, whence he expected soon to depart on a tour through Europe.

Wrapped in meditation, he heeded naught until he heard a long, loud cry, full of suffering, and looking around hastily, he saw himself directly before an old brown farm-house, from which the cry proceeded. He listened; it was repeated, together with loud angry tones, and the young man with one bound sprang from his horse and entered the open door. A stout, red-faced woman was cruelly beating a girl, whose slight form shrank from every blow. His looks of indignation only served to increase the ire of the woman.

"Stop, I command you!" cried Henry.

A look, half of fear, half defiance, rested on the woman's face as she said, "I've a right to treat her as I please, I guess, for all a stranger."

"She isn't my mother," sobbed the girl, gliding to Henry's side for protection.

"Say that again, will you?" exclaimed the woman, furiously, at the same time advancing with her heavy riding-whip uplifted.

"Save me! save me!" she cried, in terror.

"Fear not, you are safe," returned Henry, in a re-assuring tone, and turning to the woman he said, "Madam, if she is your child, how comes it that you are destitute of every natural feeling?"

"I didn't say she was mine; she's my husband's, and I'll treat her as I please," returned the woman, doggedly.

"Where is your husband?" he asked.

"Father's gone away, a great ways," sobbed the child.

"Who told you to speak, I'd like to know, miss? but I'll soon settle with you," she added, shaking the whip significantly.

"When do you expect your father?" he asked of the girl.

"To-morrow. Mother don't treat me so when father's here," she said, clinging closer to his coat. "At least when he's sober," she added.

Harry reflected for a moment that he might be making matters worse, and if the father would return so soon, he had better leave them, and he said to the woman, "Madam, remember there comes the judgment, and what will your sentence be, if you continue to crush the spirit of this child? and—"

"None of your business!" retorted the woman.

"Don't leave me! I hate her! She will kill me!" cried the child, passionately clinging to his coat as he turned to depart.

A sudden thought struck him. "Will you go with me?" he asked, kindly.

"O yes, take me with you! she will kill me when you are gone."

Henry gathered the child in his arms, and saying "good-morning," coolly, he took the child and placed her on the saddle before him. He bowed to the enraged being who ran screaming to the gate, but she was too late, and the horse went swiftly on with its double burden, while the woman, vowing vengeance, ran in to devise some way of pursuing them.

The strangeness of the occurrence suddenly flashed over Henry's mind, and he became aware of his own imprudence, and the thought that he might have incurred the penalty of the law, made him uneasy.

"Whose house is that?" he asked, to divert his thoughts, as he entered the suburbs of a beautiful little village.

"Squire Morton's; he's a magistrate," answered his little protegee.

With a sudden resolution he alighted, and taking the little bare-headed girl, entered the open door and asked for Mr. Morton.

"I am he," answered a portly man, advancing.

Henry told him all the circumstances and found that he was indeed liable to imprisonment for "kidnapping."

"What can I do? Surely not return her to her step-mother."

"You might marry her," said the magistrate.

"How old are you?" asked Harry, of the girl.

"Fourteen to-day."

"Good in law," said the 'squire.

"Will you marry us?" asked Harry, glad to get out as easy as that.

"No I won't, but get some parson; I wish not to offend the girl's father who is a troublesome fellow, though I pity the girl."

"Can you direct us to a minister?"

"You will find one next door. Betty may call him in, if you wish."

Henry took the young girl aside and asked her consent, telling her that otherwise she must return to her mother; the child gratefully accepted his offer, and in a few moments more Nellie Brown and Henry Murray were man and wife.

Immediately after the ceremony, Henry procured his bride a bonnet and shawl, and they resumed their journey. They rode all night in the cars and the next day were near the metropolis. Nellie was weak and tired after her long and wearisome journey, and it was the second afternoon ere they alighted on the broad steps of a fashionable boarding-school. It was the last day of June, and madame was surprised at receiving a pupil the day after the school was dismissed; but Henry gracefully apologized and said to her:

"I am going to Europe, and shall leave my ward behind. I shall be happy to leave her in your establishment, assured that her interests will be well cared for. Madame Wilson will remember that I had once a cousin under her charge."

"Annie Murray! Ah, yes I remember; she was a favorite pupil," and madame smoothed her black silk dress complacently.

"I hope Miss Nellie Murray will receive your kindest care."

"Be assured she will, sir," but madame gave a glance at the brown elfin locks, at the plain calico dress, and thought, "can she be a Murray? She will be a disgrace to me." But she changed her opinion when she saw the full purse that he placed in her hand for clothing to be procured for his ward, and when she knew that Nellie possessed such another. They parted, and that was the first real look Henry had of his bride's face.

"I must say 'farewell' now, Nellie; keep our marriage a secret till I return."

"Shan't I wear the ring?" whispered Nellie, as she turned the golden circlet around her finger.

"Yes, you will never take it off, my dear! Think sometimes of me, and write often. Don't be turned from the right by any one, and be a noble woman; for my sake as well as your own." And Henry pressed her to his bosom, kissed her, and was gone.

When school again opened, Nellie who was now quiet and self-possessed, watched with intense interest for her who was to share her room. One young lady, who came at the close of the first school-day, proved to be the one, and as Nellie gazed at her, she felt that Julia Stanley could never be a dear friend and confidant to her. Julia was fifteen, taller than Nellie, with blue eyes, light hair and pretty features, with not more than a tithe of the expression which rendered Nellie so beautiful.

The first commencement day came, and Nellie outdid herself and mates; yet there was no eye to look on in approbation, or kindle with pride at her triumphs; she was alone. Then came a letter from Europe, from Henry himself, containing a jewelled locket, with his miniature. What a comfort it was to Nellie! how often she gazed on the semblance of that noble countenance and wept tears, many and of mixed emotions! Julia found one day that she possessed this locket, and she was determined to obtain it; one night when Nellie lay asleep, Julia gently unclasped it, and gazed long within it. She did not restore it, and Nellie grew pale and sad for its loss. A few weeks after she awoke one morning and found it on her bosom. Joy almost overcame her, but she could only conjecture whence it came.

It was almost two years when there came a watch, small and studded with costly gems, with a golden chain of exquisite workmanship, from the wanderer to Nellie. She became more than ever an object of wonder and admiration to her school friends, who seemed to think her gifted with Aladdin's lamp, or the cap of Fortunatus.

All the months Nellie had spent at Rockdale seminary had been filled with yearnings for sympathy, even as her whole life had been. True, she received affectionate letters from Henry, but they began, "Dear child," or in some such manner, not recognizing in her a right to womanhood and the love he should lavish on a wife. She knew why he married her and she resolved to win his love, to become such a woman as he would be proud to own.

The last day of Commencement had come, and it was Nellie's sixteenth birthday. She was to read an original poem, and as she stood on the stage, she entranced all by the beauty of her thoughts, the force of her expressions, as well as her own loveliness. Her form was slight, of medium height, with her face full of sensibility. There was a pure, radiant look on her handsome face, and her eyes flashed with thought and feeling, as noble as uncommon to most girls of her age.

Henry Murray, though unknown, was among the spectators, and though he had seen beauties of all descriptions, yet he yielded his heart to this unknown girl. He now for the first time regretted his marriage, for he felt that it would be an insurmountable barrier to any acquaintance with this peerless beauty.

He entered the parlor after the poem was concluded, and despatched a servant for Miss Murray. He paced the room till he heard a light step in the hall; turning, he saw the young poetess.

"Pardon me," said he, "is Miss Murray here?"

"I am she," said Nellie, demurely.

"Nellie! My wife, my own Nellie!" And she was clasped in his arms and her pale face pressed against his bronzed cheek.

Some of the school-girls entered, among others Julia Stanley, who failed to recognize in the bronzed and bearded man the hero of the locket. They saw with surprise the head of Nellie on this stranger's breast, but the head was not lifted even when Madame Wilson entered the room.

"Miss Murray, I am shocked; are you not aware that it is very improper for your head to lie there, even if he is your guardian? He is too young for such familiarities; come with me," said Madame Wilson, with some asperity.

The pupils in the hall gathered in, but still Nellie's head lay on Henry's breast, and when she strove to raise it he gently held it there.

"Madame Wilson, is it not natural that Mrs. Murray should welcome her husband with affection after such a long separation?"

"Nellie married! Impossible!"

"Not at all, madame, Nellie was my wife when I brought her here. I thank you for your care of her. Nellie," he said, "get ready to leave now."

Nelly glided away, and soon returned prepared to accompany her husband to his city home. The leave-taking was brief but affectionate between herself and companions, and in a few minutes she was seated by her husband's side, while the horse's heads were turned towards their home.

Nelly had never dared communicate with her childhood's home up to this time, but she soon learned that her father's intemperate habits had cost him his life. As to her own future, it was one of peaceful and abundant happiness.

BISHOP CHEVERUS.

An American gentleman once called on Cardinal Cheverus, and while talking with him of his old friends in America, said the contrast between the cardinal's position in the episcopal palace of Bordeaux and in his former humble residence when he was in Boston, was a very striking one. The humble and pious prelate smiled, and taking his visitor by the arm, led him from the stately hall in which they were conversing, into a narrow room furnished in a style of austere simplicity: "The palace," said he, "which you have seen and admired so much, is the residence of the Cardinal Archbishop of Bordeaux, but this little chamber is where John Cheverus lives."—Salina Eagle.

CURIOUS CASES OF RESEMBLANCE.

A young gentleman, articled to an attorney in London, was tried at the Old Bailey on the 17th and 19th of July, 1824, on five indictments for different acts of theft. A person resembling the prisoner in size and general appearance had called at various shops in the metropolis for the purpose of looking at books, jewelry, and other articles, with the pretended intention of making purchases, but made off with the property placed before him while the storekeepers were engaged looking out other articles. In each of these cases the prisoner was positively identified by several persons, while in a majority of them an alibi was as clearly and positively established; and the young man was proved to be of orderly habits and irreproachable character, and under no temptation for want of money to resort to dishonesty. Similar depredations on other tradesmen had been committed by a person resembling the prisoner; and these persons proved that, though there was a considerable resemblance in the prisoner, he was not the person who had robbed them. The prisoner was convicted upon one indictment, but acquitted on all the others, and the judge and jurors who tried the last three cases expressed their conviction that the witnesses had been mistaken, and that the prosecutors had been robbed by another person resembling the prisoner. A pardon was immediately procured in respect of that charge on which conviction had taken place.

Not many months before the last-mentioned case a respectable young man was tried for a highway robbery committed at Bethnal Green, in which neighborhood both he and the prosecutor resided. The prosecutor swore positively that the prisoner was the man who robbed him of his watch. The counsel for the prisoner called a genteel young woman, to whom the prisoner paid his addresses, who gave evidence which proved a complete alibi. The prosecutor was then ordered out of court, and in the interval another young man, of the name of Greenwood, who awaited his trial on a capital charge of felony, was introduced and placed by the side of the prisoner. The prosecutor was again put up in the witness-box and addressed thus; "Remember, sir, the life of this young man depends upon your reply to the question I am about to put. Will you swear again that the young man at the bar is the person who assaulted and robbed you?" The witness turned his head towards the dock, when beholding two men so nearly alike, he became petrified with astonishment, dropped his hat, and was speechless for a time, but at length declined swearing to either. The young man was of course acquitted. Greenwood was tried for another offence and executed; and a few hours before his death acknowledged that he had committed the robbery with which the other was charged.—Manchester Guardian.

The Richmond South says that a negro child has recently been born in the neighborhood of Kingold, in that county, with twenty-six fingers and toes. It has six toes on each foot, and seven fingers on each hand. There are two full sized thumbs on each hand, and two little fingers. All these limbs are said to be perfect.

DEATH.

BY BEATRICE.

I am a stranger in the land,
Where my forefathers trod;
A stranger I unto each heart,
But not unto my God!

I pass along the crowded streets,
Unrecognized my name;
This thought will come amid regrets,
My God is still the same!

I seek with joy my childhood's home,
But strangers claim the sod;
Not knowing where my kindred roam,
Still present is my God!

They tell me that my friends all sleep
Beneath the valley clod;
O, is not faith submissive sweet!
I have no friend save God!

MISER MARTYN.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

MISER MARTYN sat before his fire. It was a very low, poor fire, sending out but a few flickering rays over the crazy brick hearth upon which it was built; lighting up for a moment now and then, the old brown, barren-looking room; and throwing upon the wall opposite the sharp, thin features and form of the old man as he sat crouching there in his chair. O, what a ghostly face was that, that moved up and down, up and down upon the wall! The chin was sharp and peaked; the eyebrows heavy and over-arching, and the hair that rose above his forehead looked like a great crown resting there. His shoulders were drawn forward, and his long arms crossed upon his lap. O, how merry was the rosy, happy light, as it took the dark shadow playfully in its arms and rocked backward and forward with it, backward and forward upon the ceiling, holding it just as a mother would hold her babe to her bosom.

For a long time the flames danced about, and then faded slowly, slowly away, till they ceased altogether, and in their stead a bed of coals gleamed and shone upon the hearth. The miser rose up in his chair and cast a hurried glance at a small pile of wood in the corner, then sank back again and shook his head dolefully, wrapping the while his thin, tattered coat about him.

"No, no!" he said, eyeing the wood greedily, "no, I must burn no more to-night, though I freeze. Wood costs money, money, and money is everything, yes, everything! It is the only true friend I have ever found. I must hold fast to my money."

As he spoke he shook his head, earnestly, till the crown of silver hair that lay upon his forehead fell about his head and over his eyes like a white mist. Then he shivered, and brushed with his weak, trembling hands the hair from his eyes, and drew his chain nearer to the bright coals, muttering between his teeth as he did so "money, money, money!"

How he looked crouching there, just as he had crouched for years; till his manhood was wasted, his strength gone from him, and his heart hard like the gold he worshipped! Gold! what would he not suffer to feast his eyes upon it! As he sat there some one rapped upon the door of his room. It was a low, timid rap, but it startled him and he crept softly and stealthily to the little cupboard that contained his treasures, to assure himself that all was right there, before he ventured to open the door. A hard, crabbed expression spread over his face as he went forward and lifted the rusty latch.

A child appeared before him; a bright, happy looking little girl, with a world of light sparkling from the depths of her blue eyes, and her round, red lips dimpled about with smiles.

"I have brought you something," she said, holding out towards him upon a small plate, a hot, smoking biscuit.

"Who told you to bring it here?" asked the old man, gruffly, reaching out his poor hand as he spoke. "I sha'n't give you anything for it; I don't want it!"

"O, sir, but I don't want anything, and no one told me to bring it to you. I thought you didn't have any one to cook you nice things, and that you must be very lonesome; so I came. Wont you take the plate to eat it on?"

"No, no! take it home; don't bring me anything again," and he turned to close the door.

"Good-night!" rang out the clear, sweet voice of the child as she tripped away.

Miser Martyn stopped suddenly, and repeated the words over to himself—"good-night, good-night!"—then he put his head out of the door again to listen. The little girl had vanished in the darkness. He looked up the long flight of stairs by his door; peered about the large, old hall wonderingly. The sunbeam had left him, but where had it gone? So he went back to the coals upon his hearth, murmuring, not the word that had laid unholily upon his lips for years, but "good-night," in something like a softened tone. He set the biscuit down beside him, and bent his face upon his hands, looking with his great hollow eyes into the fire. The coals still glistened and sparkled, and the wind came in roaring gusts adown the chimney. It whistled about, and rattled the rickety windows, and shook as if it were a strong hand the loosely-hung doors; then howled low and mournfully until it died away in long, heavy breaths. But the old man did not heed it, he sat like one entranced. He could see his whole life from its first beginning up to the present moment stretched out like a path across the blazing coals.

He could see a red farm-house with roses growing by its sides, and lilacs and apple trees skirting the path that led from its door adown to the road. He could see trees clustering at its back; trees white and fragrant with blossoms in May, so full that they gave their leaves like pearls to crown the emerald beauty of the shining grass at their feet; white in May, but rich, red and purpling with fruit in the golden harvest time. Nearer, nearer the old man bent his head to the embers. He was not looking at the fields of clover that rolled away like purple oceans from the brown barn; not at the woods that rose up fresh and green in summer, and still fresh and green when the snow lay soft and white upon everything; not at the birds that sang, nor the brooks that slid and sparkled in the summer sunshine. No, he could see a sweet, pale-faced woman going about in the little red farm-house; a woman with a smile upon her lip that now seemed to him an eternal one. He bowed his head reverently. The pale hand of the woman was laid caressingly upon his hair; not hair silvered and frosted with age, but brown and glossy with youth. Gently, O, so gently! her hand rested upon his head and glided over his white, unbrowned forehead.

His eyes were bright and sparkling, and his cheeks flushed deeply with the vigor and health of boyhood. Nothing could check the flow of his ardent spirits. What a life lay before him! what happiness just within the outstretching of his young arms.

But a change comes. The little farm-house grows dark. Day by day the step of the sweet-faced woman lightens. Her smile grows sweeter all the while and her voice more tender and touching. By-and-by she does not leave her room. He brings her flowers every morning from the garden and meadow, and tears steal into his eyes as she smiles upon him. The times grow darker and darker, and he stays by her side all the time, until the darkness breaks out into a tempest. He looks upon the dead face of his mother. No more smiles are there for him; no more tender caresses; they are all buried in a bleak grave in the village burying-ground.

A long time passes and there is no light for him. His path is gloomy and cheerless. His home is no longer a home. A new mistress comes to preside over it. The roses bloom no more by the windows; nor the lilacs by the path that leads down to the road. There are no pleasant words for him, nothing but frowns and rebuffs. He goes away among strangers, and ere long a bright, cheery face is woven in with his hopes and dreams of the future. He labors and drudges, but cheerfully, since once more there is a bright place in his heart. He grows to be a strong man, and still that face is with him, daguerreotyped a living image upon his very soul. There comes a time of pleasant anticipations, and he talks of a home that will be his ere long; of a fair-faced girl who will soon be his wife.

But a demon whispers something in his ear; a word like gold, and it haunts him until he gives up the home, and turns his back upon the happiness that waited but for him to grasp it. He turns away from everything that will not yield him the harvest he seeks. He goes from his native land, and does not return until he brings with him coffers of yellow gold. Still he is not satisfied, still there is a vacant place within his soul. He wanders wearily about, asking everywhere for the young heart that he cast away from him years before; asking for the sweet-faced girl whose love he had repaid with ingratitude. But no one knows where she is. One person says she has married; another that she is dead, and still another that she went away off a long time ago, none knew whither. He never sees her again, and his life grows colder and harder every day. His gold is his god! he does not allow himself food enough for proper sustenance; cannot spare enough from his coffers to purchase himself a comfortable coat. He prays only over his gold; owns no friend but that; clasps nothing warmer in his trembling grasp, nothing more human. His life is worthless. He sees it in the dying, fading embers. It flows uselessly through his coffers of gold, out of them he does not exist. He sees suffering men, women and children in his way, stretching out their hands piteously to him, but he turns away from them, and hugs his treasures closer to him.

A groan burst from the miser's lips. The embers were almost dead. He held out his feeble arms towards the smouldering ruins. For a moment a single star of brightness rose above them, then all was darkness. Again the old man groaned and clasped his hands over his eyes to shut out the visions of the past. But he could not do it. The sweet-faced woman was by his side in the dark, rickety room. Again she spoke encouragingly to him; told him to be a brave, good man, loving his neighbors as himself; to be a tender man, a reverent man, helping the poor and down-trodden, the weary and afflicted; to give the destitute out of his abundance.

"I can't! I can't give up my gold!" broke from his lips. "What shall I do without my gold?"

The woman smiled and pointed towards the door. In an instant the thought flashed through his mind—the little girl smiled like his mother! He would give her all his wealth if she would come to him again!

All night long he sat alone in the darkness, thinking of his mother, the little girl and his gold; and when the morning came it found something like a smile upon his thin features. He built a fire upon the hearth, such an one as he had not allowed himself for a long time; bought a hot roll from the baker at the corner, and threw open the old rickety blinds, and sat in the sunlight by the window as he ate it. During the forenoon he waited and watched for the little visitor of the preceding evening, but she did not come. He looked out of the window and watched the people that poured out of the very house in which he lived. Old men bowed down with age; women with hungry-looking babes upon their bosoms, and little children in thin and scanty garments, with baskets upon their arms, went shivering in the keen and frosty air. Some returned while he sat there with small bits of coal in their baskets, and their hands bent and benumbed by the cold. Still the blue-eyed child for whom he waited came not.

The afternoon waned before her timid rap sounded upon his door.

"Come in!" called the voice of the old miser.

The child hesitated.

"Come in!" he called again; the second time in a pleasanter tone. The latch was slowly lifted, and the little girl entered the room. In her hand she held part of an apple, which she bashfully extended towards him.

"Do you know all the folks in this house?" asked Miser Martyn, shortly, drawing the child to him.

"Yes, sir."

"Are any of them poor?"

"Poor? O, yes, sir, very poor!"

"How many families live in the house?"

"As many as thirty, sir."

The old man shrugged his shoulders and clenched his fists, while the little one shied away from him.

"Do you know that I have gold?" he whispered in her ear, catching her by the arm again.

She gave a quick, startled glance into his face, and said:

"Some one told me so, but I didn't believe it because you always looked so poor."

"You may believe it, for I am going to feed all the people in this house, if you will help me. Only you must laugh for me—laugh a great deal!"

"Feed all the folks—I help him—laugh," repeated the child, not comprehending for a moment his words. "Do you mean that you will give them all something to eat? Mrs. Myers who has been sick so long, and the poor, lame shoemaker, and the little children whose mother is dead? all, every one? do you mean it?" she asked, her face radiant with joy.

"Yes, all of them," was the answer.

"Dear, dear me! then I am the happiest little girl in the world, and you are the best man! All of them?" and she clapped her hands and jumped up and down, and danced all about the room in her delight. The old man followed her, making a hobbling attempt to imitate her light, graceful motions.

"May I help you buy the things?" she asked, catching hold of his hand.

"Yes, yes, only laugh; laugh all the time!"

"We won't let them know anything about it, will we, and we will buy coal and bread for every one of them? o-o-oh! I am so happy!" and she commenced dancing about the room, again, while the old miser hobbled along after her.

The next day was one of thanksgiving to the poor, wretched inmates of that old house. Nearly all day marketmen, grocer boys and coal men, stopped before its door, and distributed their burdens in the dreary-looking rooms. Little children danced about before the warm fires that sparkled upon the hearths, and crowed at the sight of the food that was piled up in their narrow homes. Weary men and women took a new light in their hearts, and Alice, little Alice, who had labored all day with Miser Martyn, laughed and cried until she was hoarse at what she saw. The crowning joy of the day to her was, that the old man was going up stairs to board with her mother, on purpose to hear and see her laugh, he said; and that she should have nice and comfortable clothes and go to school all the time.

That night the pale, sweet-faced woman came to Miser Martyn in his dreams; came and lit up the whole long night with her smiles; and when he awoke in the morning, he said that his forehead was cool from the caressing of her hands.

"THIS IS A GREAT COUNTRY."

So say the boys, and the boys are generally right about these matters, for they have all statistical ideas pretty thoroughly cudgelled into their brains in their excellent common-school training; and they moreover feel that the country is great, in consequence of the free and independent spirit which pervades it, of which spirit their own crowding impulses and buoyant aspirations form an integral part. The United States are great, physically, socially, politically, morally and intellectually; great to-day, and great in the possession of the true elements of future grandeur. Nor can we find upon the page of history a parallel instance of national growth, either in rapidity or extent. By no mere human agencies can this wonderful growth be accounted for. The efforts of man would be powerless for such stupendous results. All that can be said towards solving the problem of American greatness, is, that the time had come! The Old World had done its appointed work; nation after nation had grown up, flourished, and perished from the face of the earth; tyranny and oppression had crushed the free spirit of man to the lowest point of compression; war upon war had desolated the fields of human industry, and the strong hand of power, temporal and spiritual, had shackled human thought and action. A mighty oppression demanded an adequate relief, and lo, the Huguenots of Carolina, the Cavaliers of Virginia, the Catholics of Maryland, and the Puritans of Massachusetts, braved the dangers of the pathless ocean, to establish a new nation upon a new continent, where man should be free, and government the servant of the people. The state of Europe in the sixteenth century, was the all-sufficient cause, in the hands of the Ruler of nations, for the settlement of America in the seventeenth, and the foundation and growth of our country. This wielding of mighty events by the Almighty Disposer, which men call destiny, and this alone, can account for the wonderful development of the United States of America.

The first settlements of our country date back but little more than two centuries and a half, and our national independence but about three quarters of a century. And yet we have a population of thirty millions, occupying thirty-one sovereign States, which are bound together in strongest and happiest ties of union, four extensive Territories rapidly filling up with enterprising and industrious settlers, and three others which are now knocking at the doors of Congress for admission as independent States. This great population is almost entirely the wonderful accumulation of eighty-two years, the number of inhabitants of the country at the period of the Declaration of Independence being only about three millions. During the same time the territorial extent of the United States has more than trebled, expanding from eight hundred and twenty thousand square miles to two millions nine hundred and thirty thousand; and every acre of this vast increase the result of purchase or peaceful negotiation, and not of conquest. The present territorial extent of the republic vies with that of the Roman empire or the conquests of Alexander the Great, neither of which, according to Voltaire, exceeded three millions of square miles. Our republic is three times as large as the whole of France, Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Holland and Denmark together, and only one sixth less than the whole European area covered by the sixty powers of that continent. According to Guyot's estimate of the area of North America, which is 5,472,000 square miles, exclusive of islands, our territorial possessions cover one half of this continent; other writers, however, make the area of North America somewhat larger; but by none of their estimates is our present territory brought so low as one-third of the whole. The bounties of climate, soil, mineral and vegetable productions, available sea-coast, and navigable rivers, are in full proportion to our extent of territory.

At the period when the first new States were admitted to the Union, viz., 1791—2, when Vermont and Kentucky were added to the old thirteen, our country occupied but little more than a narrow strip upon the Atlantic coast, extending from Maine to Georgia. The vast interior was an unexplored and almost unknown region, overrun by savage tribes. Now the whole continent from ocean to ocean, is permeated by American population and civilization; our eastern seaboard is extended far south into the Gulf of Mexico, the mighty valley of the Mississippi between the Alleghany and Rocky Mountains, is filled with prosperous and growing States, and the new States of California, Oregon and Washington have sprung up on the Pacific coast. The material wealth of our country is great, though not in excess, as compared with the countries of the Old World; yet a marked feature as contrasted with them, is the very general and comparatively equal distribution of property in the United States. This equality of distribution is highly favorable to human happiness, and is a very correct indication of the superior condition of our own people, resulting from free institutions. The present valuation of property of every kind in this country, is estimated at nine billions, six hundred and thirty millions of dollars, which gives an average of $321 to every man, woman and child. The present tonnage, foreign and domestic, including steam as well as sail craft, is upwards of six millions of tons; and we have about twenty-five thousand miles of railroads in operation, binding the country together in bonds of mutual interest and regard. Soon will the Atlantic shore be connected with the Pacific by a railroad penetrating through the Rocky Mountains, to be followed, ere many years, by two other connecting lines between the oceans, one to the south and the other to the north of that now under location. All these evidences of material prosperity are but the exponents of the individual comfort and happiness of American citizens.

In glancing at the efficient aids which have thus built up our country, and made it great, we cannot fail to be struck with the important influence which our free institutions of government have exercised. In the Old World government powers are usurped by certain favored classes for their own benefit, and are exercised to direct, control and restrain the industry of the people; here they are the inherent right of the people, delegated by them to servants selected by themselves, and to be used only for the protection and development of industry. There the people are the subjects and slaves; here they are the citizens and masters; there a man's earnings are his by government favor and forbearance; here they are his of right, and the government can take only what he freely gives. Nor can we over-estimate the magnitude of the agency which free schools have exercised in making our country what it is. By this admirable system of universal education, mind has been made free as well as body, and the young have been trained to think and act for themselves; thus qualifying the people to exercise their political rights, and furnishing them with the unfailing means of attaining prosperity and happiness. The free press of our country has also done a most important part in the great work which has been accomplished, taking up the task of popular education where the free schools leave it, and carrying it on to the enlarged and matured results which we see exhibited in a right-thinking, right-acting, intelligent, just, and honorable people, happy in the enjoyment of peace and plenty, and rejoicing in the sanguine anticipation of a great and glorious future for their beloved country, commensurate with the miraculous growth and progress of the past. Truly may such a people feel an honest pride in their country, and a profound gratitude to the Ruler of nations for his distinguished favor and protection!

A CONFIDENCE MAN.

The wife of a French gentleman of birth and fortune, after a long illness was pronounced past recovery. Her physician so informed her, and she prepared composedly to meet death. She desired her husband to approach her bedside and taking his hand, said:

"Mon ami, have I made you happy?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"Have you anything to reproach me with?"

"Nothing."

"Will you do me a last favor when I am gone, and ask me no questions?"

The afflicted husband signified his assent.

"Well, then," said the dying wife, "here is the key of yonder bureau; in a secret drawer among the ornaments on the left side, you will find three packages of letters, tied up with ribbons of different colors. When I am dead, take them out and burn them, without reading them."

The wife died, and the husband faithfully performed his promise. Would a lady have done the same?—Detroit Budget.

FIX YOUR MIND.

Lay it down as a sound maxim, nothing can be accomplished without a fixed purpose—a concentration of mind and energy. Whatever you attempt to do, whether it be the writing of an essay, or whittling of a stick, let it be done as well as you can do it. It was this habit that made Franklin and Newton, and hundreds whose labors have been of incalculable service to mankind. Fix your mind closely on what you undertake—in no other way can you have a reasonable hope of success. An energy that dies in a day is good for nothing—an hour's fixed attention will never avail. The heavens were not measured in a day. The inventions that bless mankind were not the work of a moment's thought and investigation. A lifetime has often been given to a single object. If you, then, have a desire to bless your species or to get to yourself a glorious name, fix your mind upon something, and let it remain fixed.—Arnold.

FASHIONABLE CHRISTIANS.

Often as the motley reflexes of my experience move in long procession of manifold groups before me, the distinguished and world honored company of Christian mammonites appear to the eye of my imagination as a drove of camels heavily laden, yet all at full speed, and each in the confident expectation of passing through the eye of the needle without stop or halt, both beasts and baggage.—Coleridge.

THE JUST MAN.

Peace to the just man's memory,—let it grow Greener with years, and blossom through the flight Of ages; let the mimic canvases show His calm benevolent features; let the light Stream on his deeds of love, that shunned the sight Of all but heaven, and in the book of fame, The glorious record of his virtues write, And hold it up to men, and bid them claim A palm like his, and catch from him the hallowed flame.

SPIRIT MUSIC.

BY EDWARD S. ELMS.

Like the muffled voice of ocean,
Sounding o'er the isles afar;
Like the pagan's wild devotion,
Wailing in the midnight air;
Like a weird, fading vision,
Floating softly, strangely by,
Lighting up those fields elysian,
To the dreamer's wistful eye:

Sometimes, at the hour of even,
In the shadows of the soul,
Sweet and wondrous sounds from heaven
Through those haunted chambers roll;
Like the wind-harp's tone low dying,
When the silent, saddened air
Wafts some lonely spirit's sighing,
Like a burden hard to bear.

Swept by Eden's softest breathings,
Heart-strings give a wondrous sound;
Spirit hands those chords enwreathing,
Stranger tones have sometimes found;
Whisper tones of solemn sadness,
Sometimes pierce the startled ear,
Waking thoughts of mournful gladness,
While those shadows strange appear.

There's a harp within the twilight
Of each human mortal's breast,
Where the world is never shining,
And whose clouds forever rest,
Save when some wandering angel
Sweeps across those shining strings,
And its wondrous tones will change all,
When he spreads his golden wings.

THE COUSINS.

BY MRS. MARY CRUIKSHANKS.

"I LEAVE my child to your care, John; love her, and be good to her as you would to your own. My property is all for her—you are wealthy—I have no other relatives; my child is my only heir, and she will be rich in this world's goods. For her I have toiled and striven, for her I have hoarded and saved, and now in my dying hour I have a fearful presentiment that her fortune will be the cause of her unhappiness. Guard her carefully; don't let her marry foolishly. My daughter, my darling daughter, would I could have seen you ere I left this world."

Thus spoke James Austin, as lying on his death bed, he confided his only child to the care of his only brother. And that brother promised to be a father to the orphan; and happy in the assurance, the dying man departed.

Poor Mary Austin! it was a sad home-coming, when he whose fond caresses had hitherto been her welcome, was lying cold and still in death.

It was long before John Austin could divert the attention of his niece to any other subject than the death of her beloved father. Summoned hastily from school to receive his last blessing, and only arriving in time to behold his lifeless corpse, the grief of the poor child was overwhelming; but when the first great shock was passed, and he learned her position, John Austin was astonished at the good sense displayed by the frail and delicate-looking creature. When informed of her father's wishes, she affectionately returned her uncle's caresses, promised ever to be to him as a daughter.

Three days after the funeral, all the business arrangements having been settled, Mary Austin and her guardian set out for the distant city henceforth to be her home; but ere we follow her thither, we must go back to the early history of the brothers, so unceremoniously introduced.

Twenty years before, John and James Austin found themselves in New York, with very little money in their pockets, and less knowledge of the world in their heads. But fortune favored the enterprising lads, who, not content to vegetate in an obscure country village, had come to the great city to seek a living.

John, the eldest, fond of money, and eager for riches, turned his attention to mercantile affairs; while James, disliking the city, and willing to make slower progress, went out into the far west, and purchased land with what money he had.

Through his untiring zeal and faithfulness, John Austin so won the confidence of his employer, that while yet very young, he married his daughter, and at the old gentleman's death became heir to all his wealth. Of riches he had abundance, but of domestic happiness but a small share; his gay and volatile wife, brought up as too many are among the wealthy, being ill calculated to make home happy. Their children, inheriting a frail constitution from the mother, and not receiving a mother's proper care, died early; and out of a family of seven, one only daughter lived to grow up.

James Austin also became wealthy. The land he had purchased, all at once became exceedingly valuable; a city was to rise where he had planned an extensive farm; fabulous prices were offered to him for even the poorest lots in his possession, and the end of it was, that he too became very rich. By judiciously employing his money in profitable speculation, in and around the new city, he made a slow and sure increase on it, and having married a very beautiful and amiable girl, he looked forward to a life of contented happiness. But all his plans were upset by the death of his young wife, who left him heartbroken and disconsolate, only for the affection he bore her little infant.

For this child he now began to save, and ere his death, had almost obtained the title of miser, so notorious were his economical habits. But on Mary and her education, no expense was spared, and for the latter purpose she was kept at an excellent school, far away from the lonely place he had made his residence on the death of his wife. While for himself he took no pride in dress, he was careful that his child should always make an appearance suitable to the fortune he intended should one day be hers, and consequently Mary Austin was the best dressed girl in her school, always plentifully supplied with money, and always led to believe that she was rich. Her vacations, spent at her country home, and in the society of her beloved father, were seasons of great joy to the affectionate girl, who delighted to surprise her indulgent parent with the rapid progress in study which she had made. All these happy days were now at an end, she must leave the dear old home, her companions at school, and all she had loved from youth, and go far away among strangers. But Mary yielded to no childish weakness, and when she saw that her tears distressed her uncle, she resolutely hid her feelings, and none saw her agony.

So great was her sorrow that she scarce noticed a remark her relative made one day about her father's property. His words insinuated that his brother had died poor, but beyond a vague feeling of astonishment and an inward conviction that it was a mistake, the daughter thought no more about it. Long afterwards did Mary Austin call to mind those words, and wonder at her own strange indifference.

The last night of their stay in her old home, Mary spent in tears and deep anguish, but little recked she of the great temptation her uncle was wrestling with under the sameroof. Many times and oft had John Austin had it in his power to gratify his love of riches at the expense of his honor, but never had he allowed the tempter to overcome him; at the time he became his niece's guardian his conscience was unstained by crime or wrong done to mortal.

Mary's friends gathered around to say farewell to the orphan, and Mary went forth into the world with the blessings of all who had known her from childhood. There was one among the number whose parting words none heard, save her alone; but they called a crimson flush up to the pale cheek, and tears filled the deep blue eyes as she gave him her hand, and breathed a kind good-by.

In after days, when sorrowful and well-nigh broken-hearted, Mary Austin dwelt with hopeful remembrance on that parting look and that earnest promise of a future meeting. The son of their pastor had been her friend from childhood, the companion of her vacations, and the favorite of her father. It added not a little to her distress, to witness the coolness with which her uncle treated this esteemed friend, but she could do no more than make her own manner more cordial, to atone.

"Well, mama, what news does father send? I am dying with impatience to know how much uncle has left me, and there you sit, holding his letter, and won't tell me a word." And Miss Emily Austin stamped her little foot with impatience, and spoke in a tone very unlike her usual softly modulated one.

Apparently unheeding, or accustomed to her daughter's ill temper, Mrs. Austin again went over the epistle she held in her hand, and so many strange expressions appeared in her countenance, that with an undutiful exclamation, Emily snatched it from her hand and began to read it; but scarcely had she perused half a dozen lines ere, flinging it to the floor, she crushed it beneath her foot.

"I will not hear of it; she sha'n't come. Father must be crazy to think that I want a penniless cousin to drag around, even if she is a beauty." And the angry girl burst into a torrent of tears.

Very quietly, Mrs. Austin took this fearful ebullition, contenting herself with exclaiming:

"Why, Emily! Don't give way to your feelings so, Emily." And then as a last resource, continuing, "You will spoil your eyes, and not be fit to go out with Mrs. S——, when she calls for you this afternoon."

This last argument appeared to have some effect, for wiping away her tears the angry beauty composed herself in the lounging chair from which she had arisen, and while she arranged her disordered curls, conversed in a somewhat lower tone about the contents of the unfortunate letter. Mrs. Austin appeared as much at a loss as herself to account for the unexpected tidings it conveyed.

"Is it not very strange, mother, after all we have heard, and all uncle wrote to us himself, about his immense property, that he should die poor, and leave his child for us to support? Surely, father must have made some mistake." And again the letter was closely examined.

Mrs. Austin said it was strange, but not even to her spoiled, over-indulged child did the wife dare to tell the strange thoughts that letter had conjured up; this suddenly announced poverty in one known to be rich, this child given to their care, and then the slurred and blotted letter, with its long erasures, so different from her husband's free and careless style, all combined to raise strange suspicions in her mind; but she prudently kept them to herself, and if Emily noticed her abstracted air, it was accounted for by the disappointment in regard to the money.

"It is too bad to be so disappointed when I had made so sure of getting those diamonds with it. Don't you think you could persuade father to give them to me?" There was no thought of the sufferings of the poor orphan; no pity for her loss; in Emily's eyes the disappointment about her long coveted jewels was paramount to all other distresses.

"I am afraid he will not consent to such extravagance, my darling, knowing that you have so many handsome ornaments already."

"But these are so magnificent and costly, that none of my acquaintances have anything to equal them. O, do try to coax him for me, mama; you don't know how I have set my mind on having these beautiful diamonds."

When occasion required, and some favor was to be obtained, Miss Emily could be as humble as possible to her doting mother, although her habitual treatment was in the highest degree insolent and ungrateful.

"I know it is of no use, dear," was Mrs. Austin's answer. "He positively refused before, and now if he has your cousin to dress and support, it is absurd to think of getting them. I am very sorry, for I always wish to see you outshine your friends; but I know your father will not consent to this."

But here any further conversation was stopped by the arrival of Emily's very dear friend, Mrs. S——, who, with her brother Louis, were bent on a shopping expedition. Mrs. Austin hastened to apologize for Emily's tear-swollen eyes by saying that they had just heard of the death of relative, thus impressing the visitors with an idea of the young lady's sensitive feelings.

Louis Eldridge had long been selected by Mrs. Austin and her daughter as Emily's future husband; for though suitors for the rich merchant's daughter were plentiful, not one among the number could compare with him in point of wealth, talents, station or appearance.

His sister, Mrs. S——, a schoolfellow of Emily's, and married to a rich man old enough to be her father, was a very different person, but was fondly loved by her brother, who, in his great affection for his only sister, overlooked the faults he could not correct.

To fascinate and win Louis Eldridge was the great aim and end of Emily Austin's life. For that purpose she studied a thousand graceful arts; for that purpose she dressed and adorned herself, and for that purpose she courted and caressed the sister, whom in her heart she despised, and yet envied.

For Mrs. S——, if she had married an old man, had at least attained the summit of her wishes, in the possession of a magnificent house and furniture, an unrivalled equipage, and unlimited leave as to the expense of her wardrobe and ornament. Since her marriage, Louis had come into possession of a large fortune likewise, and thus the brother and sister were objects of great interest in the fashionable circles they frequented.

That Emily Austin had made a deep impression on the young man's heart was quite true; but it was no less so, that he was far from being in love, or at least sufficiently so to be blind to her faults. He was fascinated by her beauty, and perhaps a little flattered at her evident preference for himself; but there were feelings deep down in Louis Eldridge's heart too noble, too earnest, too good to be touched by one like Emily Austin.

"Mary, this is your cousin; Emily, I have brought you a sister—you must be kind to her," said John Austin, as he presented the girls to each other.

There was a look of haughty disdain on the beautiful features of Miss Austin as she glanced with contemptuous curiosity at the slight, closely veiled figure before her; but her expression changed to one of utter astonishment, when drawing aside the heavy crape which shaded her features, Mary advanced to embrace her. So unexpectedly and exquisitely beautiful did she find her, that like a person in a dream she returned the fond greeting; but none the less did she dislike the new comer.

Very differently they appeared as they stood together; Emily with her slight brunette tinge, black, flashing eyes, raven ringlets and high color; Mary, with a complexion like the palest leaf of a blush rose, deep blue eyes shaded by long, dark lashes, heavy braids of rich brown hair, and features that might have been modelled from a Grecian statue.

Emily had pictured her cousin, rude in manners, uncultivated and awkward; over-awed by her superior elegance and style, and betraying in every movement her backwoods education. She had expected all this and more; but the idea of her immense wealth had reconciled her to any faults, either of person, dress or manner.

"You know," she had said to her mother, "that her gold will hide all defects, and under my tuition, and the example of our fashionable friends, she will soon become civilized."

Had Mary come as she anticipated, even without the property, Emily would have been kind and civil to her, and even taken pride in having so good a foil to her own finished and graceful manners; but she was not prepared to find in this penniless cousin a formidable rival, not only in beauty, but in every accomplishment. Emily had studied for the sake of admiration and display; Mary had improved herself for very love of learning, and to please her father; the difference was very perceptible.

The first time Mary sat down to the piano, her cousin grew pale with envy and suppressed annoyance. She fancied Louis Eldridge listening, entranced with those delightful strains, and gazing with admiration on the beautiful little white hands flying over the keys with such matchless grace and ease. A thousand angry passions rose in Emily Austin's bosom, and well had it been for Mary, could she have read the feelings of that jealous heart, so fiercely throbbing beneath the restraining satin and lace.

A very short sojourn at her uncle's convinced Mary that her life would not be a very happy one. That Emily and her aunt disliked her, she soon discovered, and her uncle's conduct was so extraordinary that she soon learned to fear him. At times he would caress her with even greater fondness than he displayed for his own child, and again he would bid her leave his presence, with marks of abhorrence on his countenance.

John Austin was a changed man. Stern and morose at one time, the whole household stood in awe of him; and again his temper would change, and fits of excessive mirth and hilarity cause almost equal wonderment among those who had known him all his life. Mary, who had never seen him in past days, thought him exceedingly disagreeable, and wondered how her gentle father could have so ill-tempered a brother.

As her deep mourning had prevented her going into society, and her saddened feelings rendered her unwilling to meet the gay guests who assembled at her aunt's, nearly two months had elapsed ere any of their friends were aware of the presence of the young orphan. In her own room, alone with her books and embroidery, Mary passed her evenings, and often wondered to herself how they could so strangely neglect one who had so many claims on their kindness and attention. But the mystery was one day explained, and in so rude a manner as almost to crush the gentle-hearted girl.

A magnificent party was given by the rich and fashionable Mrs. S——, and for several days previous, Emily had been in a very flutter of preparation. The long-talked-of evening at length arrived, but found the beauty in a very unamiable mood, owing to another unsuccessful application she had made to her father for the long coveted diamonds.

On several occasions she had displayed considerable authority when requiring her cousin's assistance, but this night she was insolent and overbearing in the extreme. With her usual patient kindness, Mary assisted to attire the angry girl, unheeding the ungrateful remarks on her slowness, her awkwardness, and her want of taste. But when the white satin robe was on, the costly blonde trimmings properly arranged, the beautiful bracelets clasped on the handsome rounded arm, and Mary's white fingers were twining wreaths of pearl amid the dark tresses, then the ill-concealed malice broke forth.

"It is well for you, to praise these paltry pearls; you, whose fault alone it is that I have not the magnificent diamond spray for my hair, I have so long wished for."

"My fault, Emily?" was the astonished exclamation. "How can it possibly be my fault?"

"O, very easily," was the sarcastic answer: "If father had not you to dress and maintain, he would not refuse me what I want so much."

"Emily, you must mistake; what do you mean by your father having me to dress and maintain?" There was a flush of indignation on the fair cheek, but it paled quickly as the answer fell upon her ear.

"Why, simply this: that you don't possess a dollar in the world—that you came to us a beggar—and if you don't know it, I think it is high time that you should."

There was a rustling of silk, the door was opened and shut, and then the orphan was alone. Alone with her sorrow and this awful announcement of poverty and dependence. She could see it all now; the cool, contemptuous treatment of her aunt and cousin, and the variable conduct of her uncle were equally well explained. At one moment she supposed his feelings of regard for his brother's child actuated him, and again, the recollection of the burden and expense thus bequeathed to him caused those unpleasant changes she had been at a loss to account for. Agonizing reflections for one of Mary Austin's sensitive and independent spirit. In those few hours of anguish she lived an age.

A painful interview with her uncle next morning only served to augment her distress, as he refused to listen to anything she attempted to ask, telling her to be content, that his house should be her home, and he would never let her want for anything. Sad words for her to listen to, who had always believed herself not only independent, but rich.

It was while Mary was suffering under the great shock of this discovery that she received a visit from her old friend, the minister's son, before alluded to. Never had she felt so in need of a friend, and the welcome she gave Cyrus Staples was such as she might have bestowed on a brother. By her uncle's invitation, he took up his abode with them; but by Emily's contrivance, even that was made a source of grief to Mary.

Day after day she saw the inexperienced young man falling deeper and deeper into the snares Emily had laid for him, and evidently yielding to the dangerous influence of her wit and beauty.

To Emily, who believed that Mary and he were lovers, Cyrus's openly displayed admiration and devotion, was a great triumph, and she watched her cousin's uneasiness with satisfaction.

Poor Mary moved about the house, sad and dispirited, continually suffering from some slight or vexation, and so unpleasant did her situation become at last, that she meditated seeking some employment—some independent means of procuring a livelihood.

John Austin, meanwhile, was never idle. Long noted for his caution in speculating, his business friends were astonished at the large amounts he now was willing to risk; and more than one old acquaintance marvelled at the extraordinary change in the once cautious merchant.

One clear, bright February day, Mary resolved to make a change in her mode of living; to no longer remain a prisoner in her uncle's house, but seek her way in the world; and as a preparatory step, she dressed herself, and went out; a display of liberty she had never before made. Her spirits sank as she passed along the crowded sidewalk, and beheld the merry, gaily dressed parties, promenading, and enjoying themselves, apparently free from care or trouble.

She was musing on her plans for the future, and scarce heeding anything around her, when suddenly a cry was raised: "The child! the child!" was shouted by a dozen voices; and looking up, she beheld a horse coming furiously towards them; the sleigh from which he had partly got free dashing wildly from side to side; while directly in front of him stood a little boy, some half-dozen yards from the pavement. To spring forward and snatch the little fellow from his dangerous position, was the first impulse, and ere any one else had sufficient presence of mind to move, the child was safe.

Among the many who gathered round to congratulate the weeping and terrified mother, and praise the self-possession of the rescuer, were two gentlemen, who had seen the whole affair, but were too distant to assist. Mary raised her eyes, as the tones of a manly, yet melodious voice fell on her ear, and met the admiring glance of a pair of magnificent dark eyes. In the confusion, her veil had fallen aside, and for an instant she felt her face flush beneath his gaze, respectful though it was; and then a deathlike faintness overpowered her, and she staggered and nearly fell to the ground.

On recovering her senses, she found herself in the nearest apothecary's store, where she had been instantly conveyed; the owner of the shop busily applying restoratives; the mother of the child she had rescued rubbing her stiffened hands; while strong arms supported her on the seat, and those same melodious tones sounded in her ear. As soon as she felt sufficiently recovered, the shop-boy called a coach, into which she persisted in going alone, firmly refusing to have any one accompany her.

"She is a beautiful girl; and brave, too," said the companion of him with the dark eyes, and, after watching the coach out of sight, they pursued their way.

"The loveliest woman I ever saw, Harry," returned his friend, enthusiastically.

"Come, come, old fellow, no romance now; I know you don't think her half so handsome as a certain lady I could name; and by the way, how shy she was about her name, eh?"

"Would that I knew it; would that I might ever hope to see that sweet face again," was the inward ejaculation of his friend; but he prudently remained silent, and the conversation dropped.

"I do not think it is prudent conduct at all, for a young lady to go out alone in this manner, especially when unacquainted with the streets as you are," said Mrs. Austin, as her niece entered the parlor on her return on that eventful day.

"And I don't know what people must think of you in the street," said Emily, "with your bonnet out of shape, and your dress in such a plight."

Hastening to her own room, where she was at least safe from the fault-finding of her unkind relatives, Mary pondered long on the strange scene she had passed through; and in spite of her efforts to the contrary, her thoughts were continually recurring to the dark-eyed stranger, the musical tones of whose voice so thrilled her.

"I wonder if I shall ever see him again; he looked to be kind and good?" And the sight which accompanied these words, told how desolate the poor child felt.

But Mary had not long to wonder, for the very next Sunday, the first object she saw after taking her seat in church, was the well-remembered form and features of the unknown. As their eyes met in recognition, both started and colored, and a close observer might have noticed that the gentleman's hand trembled excessively as he vainly attempted to find the right place in his prayer-book. Mary did not raise her eyes again, nor did she know that at a distance, the stranger was slowly following her home, when the service was over.

"O, you are quite mistaken; there is no stranger here. You must have heard an untruth." And while uttering those words, Emily Austin looked the picture of surprise; so much so as almost to shake the faith of her companion, who said, half to himself:

"I must have been mistaken; but surely, I saw her enter here."

"O, it was my seamstress, you saw," exclaimed Emily, coloring with anger at the idea of Mary's having been seen and admired by her friend's brother. "It must have been my seamstress; she is a very pretty girl."

"I can scarcely imagine that it was the person you mention, Miss Austin; for besides having the appearance of a refined and accomplished lady, it was on Sunday that I saw her, as I thought, enter your house. But pardon my inquisitiveness, it is exceedingly rude of me thus to question you." And Louis Eldridge (for the dark-eyed stranger was none other) left Miss Austin's presence, feeling strangely mystified, still anxious to discover who the beautiful and mysterious girl could be. "I will find her," was his resolve. "I will never cease the search until I find her; and if she is only a sewing-girl, who shall dare to question my right to choose a wife, either rich or poor?"

"Deceitful little wretch!" exclaimed Emily Austin, as the door closed after the young man. "She well knew he saw her, and she has tried to attract him in revenge for my taking that silly country boy from her. But never, never shall she see him again—I am determined."

But, alas, for Miss Emily's plans! The very next day, her father, with unusual kindness, took them both to an exhibition of pictures, and almost the first person they met on entering was Louis Eldridge. Emily saw the flash of joy that lighted up his handsome face, she heard her father introduce his niece, and then she met the look of astonishment and indignation that was bestowed on herself; and enraged beyond endurance, she announced her intention of returning home immediately. Mr. Austin, of course, had to accompany her, as the carriage had been sent away, but Louis insisted on Mary's remaining with him and his sister, who promised to take care of her until her uncle's return.

It needs not to tell how quickly and how well those two learned to love. A very short time served to convince Louis Eldridge that his earthly happiness depended on Mary's becoming his wife; and she in return bestowed on him her whole heart, though at times scarcely believing in the reality of her happiness.

John Austin at first positively refused to allow his niece to marry, alleging that she was altogether too young; but finding that Louis was determined, and also much astonished at his wishing to prevent Mary's marriage, he gave a reluctant consent; and in less than a week after, suddenly disappeared from his home. Of course there was much anxiety and excitement about it; but all fears for his safety were relieved by a letter from Europe, which not only accounted for his abrupt departure, but also explained many other mysteries. John Austin had proved an unfaithful guardian. Unable to withstand the temptation of having his niece's large fortune placed in his hands, he had embarked with it into speculations where he had feared to risk his own property; and his hopes proving false, it was all lost.

John Austin has never returned to his native land; but his wife and daughter still live in their handsome home in New York, and Emily is still unmarried. Those gentlemen who have sought to win her have not been such as she would accept, and those she has striven to win, have found more amiable brides. But Emily does not despair of yet winning a partner, who, in wealth and standing shall outshine the Eldridges. She wears the diamonds—so long coveted, but procured at last—and takes great care of her good looks; and is very particular about her dress, always choosing such colors as she knows suits her particular complexion; and her dress-maker says nothing but the fear of losing so good a customer would induce her to put up with so many insolent whims and caprices as Miss Austin displays.

Of Mary and her husband, nothing more need be added than that they both realized the dreams of their earlier days. If wealth in abundance, friends without number, and still increasing domestic comforts constitute earthly happiness, then are they happy.

SUNRISE.

BY A. THERESA TERRY.

The stars are fading one by one,
 And yonder streak of grayish light
 Tells us that soon the rising sun
 Will chase away the shades of night;
 And see! the edge of yonder cloud
 Is tinged with morning's rosy hue,
 The pale gray color of the sky
 Is changing fast to deeper blue.

The rose tint deepens into flame,
 The clouds are now all bathed in gold,
 The sky its azure robe assumes,
 As we this beautiful scene behold;
 The birds send forth their sweetest songs,
 To welcome back the orb of day;
 And fragrant flowers the air perfume,
 As grateful for his cheering ray.

The dewdrops sparkle in the sun,
 Like pearls upon the brow of morn;
 They gem alike the queenly rose,
 The lowly flower, the scented thorn.
 Who can this scene behold,
 And feel not happier for the sight?
 When Nature dons her gayest robe,
 And everything seems fresh and bright.

NICHOLAS STINGWELL.

BY WALTER CAMPBELL.

LIKE other cities, Providence, R. I., has its sections wherein are crowded the habitations of the victims of misfortune and the votaries of idleness. Into a cheerless apartment of one of these wretched abodes, the reader is invited, for a moment, to witness a scene which introduces Mrs. Williams and her two daughters Mary and Emma, whose fortunes we propose to follow in this sketch.

Upon a sick bed we find the mother, whose sunken eye and flushed cheek betray the presence of disease deeply seated. By her side are standing Mary, a fair girl of sixteen summers, whose soft blue eye and pale cheek told of severe cares and midnight watchings, and Emma, not yet eleven years of age—unlike her sister, a rosy-cheeked girl—but just now realizing trouble, which has flooded with tears her sparkling black eyes. As we enter, the mother is speaking:

"My children, I believe I shall never be better able to communicate to you some incidents in my life with which I believe you ought to be acquainted, than I am at present. Your father, at the time we were married, was extensively engaged in business in New York. Nothing occurred to interrupt his success until you, Mary, were seven years of age, when, in attempting a settlement with Nicholas Stingwell, a man with whom he had extensive dealings, and whose notes he held to the amount of twenty thousand dollars, he found this man had put his property entirely out of his hands and refused to honor his notes. That he was able to meet his liabilities, no one doubted; but by dishonesty, he placed himself beyond the reach of his creditors.

"Your father's affairs became embarrassed by this deficit; and, in his exertions to clear his own debt, he overtaxed his mind and physical powers to the extent that health failed him, and being attacked by congestion of the brain, he died, leaving his affairs to be settled by a court of justice, when all was disposed of in such a manner that, although I was assured that his assets met his liabilities, I had nothing left for the support of my family but the worthless Stingwell notes and my own hands. As you know, I strove by needle-work, and such like, for three years to support myself and you, when I thought it better to remove here, and in a few months was taken sick, since which time poor Mary has been forced to work in the factory for our support. I have been reflecting upon a matter which was brought to my mind before I was confined to my bed. I had completed some work for Mr. Smith, and had gone to her house with it, when, in an adjoining room, I heard Mr. Smith, in conversation with another gentleman, relating circumstances attending a recent journey at the South. 'When at Baton Rouge, Louisiana,' said he, 'I visited a plantation owned by a gentleman named Nicholas Stingwell—one of the finest I saw while out. He is reputed to be wealthy, and by the number of negroes, sugar works, etc., on his plantation, I should judge that report did him justice.'

"You may well think, my children, that this piece of information caused my heart to throb, and recollections of the villany of this man to crowd upon my mind. I knew he had left New York; but whither he took himself, I believe he did not take pains to inform many of his acquaintances. I have sometimes thought that if there was any such thing as justice to be found in this country, it seems as if the notes against Stingwell ought to be good now. I know he did not take advantage of the bankrupt law while in New York, but was satisfied with declaring himself worth nothing. The notes are tied up among some letters in the drawer of my bureau. You will easily find them. They were given at different times, and for various amounts, but in all, amount to about twenty thousand dollars.

"It is possible that, in the hands of some judicious lawyer, they may yet retrieve something of our fallen fortune. In the days of our prosperity, I recollect a family whose intimacy with ours was like the relationship of brothers and sisters. I remember that a son was at that time studying for the law; and I have since learned that he is practising his profession successfully in Worcester, Mass. Now I do not know but, if this case could be placed in his hands, he would, for old acquaintance's sake, do the best in his power to aid us. I think it will be best to see him as soon as circumstances will permit. His name is on a card, which you will also find with the papers."

Here the failing strength of the sick woman advised her that she had both overtaxed it and forgotten how low was her condition. She continued, in a faint voice:

"But, my dear children, I believe you will be left to the care of all, for this exertion I have made has tried the slender thread of life and proves that it is nearly spun out. Leave me now, while I seek a few moments of sleep, and prepare your own supper."

Mary and Emma obeyed, and their mother, after a time, dropped into a fevered slumber. Late in the evening, a neighbor came in—proffering her assistance to watch during the night. Her aid proved timely; for at the hour of midnight, Mrs. Williams called for her children, who occupied a bed in the opposite side of her room. They came to her bedside and there beheld a scene which the heart of childhood can never forget. A faint blessing was all she could utter, for the messenger of Death had appeared, and she was about to answer his call. Slowly the veil was drawn, and faintly beat the heart—fluttering now, and now losing its hold upon the gentle spirit which took its flight to the home of its author and preserver, leaving the marbled tenement a cold statue, upon which gazed the orphan sisters.

It was a bleak morning on which Mary and Emma Williams left their home, in Providence, in the carriage of a market-man who offered to carry them a part of the way to Worcester. Mrs. Williams had generally procured her provisions of this man, and he, having learned from Mary her desire to go to Worcester, and knowing that her little stock of money was nearly exhausted, thus offered to take them in his carryall.

Mr. Todd had driven as far as Blackstone, when he was overtaken by a messenger, who communicated information concerning some matters at Providence which demanded his immediate return. He expressed much regret at being unable to carry the sisters further, but Mary assured him that, with what money she had, they would be able to complete their journey. Finding that the stage-coach had gone for that day, in the afternoon, it being quite pleasant, Mary proposed to Emma that they should walk on as far as they might feel able, and stopping at some farm-house over night, take the coach in the morning. Emma said she could walk several miles, and they started on, with good courage, walking until sundown, when Mary thought it best to look for a stopping-place for the night. They had reached a point in the road where it wound round a hill with a sudden turn, when a carriage, driven furiously, came dashing along—appearing so suddenly that Emma, who was walking in the middle of the road, while attempting to spring out of the way, was struck by a wheel and hurled to the ground.

The driver—and unfortunately this is not the only case of a similar character on record—took no notice of the accident, but plied his whip and was out of sight in a moment. Mary hastened to her sister, whom she found senseless. In this situation, unable to think what to do, she sat down upon the ground and gave way to a flood of tears. Presently Emma evinced signs of returning consciousness, and complained of pain in her arm. At this moment, the jog-jog trot of a farm horse was heard; and soon the animal appeared at the turn in the road, followed by a wagon of antique design, in which sat its owner clad in frocking, with whip brought to the shoulder, like the gun of a soldier, while the hand not thus engaged was busily employed in "fishing for pickerel," as the incessant jerking of the reins, to which some persons are addicted, is called in the country.

As he came up to the spot where Mary was supporting her sister, who was groaning piteously, he drew up; and only being able to distinguish, in the twilight, the dresses of the girls, he was puzzled at first what to say or do. But finally he opened his mouth, and in genuine rustic language, called out:

"What are yeou doin' on thar?—whoever yeou be."

"O, sir," said Mary, "my poor sister has been run over by a carriage, just now, and I fear badly injured."

"Run over?" said the good-hearted farmer, alighting from his wagon. "And whar's the man that done it?"

"Alas, sir, whoever he was, he did not stop to see the injury he had done, but drove away as furiously as he came."

"Didn't stop—hey? The brute! I'll be bound 'twas the same chap that come nigh runnin' in ter me a little while ago—one of the good-for-nothin' sprigs that comes out on a bust from Blackstone once in a while."

Then stooping to assist the wounded girl, and taking her by the arm, her scream, and the helpless condition of the limb, assured him that it was broken.

"Poor little gal!" said he; "they have done an ugly job for yeou. Whar do your folks live?"

"Our parents are dead," replied Mary; "and we are trying to make our way to Worcester."

"Old folks dead, and yeou poor little critters left with nobody to take care on ye? Neow that's tew bad! But if yeou will come along o' me tew my house, you sha'n't want a friend."

"My good sir," said Mary, "you are very kind, and I know not what else we can do but accept your assistance."

The farmer lifted Emma carefully into his wagon, and Mary climbed in over the wheel, taking Emma partly in her arms, while the old man, saying that his house was "only a little way off," resumed his whip and fishing-tackle.

Arrived at his house, the farmer opening the door, sang out:

"Betsey, come here and help me git this little gal into the house! Don't ask any questions jest when I can't tell you who the little critter is."

"But, Benjamin," said his better half, peering through the darkness, for it had become settled evening, "what on airh are you a talkin' about?"

"Come out here," urged her somewhat impetuous spouse, "and when you see what I've got, you'll shift your wonderin' for sheddin' a tear or two."

Betsey came out, and Emma was carried into the house and carefully laid upon a soft bed.

It was not long before a surgeon was brought, who, entering the room where Emma lay, examined the fractured limb, and withdrawing her attention from what he was about to do by a course of lively conversation, succeeded, with little difficulty, in bringing the bone to its place. The splinter and bandages being applied, and necessary directions given, he took his leave, promising to call on the following day.

The family, into which the orphans have thus been introduced, consists of Benjamin Topham, wife and hired man. The old gentleman, apparently sixty years of age, is a well-to-do farmer—as good-natured as he is well off. His wife is a model country housewife, who can drive a close trade between her own butter and the storekeeper's calico equally as well as she can preserve the waxlike neatness of her dairy. As the good couple seated themselves by the fireplace, after Mary had retired, the old gentleman spoke, saying:

"It's a hard case that these poor little critters should be left to push their way through this world alone. I like the looks on 'em, and their story seems so likely, I kinder want to do sunthin' for 'em."

"You'll hev a chance to take care of the littlest one for some time," Aunt Betsey replied. "A broken arm don't heal in one day. But she is such a gentle little thing and so pooty, tew, I shall take a heap of comfort in taking care on her. And then t'other one is so lovin' and wouldn't mind helpin' me, I shall like her company. Now aint this a chance for us to behave Christian like, and be good Samaritans like them we read on in the Good Book?"

"Yes," said Uncle Ben, musingly; "but I'm thinkin' I should sleep considerable sounder, to-night, ef I could know that the sneakin' puppy that drove onter that little gal was shet up whar hasty-puddin' and merlasses fare would set him a thinkin' on what he done to-night. I'm choaked ef I don't feel's though I could wollop the scape-grace myself."

"Don't talk so," says the good lady. "'Taint proper, you know, to deal out threat'nin' and slaughter on folks."

"I don't care," returned Uncle Ben, growing warm. "When sich scamps is allowed to drive like mad on our highways and run over little gals, and care no more about it than ef they was worms, and when I am 'bliged ter git eout of the way, or be smashed up by 'em, and—it wont do! I'll prosecute somebody the very next time, ef Dobbins and I can git nigh enough to find 'em eout. I tell you, mother, I'm sweatin' now with indignation."

"Well, well, father—don't fret so! 'Taint doing no good. And so s'pose we go tew bed and think these ere matters over in the mornin'?"

Considering this as good advice, Uncle Ben corked up his phial of wrath, and shovelling the ashes over the embers in the fireplace, they repaired to their sleeping-room—not, however, until Aunt Betsey had looked in upon Emma and assured her that she would watch her during the night.

Emma passed a restless night, and in the morning was suffering intensely from pain in her arm and also in her head. The doctor called, during the day, and spoke encouragingly to her, although he assured Aunt Betsey that it would require the best of care to prevent a severe sickness, so intensely had Emma been excited. The good woman needed no urging to use her kindest attentions in the care of the child.

One week had passed since the occurrence of the events we have described. The family were seated at the breakfast-table, and Uncle Ben had been silent for some time, when he suddenly spoke to Mary, saying :

"I believe you told me you was goin' to Worcester, ef you hadn't been fetched up so sudden by your sister's accident. Neow I should kinder like to know what you was goin' arter? You know you begin to call me uncle, and your uncle orter know."

Mary at once related the circumstances which she had heard from her mother, and showed Uncle Ben the papers.

Her story was listened to with feelings of indignation ; and the farmer, having examined the papers, exclaimed :

"And so this old scoundrel is now taking his ease upon the property which justly belongs to you, tew say nothin, of bein' the death of your father—poor man! We must see this Lawyer Ames at Worcester, immediately. I believe sunthin' can be done with these papers, ef you tell circumstances as they raily was."

The next day found Uncle Ben on his way to Worcester, accompanied by Mary.

Six weeks have passed, and the attention of the reader is invited to a distant section of the country, wherein were enacted some scenes which may be of interest. As the good steamer St. Louis reached her landing at New Orleans on the morning of a fine day, a gentleman nearly thirty years of age, with an intelligent eye, light complexioned, somewhat portly figure, and withal such a person as would attract attention anywhere, came ashore, and ordering his baggage carried to the "St. Charles," made his way to the counting-room of Messrs. Dumont & Harvy, extensive commission merchants. Here he spent an hour or two ; then, hurrying to his hotel and partaking of a hasty dinner, he took a hack and went down to the levee, from which an "up-river" steamer was about starting. He had barely time to get aboard, when she swung off and slowly steamed towards the north. Arriving at Baton Rouge at midnight, our stranger went ashore and to a first-class hotel.

On the following day, it was understood that Mr. Ames (so his name was registered on the hotel-book) was desirous of purchasing a quantity of sugar and molasses. It being the season when a new crop was ready for market, he was soon beset by numbers of holders of the desired articles, anxious to sell—the more so, since he came recommended by the well-known house of Dumont & Harvy.

Among those who presented themselves was Nicholas Stingwell, who had a large lot of sugar for sale ; also some extra molasses. Mr. Ames consented to look at his stock, but found his price entirely above that of the New Orleans market. Stingwell, who had hoped to drive a sharp trade, urged the excuse that his sugar was of an extra quality. An offer was finally made by Ames something better than would be paid by New Orleans merchants, with which Stingwell closed. The goods were to be delivered in New Orleans immediately, and payment to be made at the office of Dumont & Harvy. The contract being placed in writing, Mr. Ames remained a few days, and having seen the goods shipped properly, he took a boat and returned to New Orleans.

Agreeably with his appointment, on the following day he repaired to Dumont & Harvy's, where he was informed by the senior partner of that firm that his consignments had arrived, and fortunately a purchaser for the whole lot had applied to them. Stingwell came in shortly after, and saluting the parties present, said he believed his part of the contract in the recent sale was fulfilled, the sugar and molasses being now at the store-house of Dumont & Co. At the same time, he took from his pocket a "bill of sale," made out with the exception of the name of the purchaser.

"I have made out a bill of sale, as you will observe," he continued ; "but, unfortunately, neglected to inform myself of your name, in full. Ames, I think, was the surname?"

"Yes, sir ; and you will insert as the full name, if you please, Edward C. Ames."

This name was quickly written in the bill ; and Stingwell, saying that "he had some urgent business which demanded his return to Baton Rouge by the first boat, which would start in about an hour," brought matters to a crisis.

Mr. Ames signified that he was prepared to make payment, and the parties stepped to a desk. Ames, taking the "bill of sale" in his hands, said :

"I believe this is correct, in every part. I am indebted to you to the amount of thirteen thousand, five hundred dollars." Then drawing from his pocket some papers, he handed them to Stingwell, saying : "I believe these will balance my account."

Stingwell opened the papers.

"Perdition seize you, sir!" he exclaimed ; "how came you by these notes?"

"It matters not, since these notes, signed by you and payable to George Williams, or order, are properly endorsed by authority of United States courts to me, as guardian of his two children. If you once defrauded him of the just payment of twenty thousand dollars, I have now, by stratagem, reclaimed a portion of his dues; and as to the remainder, which you will doubtless refuse to pay, may you reap the reward in its use which a guilty conscience, if not wholly seared, will bring you."

Choking with rage, Stingwell swore "he would take the life of Ames before he could leave New Orleans;" in reply to which threat, Ames displayed a pair of revolvers, with the use of which he assured Stingwell he was well acquainted, and was quite ready to defend himself, adding further, that "if his presence was required at any time, to settle the matter relating to the balance of the notes due the heirs of George Williams, his address would be, as would be seen by his card (which he provokingly offered Stingwell), at Worcester, Massachusetts."

Boiling over with wrath, and finding curses of no avail, Stingwell seized his hat and rushed out at the door.

Mr. Ames, together with Mr. Dumont, closed the sale with Captain Arthur, who immediately took the sugar and molasses aboard his vessel—after paying the value in cash to Mr. Ames, who, deducting a large commission to Dumont & Harvy, had the pleasure of placing in his pocket the sum of twelve thousand, eight hundred dollars, with which he soon after returned to Massachusetts, having experienced no further trouble with the valiant Stingwell.

We will now return to the farm-house of Uncle Benjamin Topham. Here we find that Emma has recovered from her sickness, her arm is doing well, and she is beginning to enjoy herself in running about the farm, feeding the chickens, and watching Aunt Betsey as she managed her household affairs. Mary, being older, has felt more deeply the loss of her mother, but is becoming more cheerful under the fatherly and motherly care of the good people who had furnished her with a home. Aunt Betsey, Mary and Emma were sitting at one end of the ancient, spacious kitchen, variously engaged, when suddenly Uncle Ben rushed in at the door, squared round, facing the occupants of the room, struck up a lively air through a small aperture between his lips, and advanced across the floor at a gait something between an old-fashioned double shuffle and the modern polka, to the utter astonishment of his wife, which feeling might have become tinged with jealousy, as he brought up in front of Mary and gallantly plucked from her sweet little lips a hearty kiss.

"What on airth ails you now?" cried the poor lady, who began to entertain fears that her spouse was laboring under mental aberration.

Uncle Ben only replied with a kind of chuckle, and little Emma submitted to the ordeal of a kiss.

"For pity's sake, father, what has got inter yer?" again demanded Aunt Betsey.

"Matter enough!" he at length exclaimed. "Good news—good news, mother! I've jest got a letter from Squire Ames, sayin' that he has got back from New Orleans. He's sarved that Stingwell a trick that he'll remember for one while—ha, ha, ha—jest tew think on't. The squire kinder figered round out thar as a sugar buyer and got old Stingwell tew sell him a heap o' sugar and merlasses, and when he gits it all safe in sumbody's hands in New Orleans, he meets Stingwell at an app'inted place and ups and pays him with his notes. Oho! ha, ha! O, my old sides! I would have gin a dollar tew hev seen the old sinner when he opened them papers. The squire says he cussed and swore like blazes, but didn't make nothin' at that, and then he took tew intimatedin', or tryin' tew, but the squire is pluck and he telled him to jest come on, if he wanted to try his hand at shootin'; he'd got a pair of barkers as he could use tew. And then the best on't is, though he didn't git all that the old scamp owed, he put the little sum o' twelve thousand dollars and risin' in his pantaloons pocket when he come hum, and he is comin' to see his wards, as he calls Mary anp Emmy; and that was another cunnin' go—git-tin' him to be guardian for the gals. He is a comin' here, I say, in a day or tew; so you must fix up a little for him, mother. Tew be sure, he's been here once, but we'll try to sarve him a trifle better this time."

The joy of the orphan sisters can be easily imagined; and the position in which Mary felt that she had been placed by a kind Providence, was pleasant indeed. Now she need not feel that by charity alone, or by drudgery, must she and Emma be supported. Aunt Betsey did up a very respectable little amount of crying on the occasion, which testified her joy to be as excessive as that of her spouse.

"Squire Ames" came, according to promise, and was welcomed by the two sisters in a most thankful manner; while Uncle Ben and his wife declared to his face that "ef there was a man that dearred to be President of the United States, it was him."

At the solicitation of the girls, Mr. Ames consented to retain the office of guardian—finding the more inducement in the soft blue eyes of Mary, to tell the truth, than in all other circumstances combined—and we have no reason to doubt that his carriage was often seen approaching the house of Uncle Ben for the purpose of allowing him to study those eyes, and when alone with their owner, to train some golden ringlets which rebelliously covered a cheek which the pure air of heaven had by this time painted in rich colors.

These suspicious circumstances continued for nearly three years, during which time Mary and Emma both received instruction in various branches of education. Mary's brilliant intellect readily grasped every subject to which she applied herself; and at the age of nineteen, we find her a beautiful and highly accomplished woman. In the meantime, rumor said that the Williams sisters had been adopted by Uncle Ben Topham, and that Mary was to become Mrs. E. C. Ames. The latter report was corroborated by the marriage which did take place between the parties, at the Topham mansion, on which occasion Uncle Ben laughed, while he danced, at the wedding, and dropped a tear as he took the little gloved hand of Mary, before she entered the carriage which was to take her to the home of her husband, and he whispered:

"God bless you, my child! Don't forget us now that you are goin' to leave, but bless our old hearts with the sunshine of your happy face as often as possible."

Emma still remains with her adopted parents, enjoying the privileges of a happy home and the acquaintance of young ladies attending, with her, a seminary not far from Uncle Topham's. Her life now being amid scenes of childhood's happiness, as the pleasantest point at which to leave her, we bid her adieu.

Lawyer Ames and Mary had been married but a few weeks, when he received a note from an unexpected source, the writer being no other than Stingwell, who desired that he would come on to Baton Rouge with the balance of the Williams notes, which he earnestly desired to take up, as the thoughts of the wrongs he had committed had haunted him, of late, so much, that he had determined to make all the restitution in his power.

Mr. Ames, as soon as he could arrange his affairs in a convenient form to leave, went on to Baton Rouge, where he found Stingwell upon a bed of sickness, but who evinced a feeling of great relief when he had signed the checks which would cancel the notes. Mrs. Ames, who had accompanied her husband, called to see the sick man, who was much moved by her presence. He recollected her as a child; and for the wrong he had done the child, craved forgiveness of the woman. Forgiveness was freely granted, and sealed with tears. Mr. and Mrs. Ames remained at Baton Rouge for some weeks, and on their return home, carried with them tidings of the death of NICHOLAS STINGWELL.

SCHOOL DANGERS.

Thirty years ago a school-mistress, in a rage, caught hold of the arm of a little girl not in fault, gave it a violent jerk, and, with a swing, threw her to the other side of the room. To-day that girl is a wife, a mother, the accomplished mistress of a princely mansion—happy in her social position, happy in her husband, who is one of the best of men; but that arm hangs powerless by her side, as it has done from the days of her childhood. Two years ago, a beautiful young girl, just budding into womanhood, was going to school in midwinter; she, with other scholars, was sent out for recreation for half an hour, as was the daily custom. Not knowing any better, she sat on a stone step in the sun, and daily did so. Thus coming from a warm schoolroom, and remaining still in the open air until most thoroughly chilled, she acquired a permanent cough. She now sleeps in the churchyard. How many bright hopes have been blasted—how many an only child has been sent to an early grave, by ignorant, careless and incompetent teachers!—Journal of Education.

FISHERS OF MEN.

The Scientific American some time since declared that fishing is becoming a great sport with the ladies, that they enjoy it greatly, and that it is a great promotion of their health, and finally that all ladies should learn how to fish. A western exchange agrees to all this; but adds that ladies have always been great fishers, that angling is no new recreation for them, that it always has agreed mightily with their health, though not always with their victims, that their skill in this sport has ever been proverbial, but that the sweet anglers have fished in deeper waters, and for bigger fish than did Ike Walton, for while he was a fisher of trout, they are fishers of men.

GRAFTING THE GRAPE.

Grafting the grape can be performed without difficulty. First, cut the graft before any preparation for growth has commenced, and keep them in an ice-house, or other cool place, until the leaves of the stock have begun to expand. Before this time, the stock will "bleed," and prevent so certain success afterwards. As soon as the leaves begin to open, the bleeding ceases. The grafts are inserted precisely as in fruit trees, and should be done as low down or near the root as practicable. Grafting clay or wax is then applied, and the work is done.—Horticulturist.

Some men who know they are great, are so very haughty withal and insufferable, that their acquaintance discover their greatness, only by the tax of humility, which they are obliged to pay, as the price of their friendship.

QUESTIONINGS.

BY WILLIS E. FADOR.

If all things in this world were but
As we could wish, or we could change
All things within our little range,
And open gates that should be shut,—

If passion wrought its vengeful will,
If anger raised its spotted hand,
If hate could gather all its band,
And crime its prey unlicensed kill,—

If chance should in this mood have rule,
And mix and mingle as it might,
If wrong should ever master right,
And wise men humble to the fool,—

What then? Would we contented be,
Or happier because of this?
Would it be passport to a bliss
As fathomless as is the sea?

Or would the carnival of crime
Be held upon the world's wide breast,
And the hot fever of unrest
Continue to the end of Time?

Afar and near upon the gale
Would speed the loud alarm cry,
While echo gave a wild reply,
And lips and cheek grow blanched and pale.

O well for us we do not hold
The warp and woof of human life;
Too many passions are at strife
To lead us safely to the fold.

And well for us that over all
There is a Providence that guides
Life's bark across the angry tides,
And watches those who rise or fall.

THE WHITE NUN.

A TALE OF THE SCOURGE IN NEW ORLEANS.

BY MARY W. JANVRIN.

No place was so wild that the plague did not visit—none so secret, that the quick-sighted pestilence did not discover—none could fly, that it did not overtake.—
THE PLAGUE OF LONDON.

THE pestilence walked abroad over the city.
It was the sultry summer time; the heat was intense in that torrid climate, and every breeze from orange and citron grove was laden with poison.

The deadly miasma lurked in every gorgeous exotic in luxuriant gardens—in the vase of beauty's bower; every gale inhaled at sunset, when the task was finished by the wearied laborers, was freighted with the taint floating up from low, stagnant marshes in the city's suburbs; and each putrid pool in the narrow, crowded streets bred the poison! That dreadful scourge, the yellow fever, had settled down like the black wing of death, upon the Crescent City.

The hospital wards were filled to overflowing;
gold failed to purchase care and nursing; even natural affection was lost, and mothers turned in loathing from the babes at their breasts when the dark plague-spot appeared. Cabmen were busied all day long and deep into the night, with transporting the smitten to the hospitals; the rumble of the dead cart fell on ears too used to the sound; cemeteries and grave-pits were crowded.

O it was horrible! By day, the red, lurid glare of the tropic sun ripening everything to disease; by night, the fair, yellow moon and stars of unnatural brilliance hanging so calmly above the city where corruption was festering! And still the sun rose out of the Orient, wheeled over the calm, hazy sky, and went to his bed beyond the Pacific's waters; the magnolia's chalices whitened in deserted gardens; vegetation grew rank and luxuriant; the young crescent moon grew to be full-orbed, and bathed the beautiful city and the sheeted waters of Lake Pont-chartrain in a flood of golden splendor far more mellow than that of day; and still, from street, and court, and alley, from palace and hovel, went up the groans of the dying. It seemed, day by day, that the Black Angel brooded closer over a doomed city.

And yet trade went on, and the marts were crowded as of old; men bought and sold, and chaffered at a bargain; the jocund song and blithe negro melody fell on the ear. Slaves were bought and sold, as though the hand of the Great Avenger was not, even then, pouring out the vials of his wrath over the land; great steamboats came puffing up to the crowded levees, and disgorged their bales of merchandise; and thus the sounds of busy life went on.

Alas, that in this eager, jostling world-strife, man has no time to waste on his fellows! What though scores daily fell victims to the pestilence?
Others stepped in to take their places; the surging waters closed over the spots where their barks of life had gone down, and again the tide swept on.

But there were some in that scourge-smitten city—a few meek, pale women—who, in their nun-like robes, with the cross upon their breasts, and calm, serene, benevolent faces, went about among the sick and dying, like ministering angels as they were—these "Sisters of Charity."

Careworn business men hushed the cry of greed and gain when they passed them in the thronged streets; little boys ceased their rude sports and followed with childish gaze the pale sisters who carried balm and consolation everywhere; and the poor, emaciated beings who lay in crowded hospitals, deserted by kindred and friends, blessed with brightening eyes the coming of these pious women who, imitating the example of their divine Lord, "went about doing good."

In the convent of St. —, among all the pale, passionless, soul-subdued faces there, none beamed more fair or pure than that of "Sister Marie," the "White Nun." Hers was a still, pale countenance, and wondrous fair, yet with no trace of earthly passion on its immobile features. It was as the outside of some beautiful sepulchre—fair, white, and marble still; and no one, looking on that marble face, would have dreamed how earthly hopes, and loves, and fears, had once stirred its calm; how every hope and love had been crucified on the cross of bitter despair, till the martyr had been lost in the saint, and earth had been translated to heaven, for when her feet came over the convent's threshold, Sister Marie had dug a deep grave in her heart and buried all olden passions there.

Alas, there be many such graves in hearts outside of convent walls, where the "dead past" has been put away and covered up forever!

Yet still, at matin chime or evening vespers, the pale nun, clad in her white robes, flitted like a spirit from her cell, and knelt in the chapel with her sister throng; still her slender fingers slipped the beads of her rosary, or lifted the crucifix to her lips, those lips, though pale, yet delicate as sculptor's chisel ever carved in tribute to female loveliness, which murmured ave marias and prayers to the Virgin. Still she glided about the city on errands of mercy, like the white-winged angel among dark, fallen humanity; still she made daily visits to the hospital wards, bathing throbbing foreheads in cool waters, holding fresh draughts to fever-parched lips, laying fresh flowers beside some deathly pale cheek on the pillows; still wan lips murmured blessings brokenly as she passed, or, when lips were speechless, glazing eyes strove to catch the flutter of her white robes; and still, when all her gentle care had been in vain, the Sister of Charity folded the cold white hands of the dead over silent hearts, and wept.

Yes, the White Nun could weep for others, but for herself she had no tears; their fountain had long been dried; for, when she sought the shelter of the holy convent's walls, all that had moved or stirred her heart had then perished. Her world-griefs, her world-love, even her world-name, were buried in a common sepulchre. She was no longer a weary, betrayed, deserted, broken-hearted girl, but Sister Marie, the White Nun, who, with her olden name, had put off olden loves and woes, and ruined hopes forever!

A tender violet had been crushed in his pathway—ground down into dust beneath his iron heel; another had been added to the list of the betrayed and castaways; but what cared the brilliant, blase man for that? Hartleigh Louzenberg's way led onward through brighter gardens, where brighter flowers flaunted on the air; his sensual eye had fallen on a stately southern exotic, and now he was free to win and wear it, for the sweet wild flower he had once gathered to his bosom had faded, drooped and perished.

And the elegant belle of New-Orleans, Eloise Devereux, looked not coldly upon her new lover. Many had hitherto knelt at the creole's feet; men of bravery, intellect and wealth had sued for her smiles; how strange that the hackneyed Hartleigh Louzenberg should have distanced them all in the race for the lady's favor.

But so it was; for months they had been betrothed; the wedding eve was appointed, and already the man who at heart had paid court to the heiress, saw himself master of a crowded warehouse, a magnificent villa on the borders of Lake Pontchartrain, acres of snowy cotton fields and scores of lusty slaves.

Already the wedding jewels flashed in their caskets on Eloise Devereux's dressing-table; the bridal robe—a miracle of satin, lace and orange blossoms—had been sent from the French modiste's; even the wedding favors, tied with tiny knots of white satin ribbon, filled the silver card receivers of the drawing-room.

And all the while the terrible pestilence kept its onward march; and side by side with rosy marriage stalked pale death.

The wedding-night came; and such an assemblage as wealth, youth and beauty can ever gather around them, graced the mansion of the heiress. There mingled dark-eyed, tropic-hearted daughters of the South, and gallant Louisianians on whose arms they leaned; but none more beautiful than the peerless belle of the Crescent City—alas! none so black-hearted as the false Louzenberg!

The bride expectant shone resplendent in the costly bridal robes, and the lustre of her jewels vainly essayed to rival the proud flash of her midnight eyes; but Louzenberg was pale and agitated, cold tremors shook his frame; dull, heavy pains shot through his burning temples and leaden eyes. Ah, the deadly fever was lurking in his veins! Every burning flush and heaving heart-throb brought a feeling of suffocation; and conscience (not yet stifled to its death) sent pale, mocking ghosts to haunt the hour with a vision of the lost, ruined and forsaken!

The marriage ceremony commenced, it half waned, yet Louzenberg heard no word of the priest before him, he saw not the beautiful woman at his side. His straining gaze, piercing strangely into nooks and shadows of the apartment, had become riveted on a shadowy form just outside the open verandah window, where the yellow moonlight met and struggled with the glare of chandeliers within, and on the white face of that still, muffled figure peering in upon him, his eyes were enchained. Vainly he endeavored to break the spell; still his straining eyeballs were bound in that strange fascination, his senses were wrought to their utmost tension, till, under the combined influences of terror and the disease lurking in his system, he seemed on the verge of madness.

Once, twice, the priest repeated the questions, awaiting the responses from Louzenberg; the eyes of all in that spacious drawing-room were bent upon him; even the haughty Eloise, as she watched his livid face, grew pale and faint with a feeling of indefinable terror, yet vainly strove to recall her lover's senses to the ceremony. He gave no heed; his eyes rolled wildly in their sockets, hot pangs shot through his veins like writhing fire-serpents; a deadly sickness clutched at his heart; his complexion took a green and ghastly hue; and, striving to point his clammy finger in the direction of the verandah window, he gave one shrill cry, in which pain, terror and agony were blended, then fell prostrate to the floor.

The wildest confusion followed, and in another moment the guests were thronging around him. But one look sufficed! Those who were familiar with the appearance of the pestilence, only cried "The fever!" then fled.

In another moment the heiress's mansion was deserted. Brave men and beautiful women, guest and priest, even she who had almost been made a bride, all had sought self-preservation in flight, and left him to his fate. And then, when all vaunted love had turned to fear and loathing, as these terrible words, "The yellow fever!" had rung out on the perfumed air of that bridal hall—when all, priest of God, guest, the affianced bride, and even the lowest servant of the household had abandoned him; then the pale Sister of Charity, now paler and calmer than ever, glided silently from her station in the window like a saint from her niche, and bent tenderly over the smitten man.

Weeks passed, cooler winds again wandered over New Orleans; the winds that floated up from the Mexic Gulf no longer brought the taint of poison; the tropic sun burned less fiercely, and the yellow splendor of the moon had faded; the fever had somewhat abated, and health was again visiting the Crescent City, when Hartleigh Louzenberg—wan, emaciated as a skeleton—found strength to crawl feebly from his couch in the deserted mansion of Eloise Devereux.

Death's hot breath had blown upon his cheek, seared the lustre of his dark eye, withered, scorched and shrivelled his once fresh complexion, burnt out the life from the once moist curls that had hung in rich masses over his white forehead, and yet, death had passed him by. All death's agony had he felt, and yet lived—if that could be called life to which he now awoke, so unlike was it to the buoyancy and elasticity of health he had known when the fresh, untainted blood leaped joyously along his veins.

Why had he been spared? he, the deceiver, betrayer; while hundreds—good, kind and noble—had bowed to the desolating scourge? Because his Maker and Preserver had mercifully resolved to touch his heart into gratitude; to so touch and soften that arrogant man's proud heart, that, on bended knees, he thanked him for his life.

But the pale Sister of Charity, the White Nun, who had been beside him during all that terrible fever, when frenzy was scorching his veins, whither had she vanished? Ah, the pale-faced nun knew that so soon as returning reason should take its seat in his brain, henceforth it was no place for her beside the sick man's bed! And when the fever was upon the point of departure, another nurse took her station there. Yet never by look or word had she sought to betray herself to Louzenberg, as too weak to speak, he lay passive and childlike upon his pillows, and, gazing wonderingly on her sweet, pale face, dreamed of angels in heaven.

So she had left him, on the border-ground of reason; and when afterwards, while health came slowly back, day by day he thought of that night when the terrible fever had seized him, and of the muffled form outside the verandah window, then he knew that she whom he had so cruelly wronged had been the angel who hovered about his pillow, then he knew who it was that had saved him!

And then, when he questioned the nurse beside him, she only answered that he had been tended by Sister Marie, who left when she came, only a pale sad nun, who went about visiting the sick and dying; yet his heart cried out "Mary!"

"Mary!" and he prayed God he might live to look upon her face once more.

And in the meantime, one convent cell was deserted; one slight figure knelt no more before the crucifix on its walls, murmuring ave marias with pale lips, or glided noiselessly through dim corridors at twilight to join her sister-throng and sing the vesper hymn; one little bed in that narrow cell was unoccupied, but a low pallet in the hospital wards instead.

One day, yet pale and enfeebled, Louzenberg dismissed his nurse and wandered out into the city streets. Crowds jostled past him, for the city dwellers were fast returning to their homes at the disappearance of the fever; he met a few old friends and acquaintances, who greeted him hastily, then hurried past; all gazed at him with evident fear, as if a ghost had risen from its tomb and wandered abroad over earth, so ghastly pale his countenance. He felt very miserable for he was utterly alone, abandoned by even his betrothed bride, for Eloise Devereux had fled north for safety; and now the one whom he had most wronged, but who had risked her own life to save his, was buried to him forever within the convent walls.

He felt utterly desolate; and, as if to verify anew the truth of the old adage that misery loves company, he bent his steps to the hospital where the sick and dying lay. Slowly he walked along, and while moving through the wards, pausing now and then to lift a cup of water to some thirsty lips, and note the ravages of a disease which had so nearly claimed him for a victim, a low moan from the extremity of the female ward fell on his ear. It was a low, gentle moan, and involuntarily he bent his steps in that direction. Beside the low pallet sat a Sister of Charity whom he recognized as his latest nurse, bathing the forehead of a pale sufferer on the pillows, whose white lips, as she tossed to and fro in her pain, uttered the moans which had fallen on his ear.

"Hush!" said the nun, recognizing him as he drew near, and placing her finger on her lips, "hush! 'tis Sister Marie!"

Thrilled to the heart, Louzenberg drew near and gazed on her. One glance sufficed—it was she! Yet that face, which had once been so fair in girlhood, and flushed crimson beneath his kisses, bore now no imprint of the loathsome disease. Still were the delicate features beautiful to look upon, but pale, O, so pale and marble cold, that he shivered and sank down beside her as though an ice bolt had entered his heart. Yet the poison taint was in her blood; she had taken the fever from him she had so loved and tended, and now she was dying!

With a deep groan, so full of agony that many occupants of the low pallets around rose to gaze about in terror—with such a groan the wretched man sank down by her bedside, murmuring in hollow tones:

"O, God, this is terrible! And I have murdered her! Mary, Mary, live! live for me! live that I may atone for all my wickedness. You must not, shall not die! I am not forgiven yet, Mary, my own, my darling!"

The dying girl faintly unclosed her eyes. An expression of wonder broke through their hazy film.

"Where am I?" she whispered, reaching out her hands dimly, like one walking in a dream. "I seem to be at home again, in the old cottage among the pines. The breath of summer is on my brow. The moon comes up behind Blue Hill—the brook sings down by the willows—my mother stands in the doorway, and smiles as I gather roses to deck my hair. The moon is getting higher—see! the stars all grow pale—and hark! I hear a step in the path through the wood! Ah, he is coming—it is Hartleigh! He pleads hard, so hard that I cannot tell him 'nay!' He will make me his wife in that southern home where the magnolia whitens, where roses always bloom, and love can never fade. Hartleigh!" And in the ravings of delirium, her tones getting louder and louder, she raised herself in bed.

"Mary, I am here! For God's sake speak to me—don't look at me in that way!" moaned the miserable man, crouching humbly down at the bedside.

"Mary! Mary!" Some one called me," went on the nun, "I guess it was my mother. Let me go in now, Hartleigh! But no! it was my beloved's voice! he is sick, sick to death with the terrible fever. I must get away from this convent—they all look at me so with their cold, mocking eyes—they never loved anybody, I'm sure! I must get away and go to him! Hartleigh! Hartleigh, you never loved another, did you? You never cast away your Mary? Tell me, Hartleigh!" And with a gleam strangely akin to reason, flashing from the fast gathering film of death in her eyes, she flung herself forward and gazed upon Hartleigh. In that last hour, the dying girl seemed to feel a dim consciousness who knelt beside her.

"Mary, forgive!"

The words were husky with agony which the kneeler uttered, catching wildly at her hand. "Forgiveness, give it me before you go up to heaven. Mary, don't you know me?" And he smoothed the hair off her chill forehead and looked deep into her eyes.

A strange glory played over her features—a dim smile, unutterably sweet and tender, about her lips.

"Hartleigh!"

She essayed to place one thin, diaphanous hand in his, and with the other raised the golden crucifix to her lips murmuring, "I forgive—the Virgin, Jesus, bless you evermore!"

Louzenberg sobbed aloud, and rained tears and convulsive kisses all over that little ice-cold hand; but suddenly its clasp relaxed—it fell motionless upon the counterpane—the glory faded from those flaring eyes, and the smile flickered and grew fainter on her white lips, then went out on earth forever.

It was too late; remorse, regret, prayers, tears, and proffered love, were then of no avail; Marie the White Nun was dead!

Years after, one summer night of moonlight splendor, a pale, haggard wanderer stood in the drifting light and shade of a pinewood in a remote Canadian village. The ruins of an old cottage lay in a grass-grown clearing beyond; and the rush of waters in the lowlands smote upon the ear.

"Here she lived—here she stole out to meet me in the moonlight; and here the spoiler wooed her to her ruin! Gods! what demon of evil sent me hither to lure Mary St. Pierre to her fate? Peace! Peace! Shall I never find thee?" And smiting his hand hard upon his temples, the haggard, conscience-stricken man rushed away.

May, wander where thou wilt—tread whatever lands thou may'st, remorse, with wan, spectral fingers, will silently, surely weave a shroud over thy heart! And wherever thou turnest, Hartleigh Louzenberg, the haunting eyes of Marie, the White Nun, the Mary St. Pierre of thine early love, shall follow thee evermore!

OCCUPATION.

The want of proper occupation is the cause of more than half of the petty frets of life. And right occupation will be a medicine for half the minor ills of life. A man without any proper aim in life, without moral inspiration, too rich to be industrious, and a prey to the thousand frets of unoccupied leisure, sometimes sets himself to pray against his troubles. Now a man might as well pray against the sands in Sahara, as a lazy man to pray against petty troubles. Therefore it happens, sometimes, that bankruptcy brings a man what all his wealth failed to give—happiness; for he has real troubles, and trouble is a good medicine for trouble. There is a moral counter-irritation.—Henry Ward Beecher.

BEING LATE.

We don't suppose the brief homily which follows from an anonymous pen will change the Ethiopian's skin or the leopard's spots, but that will not deter us from presenting to the church commercial the moral ethics and the prudential maxims which go to make up and form the character of the good and the true merchant. There is a class of people who are always late. They are inevitably late to the cars, and they invariably have to jump for it if they are going on a steam-boat jaunt. Everything with these people is put off until the last moment, and then, if the plank is removed, they stand a capital chance of jumping overboard, in attempting to leap upon the deck after the paddle-wheels have commenced revolving. If the boat started an hour later it would be all the same to them, for they would just as inevitably be behind time, and come up or down a little too late to take things cool and comfortable. These late people have to stir their stumps or be left behind, when they have steam-boats or railroad cars to deal with; but they are the bane of the existence of punctual persons with whom they may have dealings, and who have no recourse in the way of tapping a big bell or blowing up a steam whistle, to hurry up the delinquent eleventh hour men. One procrastinating man will derange the best laid plan of hundreds, by failing to come up to time, and he wastes hours for others in his disregard for minutes.—New Orleans Picayune.

AN UXORIOUS MONSTER.

While lying in Black River harbor, Jamaica, two sharks were frequently seen playing about the ship. At length the female was killed, and the desolation of the male was excessive. What he did without her, remains a secret; but what he did with her, was clear enough—for scarce was the breath out of his Eurydice's body, when he stuck his teeth in her and began to eat her up with all possible expedition. Even the sailors felt their sensibility excited by so peculiar a mark of posthumous attachment; and to enable him to perform this melancholy duty the more easily, they offered to be his carvers, lowered their boat, and proceeded to chop his better half in pieces with their hatchets, while the widower opened his jaws as wide as possible, and gulped down pounds upon pounds of the dear departed as fast as they were thrown to him, with the greatest delight and all the avidity imaginable. I make no doubt that all the while he was eating, he was thoroughly persuaded that every morsel that went into his stomach would make its way to his heart directly. "She was perfectly consistent," he said to himself. "She was excellent through life, and really she's extremely good now she's dead!"—Wilson.

How small a portion of our life it is, that we really enjoy. In youth, we are looking forward to things that are to come; in old age, we are looking backwards to things that are gone past; in manhood, although we appear indeed to be more occupied in things that are present, yet even that is too often absorbed in vague determinations to be vastly happy on some future day, when we have time.—Lacon.

Curious Matters.

Sucking up Water from Sand.

Livingstone, the American traveller, describes an ingenious method by which the Africans obtain water in the desert: "The women tie a bunch of grass to one end of a reed about two feet long, and insert it in a hole dug as deep as the arm will reach, then ram down the wet sand firmly around it. Applying the mouth to the free end of the reed, they form a vacuum in the grass beneath, in which the water collects, and in a short time rises to the mouth." It will be perceived that this simple, but truly philosophical and effectual method, might have been applied in many cases, in different countries, where water was greatly needed to the saving of life. It seems wonderful that it should have been now first made known to the world and that it should have been habitually practised in Africa, probably for centuries. It seems worthy of being particularly noticed, that it may no longer be neglected from ignorance. It may be highly important to travellers on our Western deserts and prairies, in some parts of which water is known to exist below the surface."

Strange Cure for Epilepsy.

An instance of the utility of a black silk handkerchief in cases of epilepsy occurred a few days ago in Paris. A young girl fell down in the public streets in a strong epileptic fit. A crowd immediately collected round her, but for some moments nobody could think of any means of assistance. A sergeant de ville, however, coming up, and seeing what was the matter, asked a bystander to lend him a black silk neckcloth, and, having obtained it, he covered the girl's face with the silk, and in the course of a few seconds she began to recover. The convulsions ceased, consciousness returned, and in a short time she got up and walked quietly home, having first thanked the officer for his kindness. A medical man, who happened to be present towards the termination of the scene, complimented the sergeant de ville, and said to him: "You have taught me a mode of treatment of which I shall avail myself in future."

A Skeleton fourteen Centuries Old.

The Akkbar of Algiers mentions an interesting discovery recently made at Dellys by some soldiers, while engaged digging out the foundations for erecting a stable. They found a tomb with a marble slab supported by columns and statuettes, very well sculptured; the whole in an excellent style of art. The tomb contained a leaden coffin, in which was a skeleton in good preservation, supposed to be that of a woman. The monument is Roman, and belongs to the 4th or 5th century of the Christian era. No inscription has yet been discovered, but it is hoped that when the monument shall have been completely laid open, one will be found.

A Modern Cæsus.

Monsieur Greffulhe, of Paris, who died recently, owned a whole street there, which he built, and called Rue Greffulhe. He is said to have possessed more gold and silver, on special deposit at the Bank of France, than any other banker in Paris. When the revolution of February occurred, he had $8,000,000 in gold and silver. His mania was to have his specie deposit in coin, while the Rothschilds and other bankers keep their deposits in gold or silver bars or coin.

Dancing Fanatics.

The following extraordinary tale appears in the "Echo de la Frontiere," published at Valenciennes: "A family named Brisson, consisting of two brothers (one married), two sisters, and a child five years of age, were one evening, recently, quietly seated at supper. All at once, one of them, seized with some sudden vertigo, jumped up and began talking most incoherently, and all the other members of the family being attacked in a similar way, did the same. They then all began dancing, and afterwards stripped themselves of the whole of their garments, singing, as they did so, sacred hymns. They next took the child, tied him to a ladder as if to crucify him, and then stuck pins into the fleshy part of his person, continuing to dance and sing all the while. Their next exploit was to ascend the roof of the house and pour water down the chimney to extinguish, as they said, the fires of purgatory. At this moment, the neighbors interfered and released the little boy, who was insensible from his sufferings. The cause of the sudden madness has not been ascertained."

A Curious Story.

A curious case is now before one of the courts at Hamburg, in Germany, and exciting much interest, in a certain quarter of the city. A young shoemaker lately received from America a large sum of money, left to him by his unknown parents at their death. The story goes that in 1835, an alleged Polish count, a refugee, resided for some time in the quarter in question. While there, the countess, his wife, gave birth to a son, which she left with the nurse at the time of her departure for America with her husband. The child was put to board with a worthy shoemaker, who taught him his trade, without informing him of his parentage. The investigation now going on, will probably throw much light on this affair, which is to make a rich man and a count of a poor shoe maker.

A Wooden Watchman.

A curious piece of mechanism has been invented and exhibited in Great Britain. It is called the "alarm statue," and is designed for the protection of dwelling-houses, etc., from midnight depredators. This automaton represents a soldier in full regimentals, six feet in height; its position is erect, in the manner of a sentinel on duty, having a blunderbuss in his hand. Upon touching a wire, it immediately turns round in that direction, drops its head, and fires the piece, at the same time ringing two alarm-bells, and pronouncing the word "fire," in a distinct and audible voice.

A Petrifying Stream.

The Placerville (California) Argus says: "There is a little stream which empties into Shasta Valley, possessing the singular property of incrusting everything that falls into its waters with a complete coat of stone. Flowers, leaves, grass, pine buds, etc., will become completely enamelled in the course of a week or so, retaining in the process their natural form."

A Prodigy.

The Ocean, of Brest, says that there is now residing in that town a deaf and dumb man, named Moses, a native of Ratibon, in Bavaria, who has taught himself Latin, and fourteen of the living languages of Europe, all of which he writes with extraordinary facility—and who, besides, makes the most difficult arithmetical calculations with astonishing correctness and rapidity.

A Singular Phenomenon.

At one of the meetings of the Scientific Association at Montreal, Professor Snell, of Amherst College, read a paper upon "Vibrations over the Dam at Holyoke, Mass." A letter gives the following notice of it: "There is found an unbroken sheet of water, one thousand feet long and thirty feet high, which vibrates constantly—inasmuch that all the doors and windows within miles of the spot keep time with the vibrations at the falls. These are at the rate of two for every second. This phenomenon, when seen from below, some sunshiny morning, is exceedingly beautiful. It was illustrated thus: If one should stand looking down a long street in a city, where every pane of glass was illuminated by a gas-light, and should see those lights extinguished and re-lighted twice every second, he might form a proper idea of the reflection of the sun's rays at these falls. The cause of the vibrations was attributed to the current of air passing between the fall and the dam—thus making an organ pipe one thousand feet in length."

An Old Story Repeated.

The Trieste Gazette relates the following mysterious story: "One of the noblest families of Vernon has just learned that it has been the victim of an audacious fraud. The young heir to the property having many years ago been put out to nurse, it so happened, one day, that he fell from a chest of drawers and broke his arm. Soon after, the mother arrived to visit her infant. The nurse, afraid of revealing the truth, presented her own child, instead of the little sufferer. The fraud succeeded, and the idea then struck her that she had better allow it to continue. The young peasant, accordingly, received the education of a noble, and the nobleman was brought up to follow the plough. It was but a few weeks ago, that the nurse, on her death-bed, confessed her crime. The peasant, her son, is now married to a noble lady, and it is not known how the interests engaged in the matter can be fairly conciliated."

Newly discovered Property of Chloroform.

The Abelle Medicate reports the case of a young man who badly scalded both legs in a cauldron of boiling water. He was immediately laid on a bed, an exciting potion administered, cod liver oil applied to his leg and he was twice bled, but the pain in the legs did not subside. A liniment of laudanum and cod liver oil was applied, also without effect in abating the pain. But chloroform having been substituted for laudanum, immediate relief ensued, and was maintained by continuing the same process until recovery.

Discovery in Electricity.

Dr. C. G. Page, of Washington, has discovered that positive electricity will extinguish the flame of a lamp, and negative electricity will increase it. When the flame of about two inches height is charged positively from a powerful machine, it is rapidly shortened to total extinction. When the flame is charged negatively, it is immediately enlarged, a portion of it being impelled down around the wick tube for the distance of an inch, and a portion also elongated above.

Delicate Eating.

The "Digger Indians," of California, catch cartloads of grasshoppers by driving them into a pit dug for the purpose, after which they are baked by a fire encircling the pit, and then pulverized into flour, from which various delicate viands are prepared for the Indian palate.

Family Names.

The following facts are from an interesting article on the family nomenclature of England and Wales, in the sixteenth annual report of the register general of England: The indexes for births, marriages and deaths for seventeen and a half years contains more than 21,000,000 names. In England, Smith is by far the most common name, while in Wales, the name of Jones predominates. During the period above named, the records of both England and Wales show 285,087 persons named Smith, and 282,900 named Jones. Of the whole population of England and Wales in 1855, one person in 73 was named Smith, one in 76 was a Jones, one in 114 a Williams, one in 148 a Taylor, one in 162 a Davis, and one in 175 a Brown. Over half a million of the whole population were named Smith or Jones.

Miserly Avarice.

A German beggar woman at Elizabeth, New Jersey, who had for years subsisted on the private charity of the public, which she gained by her squalid poverty and apparent necessities, recently died and an examination was made of her effects. To the astonishment of all, there was found among them ten or twelve thousand dollars in excellent bonds and mortgages upon the best of property, all of which was available cash. This miserable creature had been saving and investing the proceeds of her beggary, excepting only that which was necessary to save her from starvation, until it had attained this very respectable sum. Leaving no heirs, the money will revert to the town or city in which she lived.

Natural Instinct.

It has been observed that turtles cross the ocean from the Bay of Honduras to the Cayman Isles, near Jamaica, a distance of four hundred and fifty miles, with an accuracy superior to the chart and compass of human skill; for it is affirmed that vessels which have lost their latitude in hazy weather have steered entirely by the noise of the turtles in swimming. The object of their voyage, as of the migration of birds, is for the purpose of laying eggs on a spot particularly favorable.

Singular Tree.

In the Island of Goa, near Bombay, there is a singular vegetable, called "the sorrowful tree," because it only flourishes in the night. At sunset no flowers are to be seen, and yet after half an hour it is full of them. They yield a sweet smell, but the sun no sooner begins to shine upon them than some of them fall off, and others close up; and others continue flowering in the night during the whole year.

Making Wood Fire-proof.

Professor Rochelder, of Prague, says the California Farmer, has just discovered a new antiphlogistic material which promises to become of importance. It is a liquid chemical composition, the secret of which is not yet divulged, which renders wood and other articles indestructible by fire. Several successful experiments have been made, and others are promised on a larger scale.

Gas Experiment.

An exhibition of gas-light can be made in the following manner. Procure a tobacco pipe, with a long stem, and put into the bowl a small walnut, then cover the top of the bowl with clay, and let it dry. After it is dry, heat the bowl in the fire, when a white gas will issue from the stem. This may be lighted, and it will burn for some time.

The Florist.

Lilies for a bridal bed,
Roses for a matron's head,
Violets for a maiden dead,—
Pansies let thy flower be.—SHELLEY.

Epacris.

The Epacris is a New Holland shrub, which the first settlers took for a kind of Heath. The Epacris should be grown in a soil composed of turf bog, chopped small, but not crumbled, and mixed with sand; and they do best in double pots, with moss, kept moist, stuffed between them; as, if the hot sun comes to the outside of the pot, the tender roots will be withered, and the plants are checked if not killed. The plants should be potted high like Heath. They require plenty of air and light, but not much heat; sufficient to exclude the frost in winter is quite enough for them. Cuttings of young woods may be struck in pure sand, under a bell-glass, and with the aid of bottom heat.

Moral of the Garden.

Nothing teaches patience like a garden. All have to wait for the fruits of the earth. You may go round and watch the opening bud from day to day; but it takes its own time, and you cannot urge it on faster than it will. If forced, it is only torn to pieces. All the best results of a garden, like those of life, are slowly but regularly progressive. Each year does a work that nothing but a year can do. "Learn to labor and to wait" is one of the best lessons of a garden. All that is good takes time, and comes only by growth.

Crucianella.

A very beautiful little plant. It is a hardy perennial, a native of the mountains of Persia, growing about a foot high in any common garden soil, and well adapted for beds in a geometric flower-garden, from its profusion of bright pink flowers, which it continues producing from June to September. It is well adapted for rock-work, and is increased by dividing the roots.

Periploca.

A handsome, hardy climber, with velvet-like flowers of a singular color, being a dark purplish maroon. It will grow in any light, rich soil, and is very suitable for covering arbors. It is said to be fatal to flies, and that numbers of dead flies may be swept up every day in bowers covered by it. Propagated by layers or cuttings.

Funkia.

The Japan Day-lily. They are natives of Japan and China, and are grown here in the open air, though they must be started in pots in the house, and not turned into the border until rather late in the season. They are quite hardy, and require a dry warm border, sheltered from the north winds.

Heliophila.

Beautiful little annual plants, natives of the Cape of Good Hope, generally with blue flowers, and very long, slender stems. The seeds should be sown in a hot-bed, in March, and the plants removed to the borders, in a warm, sheltered situation, in the latter part of May.

Pitcarnia.

Handsome herbaceous stove plants, with pine-apple-like leaves, and very singular scarlet or pinkish flowers. Should be grown in sandy peat and rich loam.

Ampelopsis.

Well known by its English names of Virginia Creeper and Five-leaved Ivy. Its flowers have no beauty, but it is worth cultivating as an ornamental plant, from the brilliant scarlet which its leaves assume in autumn, and which look particularly well at that season, when intermingled and contrasted with the rich dark, glossy green leaves of the English Ivy. The plant is very rapid in growth, and is propagated by cuttings or layers. The Virginian Creeper is one of our finest indigenous climbers. It grows very rapidly, attaching itself firmly to wood and stone buildings.

Fontanestea.

A shrub or low tree, resembling in appearance the common Privet, but with handsomer flowers, which are at first whitish, but afterwards become a brownish yellow. It is a native of Syria, where its leaves remain on all the year; but in this climate they drop off in the course of the winter. It will grow in any common garden soil, and is propagated by layers, cuttings and grafting on the Privet.

Erythrina.

The Coral Tree. Stove and green-house shrubs, with splendid coral-colored flowers. E. laurifolia and E. Crista-galli will grow in the open border, and will flower magnificently in a warm sunny border, if sheltered by a south wall. The soil should be sandy loam, or loam and peat; and they are propagated by cuttings of the young wood struck in sand under glass, but without bottom heat.

Geaneria.

Showy hot-house plants, generally with intensely brilliant scarlet flowers. They require rich light soil, and are propagated by cuttings struck in sand under a bell glass with the aid of bottom heat. It is a very difficult plant to propagate, as it is very susceptible to any very slight excess of heat or cold, but it well repays any trouble.

Cotula.

Hardy annuals, the flowers of which are like little golden balls. It will grow in any common garden soil, and requires to be sown in April, with the usual treatment of hardy annuals.

Sanguisorba.

Great Burnett is the name by which it is commonly known. Most of the exotic kinds are very hardy. Should be sown in a rich, light soil. They are increased by dividing the roots.

Amethystea.

An annual plant with brilliant blue flowers; a native of Siberia, of easy culture in any soil or situation, except that it will not bear transplanting unless when very young, and it is rather difficult then to make the plants live.

Dimorphotheoca.

Professor De Candolle's new name for the Cape Marigolds, formerly called Calendula pluvialis and C. hybrida.

Ferraria.

Cape tuberous-rooted plants, with very curious flowers, and requiring the usual culture of similar plants.

Didiscus.

Beautiful Australian plants, sometimes called by this name, and sometimes by that of Trachemene. They are half hardy annuals, that require to be raised in a hot-bed, and not planted out into the borders till May or June. In very cold or exposed situations they are generally grown in pots, and kept in the green-house; but they never flower so well as in the open ground. The best way to grow them is to sow the seed in autumn as soon as it can be procured from seed-shops, on a slight hot-bed, to pot the plants as soon as they have formed their second pair of leaves, and to keep the pots in a frame or green-house, shifting the plants occasionally, till the following spring, when they may be planted in the open ground in a light rich soil, and they will flower beautifully.

Wash for Fruit Trees.

Make a firm soap of one part lamp oil (no matter how much candied) and six or eight parts of strong ley or potash solution; one part of this soap and eight of warm water—apply with a brush, or cloth attached to a long handle. I have used this wash with perfect success on young trees, entirely destroying the aphids when the trees were nearly covered with them, and giving to the bark a healthy and vigorous appearance. Apply the wash in February or March.

Leycesteria.

A very handsome plant with long spikes of reddish flowers, which will not only thrive but grow more luxuriantly in the immediate neighborhood of the sea than in any other situation. It is a native of Nepal, and was introduced in 1824. It was lost for some time, owing to injudicious treatment, but has lately been re-introduced. It is propagated by cuttings and seeds.

Notelaea.

Australian shrubs with white flowers, greatly resembling in their leaves and general appearance the European Olive. They are generally kept in the green-house, and grown in sandy peat; but they are nearly hardy, and make good shrubs for a background or balcony.

Julibrissan.

This beautiful tree, which is a kind of Acacia, is called the silk-tree, from the abundance of its long, fine, tassel-like blossoms. It is rather tender here, requiring protection during the winter, but grows freely in Italy.

Zygophyllum.

The Bean Caper. Green-house and hardy perennials, which will grow in any common garden soil that is somewhat loamy. They are propagated by cuttings very readily.

Fuschia.

The Port Faroni Fuschia (F. discolor), though quite hardy in the north of Scotland, will not stand well near London, as it is much injured by smoke.

Callichroa.

The only species known is a showy California annual, with golden yellow flowers, requiring the usual treatment of California annuals.

Gaura.

Curious hardy annual and biennial flowers, very pretty, and requiring only the culture of their respective kinds.

Hyacinths.

In the management of hyacinths in glasses, it may be remarked, that, when a succession of flowers is wanted, the bulbs may be put in every fortnight. Place in the bulbs, and then fill up with water just so that the bottoms of each will be immersed an eighth of an inch; then put the glasses in a dark cool room until the roots have protruded a half an inch or so, which is generally in about ten days. They should be exposed to the sun, light and air, as much as possible; if they receive the sun on one side only, they should be turned round every two or three days, to prevent their growing crooked.

Toads in Gardens.

Various remedies have been given for the prevention of the ravages of insects in gardens. Young chickens are often allowed to run in the gardens, but the remedy is only partial; chickens will only eat a few species of insects, and these are apt to be the least destructive. Toads do an infinite degree of good. Excepting the black "pumpkin bug," toads will eat any bug, worm or fly, that belongs to the catalogue of enemies to farmer or gardener. The more full grown toads you have in a garden the better. Never drive them away—seek rather to bring them there.

Nitrate of Soda.

This substance, which is found in great abundance as a natural production of the earth of South America, is a very powerful manure; but it must be applied cautiously, or it will make the leaves look brown and shrivelled. It should be well mixed with the soil in which plants are to be placed, and not laid on the surface. When it produces the proper effect, it gives great vigor to the plant, and renders their leaves an intense bright green.

Passerina.

Sparrow-wort. Most of the species are Cape shrubs, which require a green-house in this climate. One species, P. hirsuta, is a native of the south of Europe, and bears small yellow flowers. They are all more curious than beautiful, and scarcely pay for the trouble of raising them, being almost wholly devoid of fragrance.

Stellaria.

Very pretty plants with white flowers, many of which are natives of Britain. They are all quite hardy, but grow best in sandy soil. The dwarf kinds are suitable for rock-work. They are propagated by seeds, which thus ripen freely, or by division of the root.

Cynoglossum.

Hounds' Tongue. Pretty little biennial and annual plants; natives of Europe, and requiring only the common culture of plants of a similar nature. Venus's Navelwort was formerly considered as belonging to this genus.

Adenophora.

Perennial plants, with blue, bell-shaped flowers, resembling the Campanulas. They require to be planted in a rich, light soil, and are easily killed by too much moisture. They are natives of Siberia.

Empetrum.

The Crow Berry. Little heath-like plants, with pretty flowers and very showy berries, adapted for growing on rock-work. They should be grown in peat soil, and kept rather dry.

The Housewife.

Apple Fritters.

Pare and core some fine large pippins, and cut them into round slices. Soak them in wine, sugar, and nutmeg, for two or three hours. Make a batter of four eggs; a table-spoonful of rose-water; a table-spoonful of wine; a table-spoonful of milk; thicken with enough flour, stirred in by degrees, to make a batter; mix it two or three hours before it is wanted, that it may be light. Heat some butter in a frying-pan; dip each slice of apple separately in the batter, and fry them brown; sift pound-sugar, and grate nutmeg over them.

Common Tins.

Throw some wood-ashes into a wash-kettle, pour on water till it is two-thirds full, and then let it boil. Or make a strong lye. Dip in the tins when it is boiling hot; and, if they are very dirty, leave them in about ten minutes. Take them out, and cover them with a mixture of soft soap and the very finest sand. This must be rubbed on with a coarse tow-cloth. Then rinse them in a tub of cold water, and set them in the sun to drain and dry. When dry, finish by rubbing them well with a clean woolen cloth or flannel. They will look very nice and bright.

Barley Water.

Take four large table-spoonfuls of well-picked and washed pearl barley, and put it into a porcelain-lined kettle, containing two quarts of boiling water. Let it boil slowly till reduced to nearly one half the liquid. Strain it and season it with salt, and, if the patient's condition will admit of it, flavor it with white sugar and fresh lemon-juice. It is a grateful drink to invalids.

Raspberry Puffs.

Roll out thin some fine puff-paste, cut it in rounds or squares of equal size, lay some raspberry jam into each, moisten the edges of the paste, fold and press them together, and bake the puffs from ten to fifteen minutes. Strawberry, or any other jam will serve for them equally well.

A cheap Suet Pudding.

With a pound of flour mix well an equal weight of good potatoes boiled and grated, a quarter pound of suet, and a small teaspoonful of salt. Make these into a stiff batter, with milk, and boil the pudding one hour in a well-floured cloth.

To destroy Rats.

Cut a number of corks or a piece of sponge as thin as sixpences; stew them in grease, and place them in the way of the rats. They will greedily devour this delicacy, and will die of indigestion.

Cheap Door-Mats.

Cut old broadcloth or any woolen articles into long strips from one to two inches broad. Braid three of these together, and sew the braid round in gradually increasing circles till large enough.

Cream Tea.

Four spoonful of boiling water to one spoonful of sweet cream, and a little loaf sugar. Delicate for the tenderest infant, but the cream must be genuine, not city cream.

To preserve Books.

A few drops of any perfumed oil will secure libraries from the consuming effects of mouldiness and damp. Russian leather which is perfumed with the tar of the birch-tree, never moulds; and merchants suffer large bales of this article to lie in the London Docks in the most careless manner, knowing that it cannot sustain any injury from damp.

The Bakewell Pudding.

Having covered a dish with thin puff paste, put a layer of any kind of jam about half an inch thick, then take the yolks of eight eggs and two whites, half a pound of sugar, half a pound of butter melted, and almond flavor to your taste; beat all well together; pour the mixture into the dish an inch thick, and bake it about an hour in a moderate oven.

Good plain Gingerbread.

Three-quarters of a pound of flour; a quarter of a pound of butter; a quarter of a pound of sugar; a quarter of a pound of treacle; a table-spoonful of cream, and ginger to the taste. Mix all together into a stiff paste, roll it out thin, and cut into small cakes; a little candied orange and lemon peel is a great improvement.

Snow-Balls.

One cup of sugar, two eggs, four table-spoonful of milk, a tea-spoonful of cream of tartar, and one of soda, if the milk is sour; if not, half a tea-spoonful; spice to your taste; flour to just roll out in balls; fry in lard, and dip in the white of an egg, then in powdered loaf sugar, till white.

Sponge Cake.

Ten eggs and their weight in sugar; beat the yolks with the sugar; take the weight of five eggs in flour sifted; beat the whites to a froth, and put in; add a half teaspoon of soda, and stir in the flour one of cream of tartar; add the flour as quickly as possible, and bake immediately.

Rice Pie.

To a pint of rice boiled soft, add a pint of rich cream, two eggs, salt, and a little mace. Let these ingredients be well mixed, spread half the quantity in a deep baking dish, lay pieces of chicken upon it, and cover them with the remainder of the rice, and bake it in a hot oven.

Lemon Pie.

For one pie, two lemons' juice and rinds, two cups of sugar, one cup of milk, two table-spoonful of corn-starch, the yolks of six eggs; bake it; then beat the whites of the eggs with eight table-spoonful of fine white sugar, and pour over it; put it in the oven, and dry.

Boiled Halibut.

The cut next to the tail is the nicest. Rub salt over it, soak it awhile in cold water, wash it, scrape it, pin it in a floured cloth, and put it in boiling water. Eight pounds will require a little more than half an hour's boiling.

Clams.

Lay them on the coals or gridiron, so that the shell will retain the liquor. When the shell opens, pour the liquor into a saucepan, cut out the clams and boil them. Add cream and salt, and pour them upon toasted bread.

Strengthening Jelly for Invalids.

One ounce of isinglass, half an ounce of gum-Arabic, a pint of port wine; sweeten with sugar-candy or loaf-sugar, and then flavor with cinnamon, or a little nutmeg and lemon-peel. The cinnamon may be boiled in a quarter of a pint of water for an hour; strain, and add the isinglass with another quarter of a pint of water; strain when it is dissolved, and add the other ingredients. Take a wineglassful the first thing in the morning, and the last at night, melted; or eat it cold, taking a piece the size of a nutmeg occasionally.

For Bread Jelly.

Measure a quart of boiling water, and set it away to get cold. Take one-third of an ordinary baker's loaf, slice it, pare off the crust, and toast the bread nicely to a light brown. Then put it into the boiling water, set it on hot coals in a covered pan, and boil it gently, till you find, by putting some in a spoon to cool, that the liquid has become a jelly. Strain it through a thin cloth, and set it away for use. When it is to be taken, warm a teacupful, sweeten it with sugar, and add a little grated lemon-peel.

Curried Chicken.

Lay the pieces of a dressed chicken into a stewpan with a sliced onion fried brown, a clove of garlic, and some good white gravy; simmer till the chicken is tender. add a spoonful of curry powder, flour rubbed smooth with a lump of butter; a quarter of a pint of cream, with a little salt may be added twenty minutes before serving; squeeze a little lemon into the dish, and put an edging of rice round the dish.

Apple Soufflet.

Prepare apples as for baking in a pudding, put them into a deep dish, and lay upon the top, about an inch and a half thick, rice boiled in new milk with sugar; beat to a stiff broth the whites of two or three eggs, with a little sifted loaf-sugar, lay it upon the rice, and bake it in an oven a light brown. Serve it instantly when done.

Cheese, boiled.

Grate a quarter of a pound of good cheese, put it into a sauce pan, with a bit of butter the size of a nutmeg, and half a tea-cupful of milk, stir it over the fire till it boil, and then add a well-beaten egg; mix it all together, put it into a small dish, and brown it before the fire.

To make a sweet Apple-Pie.

Pare and core your apples, grate them into a pomace, and then prepare it just as you would a pumpkin pie. It makes the most delicious pie we ever ate.

Imperial Drink.

Put half an ounce of cream of tartar, four ounces of white sugar, and three ounces of orange-peel into a pan; pour three pints of boiling water on, strain, and cool.

Blue Ink.

Dissolve a small quantity of indigo in a little oil of vitriol, and add a sufficient quantity of water, in which gum-arabic has been dissolved.

Mustard Plasters.

These should be covered with muslin, or the poultice put in a cloth bag, before being applied to the skin.

Cure for Rheumatism.

Of oil of rosemary, oil of cloves, oil of origanum, spirits of turpentine, spirits of ammonia, tincture of cantharides, and alcohol, take of each one ounce, and mix in a light glass-stopper bottle, and shake up when used. Heat a saucer on embers, pour a little in the saucer, and rub it on the part affected, with the hand, previously warmed by the fire, so as to encourage absorption. Also said to be very good for sick-headache.

Cough Mixture.

Take one teacupful of molasses; add two table-spoonsful of sugar; simmer this over the fire; then, when taken off, add three teaspoonsful of paregoric, and as much refined nitre as can be put upon the point of a small breakfast-knife. Of this mixture take two or three teaspoonsful on going to bed, and one or two during the day when you have a disposition to cough.

To keep Insects out of Bird-Cages.

Tie up a little sulphur in a silk bag, and suspend it in the cage. For mocking-birds this is essential to their health; and the sulphur will keep all the red ants and other insects from cages of all kinds of birds. Red ants will never be found in a closet or drawer if a small bag of sulphur is kept constantly in these places.

Wax Polish.

Melt beeswax in spirits of turpentine, with a very small proportion of rosin. When it is entirely dissolved, dip in a sponge and wash the mahogany lightly over with it. Immediately afterwards, rub it off with a clean soft cloth. For the carved work, spread on the mixture with a small soft brush, and rub it off with another brush a very little harder.

To make Court Plaster.

Stretch tightly, some thin black or flesh-colored silk in a wooden frame, securing it with pack-thread or small tacks. Then go all over it with a soft bristle brush dipped in dissolved isinglass or strong gum-arabic water. Give it two or three coats, letting it dry between each. Then go several times over it with white of egg.

Celery.

This delicious vegetable is not generally appreciated as a cooking vegetable. Wash the stems clean in salt and water, and drop them into boiling water; after boiling twenty minutes take up and drain; place some toasted bread in the bottom of a dish, lay the celery upon it, and season with butter, pepper and salt.

To cook Parsnips.

Scrape the parsnips, wash, and slice them lengthwise; boil in just water enough to cover them, till thoroughly done; then put in a piece of butter, with a little salt and pepper; beat up an egg with a spoonful of flour, and pour over them, and they are ready to dish up.

To make old writing legible.

Take six bruised gill-nuts, and put them to a pint of strong white wine; let it stand in the sun for forty-eight hours. Dip a brush in it and wash the writing, and by the color you will discover whether the mixture is strong enough of the galls

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

THE GLORY AND SHAME OF ENGLAND.

The military achievements of the English soldiery have been among the proudest of her boasts. These men have carried her flag in triumph over every quarter of the globe which is encircled by her drum-beat. They have encountered every hardship, confronted every peril, fought, bled and died, to give her greatness and colonial extension. The valor of England's soldiery is her glory; the treatment of England's soldiery, her shame. We need not recapitulate the privations to which the stupidity and culpable neglect of English officials doomed these men in the opening of the Crimean campaign, until exposure, insufficient food and quarters, decimated their ranks more cruelly than did the bullets of the Russians. But let us see how these poor men are treated at home—what are the tender mercies of the British military government to the privates of the army.

Very lately a private of the Sixth Northumberland Fusiliers was sentenced by a court-martial to receive 450 lashes, cut at the rate of nine at a time into his back. The poor victim to military tyranny—a man who has seen better circumstances, and is, we hear, connected with a distinguished family in the north of Ireland—when ordered to strip, sternly and steadily refused. On this, sixteen of the strongest and most muscular men stood forward, and hurled him, face downward, on the stone pavement of the racket-court. He manfully resisted this indignity, and with a voice trembling with emotion, requested them to take his life, but spare him this dishonor. A few moments, however, and he was stripped and tied to the triangles. Forth stepped one of the largest drummers, armed with a "cat," the length of the handle of which being eight inches, the nine-tails the same length, armed with pentagonal pieces of case-hardened steel, eighty-one in number.

At the first blow of the "cat," a piercing and unearthly shriek rung from the strong man in his agony. His lacerated flesh gaped under the blow, and lumps of flesh, at each fresh blow, were detached from his bleeding back, and hung about the wall of the racket court, and on the clothes of those standing by. The stern colonel, compelled to be an unwilling witness, turned, and leaning on the arm of the equally affected major, covered his face with his handkerchief, while deep sighs agitated his manly bosom, and plainly showed the struggle that was going on within. The surgeon, a most humane man, was obliged to be supported by his hospital sergeant, who, from time to time, administered to him restoratives, as well as to the suffering soldier. Man after man fell from the ranks, and was carried away fainting; tears bedewed the faces of nearly all the officers, and at length the poor sufferer was released from his torture, to linger in hospital, where he now lies, the whole of his spine being laid bare, and gangrene has ensued, leaving the tortured and lacerated wretch in such a state that every Christian can only hope that death, as it must do, will soon release him from his sufferings.

At the forty-fifth stroke of the instrument—that is, after receiving 405 lashes—the unhappy wretch, whom fortune saved from the hands of an Indian to fall into the hands of an English Nana Sahib, positively burst his bonds, in the contortions of agony, and fell in a bloody heap to the ground. He was again tied up, and the other forty-five wounds were inflicted. Not a single drop of Christian blood could the Shyllocks of the Fusiliers be persuaded to abate. Their victim received the full tale, and was carried to the hospital delirious, in a state which rendered it doubtful whether, in the event of his physical recovery, he would not be the inmate of a mad-house for life. A few years ago, an English hussar was whipped to death in the same manner.

We forbear comment on this bloody business. But we venture to make one suggestion. There are unemployed Englishmen in the United States, grumbling at and abusing our country, and incessantly lauding British institutions to the skies. To all such, we would say England needs men at this juncture, and the best thing they can do is to go home and enlist in the Fusiliers, that they may practically experience how superior British civilization is to that of all the rest of the world.

CHINA.—French bayonets, not English, did the business for the Chinese in taking Canton.

THE SABBATH IN EUROPE.

A great many false notions are prevalent with regard to the manner in which the Sabbath is spent in Europe among the humbler classes. Instead of giving them greater freedom, it increases their toils, as may be seen from the following intelligent statements of a foreign correspondent of the New York Times: "After a careful observation and experience in foreign cities, I am justified in this conclusion—the Sunday is a day of leisure to the moneyed classes of society, to whom all must be made easy, and a day of toil to the poorer. To the richer classes it is a gala day, but to those who have to provide the dress, pleasures and excursions of those above them, it is a time when their labors are more in demand than on any day of the week. Sunday is the day for the finest performances at the theatre and opera. It is the day for sumptuous dinners; for evening assemblies, concerts and balls. You may easily imagine, therefore, what an amount of labor is required, and especially when indifference to the day excludes all forethought. Young people are plying their needles on Sabbath morning, to complete the gay robe for the evening. Laundresses are commonly seen carrying through the streets articles of attire. Printers and bill-posters are engaged in announcing the amusements of the evening. Shoemakers are finishing dress boots; boys are carrying their home. Tailors are bending over brodered vests. The chief market of the week is held on the Sunday morning. Cooks, in the public kitchens, are busier than usual. Confectioners and decorators are pressed with labor. A carpenter in Nice said he would be grateful for any law that would exempt him from toil on the Sabbath. An eminent physician in Bonn told me that so numerous were the private and dancing parties on the Sunday evenings in Germany, that in hundreds of houses the servant girls were so hurried that they could only catch a moment to eat their food as they stood. The most painful thing about this is, that there is not the most distant conception of any injustice being done to the suffering toilers by this state of things. The amount of it all is, that the no-rest principle works well enough for the selfish aristocracy, but terribly for the poorer laboring classes. It would be so here, only that here, as in Europe, there can be no sound state of public or private morals, among rich or poor, without a day of sacred rest."

MATRIMONIAL.—A Miss Aurelia Will was lately married in Indianapolis to a Mr. Augustus Way. "Where there's A. Will there's A. Way."

OF INTEREST TO ALL!

We respectfully call the attention of every parent to the character of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, a work which will bring into your family circle, each successive week, more valuable information, and incite more inquiry, intelligence and love of all that is worth knowing and remembering, than a month of attendance can do in the best of schools. Conducted with a strict regard for morals (though free from all sectarian or sectional matter), it educates the eye by its beautiful illustrations, while its sixteen super royal pages induce a love for reading, and an inquiring mind, even in the youngest. Its engravings are not foolish caricatures, but embrace admirable delineations of eminent men and women all over the world; presenting accurate scenes in every part of the globe, especially throughout the United States; portraying all new enterprises, remarkable buildings, ships and steamers, and in short, forming a brilliant, illustrated record of just what everybody desires to know. In its foreign and domestic news, it embraces all that is noteworthy and presentable to the home circle, while all vulgar and revolting matters are scrupulously excluded. No mother need fear to read its every line to her young and pure-minded daughters. The family where BALLOU'S PICTORIAL is a regular visitor, cannot fail to realize and exhibit a much larger degree of intelligence, than those who are deprived of so valuable a means of pleasure, instruction and improvement. Procure a copy, examine it carefully, and you will realize not only its great excellence, but wonderful cheapness. For sale everywhere for FIVE CENTS per copy, or sent regularly to any part of the country for $2 50 a year.

BYRON AND AMERICA.—Byron's partiality towards America is well known, but perhaps never more strongly expressed than in a letter to Tom Moore, where he observes—"I would rather have a nod from an American, than a snuff-box from an emperor." Some of Byron's most particular friends were Americans.

A GOOD HIT.—Dante's famous line, "All hope abandon, ye who enter here!" has been recommended as a motto for American railroad cars.

CONUNDRUM.—When are codfish not codfish? When they are kept too long and are smelt.

"THE PAST AT LEAST IS SECURE."

This oft-quoted remark of Daniel Webster in his celebrated eulogism upon Massachusetts, in reply to Senator Hayne, is, like almost everything from that great orator, replete with significance. Webster possessed the power of condensed, discriminating, and forcible expression of thought in a greater degree than any public man of his day. At the utterance of the terse, comprehensive, and deeply significant sentence above quoted, who could fail to see arising before him the glorious record of the Old Bay State?—its sturdy pilgrim settlement by self-exiles for conscience sake; its rigid puritan foundation of civil and religious institutions; its stern morality and decorum of character; its early, persistent and thorough diffusion of the blessings of common schools; its gallant and loyal vindication of the rights of the British crown against French encroachments; its prompt and decided resistance to the oppressions of the mother country; its free and fearless espousal of the cause of American liberty; its noble achievements in the War of Independence; its thrift, probity and industry, pervading all its career from first to last, and enabling it to bend the boisterous ocean, the granite hills, the mountain streams of summer, and the icy ponds of winter, to that mighty aggregate of commerce, agriculture and manufactures which make up the property of its sons? Who could fail to behold this wonderful panorama of the past of Massachusetts, sweep before his mental vision as those few, short and thrilling words of the speaker rang upon his ear? Yes, the past is indeed secure; a high and honorable past, to which every son of the State may recur with pride and satisfaction. It is a record of great events, and noble men; events all-powerful in their influence upon the progress and destiny of our country, and men who stamped their character upon all our institutions, social, political and religious.

But we read another lesson also in the weighty words of Webster. He could with truth say for us that the past is secure; but what shall be said by those who are to come after us, in that distant day when the present of our time shall be a part of the mighty and irrevocable past? In that future when Webster shall take his stand with the few great men of national renown whose name and fame survive the era of their lives, and the voluminous records of now passing events shall be condensed into one brief, expressive page of history; shall the men of Massachusetts, as they scan the works of our day, have reason to proclaim with honorable pride, that the past is still secure? If so, then have we other employment than merely to exult in the fame of Massachusetts; other duty than a simple commendation of the virtues of those who have gone before us. The men of Massachusetts of to day are to see to it that the future fame of the State shall be worthy of the past; that the page of history which is now evolving from the transactions of the present, shall be in entire keeping with the bright record of which we are now so justly proud. It is the duty of the present generation to emulate as well as praise the Spartan virtues of their predecessors. Order, sobriety, righteousness, frugality and industry, are as necessary for us as they were for them; and if these virtues be neglected in the Commonwealth, no master-spirit of the future time can rise up amidst his fellow-countrymen, and with their applauding sanction declare of us and our times, "the past at least is secure."

WORTH THINKING OF.—Many of our readers and subscribers have quite a collection of magazines, sheet music, pamphlets, and the like, lying about their rooms in the most unavailable form. Now to double their value, to preserve them, and to make them convenient for use and ornamental to your apartments, you have only to place them together, send to our office by express, or hand them in personally, and they will be bound up in any desired style, at the lowest rates, and returned to you in one week. A valuable collection of books is accumulated in a little while by this means at an extremely trifling cost.

"THE ARKANSAS RANGER: OR, Dingle the Backwoodsman."—So great has been the demand for this remarkable story, we have now issued it in bound form, fully illustrated. It may be found at all of the periodical depots, price sixteen cents. Or we will send it, post paid, to any part of the country on the receipt of twenty cents.

NOT VERY CREDITABLE.—It is stated on what appears to be undoubted authority, that the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, contains more grogeries than any other city in the United States, except New York.

A TRUE THOUGHT.—A beautiful face is a silent praise, when the expression is that of goodness and sincerity.

NEW YORK STREETS.—New York has nearly five hundred miles of paved streets. No wonder they find it hard work to keep them clean.

A HORSE EXHIBITION.

Some years ago, in the Massachusetts Legislature, a waggish member of that honorable body brought about an adjournment by an expedient somewhat amusing, which created a good deal of merriment at the time. The usual hour of adjournment was about two o'clock, but many of the country members were in the practice of slipping off quietly at an earlier hour, and going to their boarding-houses to their one o'clock dinner. After despatching their meal, they would return to duty, and then, being well fortified for legislative business, they were not particularly anxious to adjourn just at two o'clock, and if any question of interest were pending, would vote down the motion to adjourn, when made. On the occasion referred to, some question of interest was up, which the country gentlemen wished to have taken before the House adjourned, and so when two o'clock arrived and the usual motion to adjourn was made, they defeated it. The Boston men were hungry, and after intervening motions, tried the adjournment again and again, but were as often defeated. They began to look aghast at the prospect of going without their dinner, and some of the two o'clock country members, being equally hungry, sympathized with them in their desperate prospects.

At length one of the "Boston crowd," who was famed for his good taste in feeding, and keen appetite, privately appealed to an eminent counsellor from Middlesex County to get them out of the scrape. Upon this, the gentleman appealed to arose, and, with great gravity and deliberation, proceeded to address the Speaker, stating that the gentlemen from the country were generally interested in agriculture, and would therefore be glad to know that there was to be a public horse-exhibition in Tremont Street, that afternoon, at three o'clock, which they would doubtless like to attend. The exhibition was to take place at Mr. Kimball's museum, and was called "The Enchanted Horse;" he would therefore move that the House adjourn. This preface and motion, propounded to the House in such a solemn manner, convulsed the members with laughter, in the midst of which the Speaker put the question, declared it carried, and adjourned the session.

ANKLES VS. LEGS.—They have been giving the Italian opera, with the usual accompaniments, in Constantinople; but the Turks scout the music, while they are delighted with the ballet. Henceforth the musical part of the opera will be omitted, to please them.

A FREE-AND-EASY SET.

The gentry of the Duchy of Cornwall, in the south-west of England, prior to the modern improvements of travelling, were pretty much secluded from the rest of the world, and thrown upon their own resources to kill time and amuse themselves. They accordingly clubbed together for fun and frolic. "One-and-All," a favorite Cornish motto, expresses the gregarious nature of the pursuits and amusements induced by this seclusion. The same spirit of aggregation manifests itself among them, even at the present day, when by the agency of roads the exclusiveness of their social circle has been penetrated, and to some extent broken up, and when the jolly wassail of the olden time has given way to a more moderate life. The "one-and-all" principle now develops itself in camp meetings, temperance parties, and monster tea-drinkings.

But in "the days of good Queen Bess," these Cornwall gentry seem to have gone in for a good time after a regular "one-and-all" fashion. Carew, a writer of those people and times, informs us that it was common for a gentleman and his wife to ride to his next neighbor's to make merry, and after a day or two thus spent, these two couples would go to a third, and so on, from house to house, increasing like a rolling snowball, until the party got so large as to be unmanageable, and then broke up and dispersed. They were also in the habit of amusing themselves with cock-fights in their drawing-rooms, after their great dinner parties, to the delight of both ladies and gentlemen. It would appear, however, that these battles were bloodless, and comparatively harmless, for the birds were not armed with steel gaffs, and had their spurs cut short.

WELLERISMS.—"I'm ready to go off by the train," as the barrel of gunpowder said to Guy Fawkes. "I can't bear you," as the sea said to the leaky ship. "You'll break my heart," as the oak said to the hatchet. "My heart is thine," as the cabbage said to the cook-maid.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?—Our romantic young ladies have got a trick, lately, of Frenchifying their names by the addition of an ie. We think Mary is as pretty as Marie. It certainly don't change the i-dear.

WESTWARD HO!—The season, is setting strong for the fertile prairies of the Far West, the development of which nothing can check.

THE DRAMA.

Much of the prejudice that formerly existed against dramatic representations, among the people of New England, has disappeared of late years, in consequence of certain adjuncts to intemperance and immorality having been cut off from dramatic establishments. Boston took the lead in this just and righteous reform, and set a good example for the imitation of other cities and towns in this part of the country. There is no necessary connection between vice and the drama; and the conductors, as well as the patrons of dramatic exhibitions, would do well to see that the present divorce between the two is not annulled by even the slightest appearance of a re-union. In their origin, it would appear that dramatic shows were designed to aid the cause of religion, at least since the initiation of the Christian era; for we find them adopted by the early fathers of the Christian church for the purpose of representing historical incidents and doctrines of a religious character. As to Ancient Greece, the purpose was not so evident—though the mythology of that volatile people bore so lightly upon them, as to make it hard to discriminate between their amusements and their devotions. That the Roman drama was instituted to subserve the purposes of the priesthood, does not admit of doubt.

The respectable firm of Susarian and Dolon enacted the first Greek comedy of which history gives us any notice, upon a platform drawn on wheels, at Athens, some five or six hundred years before the Christian era. The "proceeds of the house" were a basket of figs and a cask of wine, which could not have been very remunerative to the enterprising managers. The Chorus followed next in order, in which certain actors represented a scene in dumb show, followed by choristers singing the story. Then came the Greek Tragedy, which Pliny tells us was represented at Athens by Thespis of Icaria, the inventor of tragedy, in the year 536, B. C. Mr. Thespis appeared in Alceſtis, performing, like his worthy predecessors of comedy, upon a wagon. He got only a goat as the avails of his performance, which does not speak very well for the liberality of the patrons of the drama in that day. Prizes for tragedies were subsequently instituted, of which the first was carried off by Eschylus. After this, prizes were taken by Sophocles, 480 B. C.; by Euripides, 442 B. C.; and by Astydamus, 337 B. C. Before this time the wagon starring gave place to theatres—the Bacchus Theatre at Athens having been built by Philos, 420 B. C.

The first knowledge we have of dramatic exhibitions in Ancient Rome, is found in the history of the Consulate of Sulpicius Peticus and Licinius Stolo, in the year 364 B. C. At this time, a plague raged in the city; and to appease the incensed deities, the magistrates instituted the games called Scenici, from scena, a tent or bower. These games were introduced from Etruria, and consisted of dances performed after the Tuscan manner, to the music of the flute. Whether these dramatic exhibitions had the desired effect in staying the ravages of the plague, we are not informed; but if they did, probably the utilitarian doubter of the present day would ascribe the effect to the cheerful tone of mind which they inspired in the populace, rather than the propitiation of the offended deities. A cheerful temper is a good preventive of disease; and public authorities should not lose sight of this great hygienic fact, in their fitful eruptions of zeal to suppress popular amusements.

Next came satires, accompanied with music set to the flute, still keeping the infant drama of Rome in the hands of the magistrates, for the purpose of correcting the vices of the people. Livius Andronicus, originally a Greek captive and slave to a Roman noble, appeared as the leader of the drama, about 240 B. C. He abandoned the simple satire, writing plays with a regular and connected plot, which, Thespis-like, he acted himself. The magistrates employed him to compose a hymn, which was sung to propitiate the deities and avert a threatened calamity. In his old age, this one-horse dramatist, who appears to have given such great satisfaction to the people, that they assigned him a building on the Aventine hill for a theatre, finding his voice to fail him, employed an apprentice, who recited the verses to music while he postured and gesticulated. At length, a company of actors occupied his theatre, for whom he continued to write plays; but the custom of employing different performers for the action and the diction, continued long after, through the most refined periods of Roman taste. The plays of Livius continued in favor for many generations, though Cicero and Horace turned up their literary noses at them.

The modern drama arose early in the history of France, Germany and England. Stories from the Bible, represented by the priests, were the origin of sacred comedy; and the Sacred Mysteries, performed under the auspices of the early church, gave birth to the romantic dramas of later days. Through these various phases, the regular drama gradually assumed its modern aspect, and became perfect in England in the days of Elizabeth, when Shakspeare dawned upon the world in his two-fold capacity of player and dramatist. The first royal license for the drama, in England, was to Master Barbage and four others, to act plays at the Globe, Bankside, 1574; Shakspeare and his associates were licensed in 1603. Plays were opposed by the Puritans, and suspended during the Commonwealth, but restored again in 1660. About this time the women's parts were first represented by females, instead of boys, a practice which had hitherto obtained. The first attempt at theatricals in the United States was made in Boston in 1750, when Otway's Orphan was acted. A strolling company acted in New York, in a sail-loft, in 1758. The first regular theatre was established in 1793, in New York; the second in Boston, soon after; and the third in Philadelphia. From that time to the present, the drama has had its ups and downs among our people; but at last, owing to the reforms alluded to in the commencement of this article, it seems to be pretty firmly established, and contributing its full share towards a healthy popular temperament.

SALERATUS.

"A Physician" writes us very strongly against the use of saleratus in cooking, as being injurious to the health, and particularly to the teeth. He says that in all cases where soda and saleratus are used by housewives, yeast would be found a good substitute. The following article on the same point, from the New York Presbyterian, is worthy of careful consideration:

"At a late convention of dentists, it was asserted that the main, if not the sole cause of the great increase of defective teeth was the use of saleratus and cream of tartar in the manufacture of bread; and Dr. Baker fully agreed with the facts offered in proof, adding the result of some experiments made by himself. He soaked sound teeth in a solution of saleratus, and they were destroyed in fourteen days. We have the opinion of men whose talents, time and zeal are given to dentistry, that saleratus and cream of tartar in bread are a chief cause of ruin to the teeth. Now will those who know this fact go on eating all that come in their way, without inquiring what it is made of?"

THE DRUNKARD'S DEATH.—On one of our railroads lately an intoxicated man fell while walking on the track, and fifteen cars went over him.

THE LAW OF BENEVOLENCE.—Although benevolent men cannot do all the good they would, their duty is to do all the good they can.

THE REASON WHY.—Blubber in whales is so called because Jonah cried three days and nights in the belly of one.

WILLIAM PENN.

The character of the founder of Pennsylvania has by general consent settled down in history as that of an amiable, benevolent and humane man, working in strict consistency of moral conduct and religious opinion, for the good of mankind. His espousal of the Quaker doctrines and manners, and endurance of persecution for the sake of his faith, have sometimes been set down to the score of obstinacy, but never to the account of any motive of worldly gain. Penn's father was wealthy, and though his own means were always ample for his desires, yet he did not hesitate to brave his parent's displeasure in the defence of the cause he loved. He also made a noble and disinterested use of the grant of territory in America which King Charles II. made to him, in consideration of his father's services and sacrifices in the royal cause; founding upon it the colony of Pennsylvania, and treating the Indian occupants of the land with humanity and justice. It has been left for the new English lord, T. B. Macaulay to asperse his character and defame his memory, which he attempts to do in his History of England. We think, however, that the fame of Penn will withstand the assaults of this English lordling quite as well as that of Washington does the slur of his fellow-historian, Lord Mahon. Macaulay says Penn took a bribe for procuring a pardon, and Mahon says Washington sacrificed Major Andre. Anything else, my lords?

LOVE OF ORNAMENT.—The love of ornament creeps slowly but surely into the female heart. A girl who twines the lily in her tresses, and looks at herself in the clear stream, will soon wish that the lily were fadeless, and the stream a mirror. We say, let the young girl seek to adorn her beauty, if she be taught also to adorn her mind and heart, that she may have wisdom to direct her love of ornament in due moderation.

DARK LANTERNS.—Bulls-eye dark lanterns are recommended for the New York police. They are excellent anti-burglaries preventives. Some improvements in the force is wanted; crime is rampant.

THE VALLEY OF THE DANUBE.

THE series of engravings now presented to the reader, illustrate the scenery and costumes of a portion of the valley of the Danube, which has been justly styled, the "father of European rivers." It is called in German, the Donau, or deep river, and was styled by the Romans, Danubius, from its sources to Vienna, and, lower down, Ister. It has three sources, the Bregg, Bregach, and a little fountain in the yard of Prince Donaueschingen, in Baden, 2050 feet above the level of the sea, near which the united waters receive the name of Danube. After its junction with the Iller, above Ulm, it becomes navigable, being from eight to twelve feet deep, runs through the kingdom of Bavaria, then from Engelhartzell to Orsova, a distance of six hundred and forty-four miles, through Austria, through Turkey, and finally falls into the Black Sea, after a course of 1547 miles, and after having received thirty navigable rivers and ninety other streams. A voyage down the Danube is one of the most interesting journeys that can be taken in Europe. Dr. James O. Noyes, in his charming book, "Roumania," gives us many interesting glimpses of the Danube and the points of interest on its shores. He saw it under the aspect of the war between Turkey and Russia, which commenced on the Danube.

"It was a beautiful August evening," says Noyes, "when we embarked on the steamer at Semlin for Orsova, about ninety miles below. After the confluence of the Save the Danube expands to a great width, embosoming a number of woody islands. My eyes clung to Belgrade, that old city of combats and sieges, until in the hazy distance her minarets and ramparts sank beneath the placid surface of the river. There were views on the Servian bank worthy of picturesque Arva in Northern Hungary. We remained over night at a German settlement on the Austrian side. Whole districts in Lower Hungary and Transylvania have been settled by emigrants from the German States, welcomed thither by the Magyars, and permitted to retain their language and institutions, a circumstance which has been adroitly turned to account by the house of Hapsburg. Generosity has ever been the fault of the Hungarians, and their history a perpetual martyrdom! Below Semlin, on the Hungarian side of the river, I noticed at short intervals the stations of the border guard, sentinelled at all times and at night indicated by gleaming fires. This military guard, extending along the whole Turkish frontier of Hungary, is capable of furnishing, in case of emergency, two hundred thousand men. The territory is under military rule. Every male is destined to be a soldier, and the land is cultivated by families of many persons, under the direction of a patriarch. Groups of passengers, exhibiting a remarkable diversity of costumes and languages, assembled on deck to enjoy the beautiful evening. I made the acquaintance of a gay young Wallachian, named Ariatas, just returning from his medical studies in Paris, a French officer on his way to the East, and Reschid Effendi, secretary of Sami Pacha, from Widdin. A Hungarian poet says that this unfortunate country contains people of every European race; and in the great hall of the University of Vienna, I have often counted the representatives of twenty-five different nations. As we steamed down the Danube the following morning, the scenery became beautiful, then surpassingly grand. The well-wooded hills on either side, the forerunners of the Balkans and Carpathians, rose into rugged mountains, between which the narrowed Danube rushed and surged into the great Wallachian plain, far away toward the Euxine. Below the island of Moldova, a huge black rock projects from the bosom of the river, upon which a jealous Turk is said to have left his suspected bride, saying to her, 'Babakai! babakai!' (repent! repent!) a name which has been applied to the rock itself. Near by, is the cavern of Golumbatz where St. George is believed to have slain the dragon from whose body, still decaying, proceed swarms of noxious flies. High on the rocks above are the picturesque ruins of Golumbatz, whose crumbling towers seem just ready to fall into the abyss below. And now the steamer rushes into the most magnificent gorge in Europe, if not in the world. Here, as if in anger, the grizzly mountains seem to shake their hoary heads at each other across the foaming torrent, and there, smile at each other in embosomed lakes, from which can be seen no point of ingress or egress. In one place the eye is greeted with soft vistas and idyllic retreats, in another it looks upon the semblance of battlements and cathedral towers. How grandly the echoes die away among these glorious mountains! Now we dart down the narrow foam-crested rapids, and then float away calmly between retreating heights. This kind of scenery continues for a distance of seventy miles. Near the lofty peak of Sterbetz, fronting the Danube with a wall of rock three thousand five hundred feet high, is the Cave of Veterani, celebrated in the wars of the Christians and Turks. On the Austrian side of the river is the new road, built at a great expense by the Austrians; and on the opposite side, I noticed in many places the remains of Trajan's Way. A tablet hewn into the solid rock bears a Latin inscription commemorative of this stupendous work. Rude fishermen now build their fires on the spot. At Orsova we took a small barge to pass the Iron Gate, the most dangerous rapids in the Lower Danube, the river falling thirteen feet in three quarters of a mile. Just below the Austrian frontier was pointed out to me the place where Kossuth concealed the Hungarian crown in 1849. Towards sunset we reached Turnul Severin, on the left bank of the river, nearly opposite the Servian village of Fetti-Islam. There we found the Austrian steamer which was to convey us down to Rustchuk. Some of my company strolled up to the village, consisting of a few wretched Wallachian huts perched upon the neighboring hill. Alone, I wandered down the river bank to the ruins of Trajan's Bridge. A few minutes' walk brought me to the ruins. Here the conqueror of Dacia executed one of those gigantic projects with which all similar efforts of modern enterprise in this part of the world can scarcely be compared. The lowest stone bridge over the Danube is at Ratisbon, where the river is but a few yards in width, but Trajan spanned the noble stream at Turnul Severia, nearly a thousand miles nearer its mouth, with the longest structure of the kind ever erected, it being, according to the measurement of Marsigli, almost three thousand feet from shore to shore. Trajan's Bridge was built during the emperor's second campaign to the Lower Danube, when, after many reverses to the legions and a recent revolt of the Dacians, he resolved effectually to subdue those stubborn enemies of Rome. Apollodorus, of Damascus, was the architect. Dion Cassius has left a description of this remarkable structure, parts of

ler. In 1844, a number of arms and rare utensils were found in the vicinity, which shed no little light upon the camp life of the Romans. Trajan's Bridge, like Trajan's Way, was constructed for military purposes, and stood only so long as the Romans maintained their sway on the left shore of the Danube. Hadrian, the successor of Trajan, destroyed the splendid monument of his predecessor but a few years after it had been built. Near at hand were the scattered ruins of the citadel of Theodorus, erected by Justinian, and of great importance in the wars of the Rowhich have withstood the floods and ice of seventeen centuries. Twenty piers sixty feet wide, one hundred and fifty feet high, and nearly one hundred feet apart, sustained the enormous weight. Some authors maintain that the upper portions of the bridge were of wood. The current, at this point, is slow and regular. The level spaces at both ends of the bridge were well adapted to the marshalling of the legions. The massive towers erected there, served to protect it from the attacks of the barbarians. A few of the truncated piers and abutments of solid masonry are still to be traced by the curious travellers. But more imposing are the ruins of the crumbling tower of Severinus, half a mile from the site of Trajan's Bridge. This structure, famous in earlier times, was built by Severinus, governor of Mœsia, about 240 A. D. All that remains, after the ravages of time and the barbarians, is a lofty and tottering portion of the ancient wall, situated on an artificial elevation and partly surrounded by a fosse whose two extremities unite with the Danube. The moat is grown up with small trees and underbrush, and the tower itself partially concealed from sight by the thick foliage. At its base is a large marble sarcophagus. I clambered up the ruin as far as possible, just as the sun was flinging his last golden glances over the grizzly crests of the Carpathians. How full of glory was his departure, fringing with sapphire edges the dark clouds that floated so tranquilly in the western sky, and bathing the mountain tops in seas of moist, mellow light! The twinkling stars found me seated on the tower of Severinus, reflecting upon the magnitude of that ancient power the sites of whose camps and cities I have traced along the Rhine and the Rhone, the Nile and the Jordan. Rome imparted somewhat of her own course, formed by the two torrents of the Breg and Briegach, united at the springs of Donaueschingen, is engulfed beyond Tuttlingen, between the rocks of Beuron and Werenwaag. Beuron is the spot which principally attracts the stranger. Thanks to the establishment of the little dairy founded there in 1837, and which has continued to prosper, this picturesque country, previously so little known and visited, has become the resort of a throng of persons of every condition, who, on returning to their families, before the enchantment of nature's beauties, as imposing as they are wild, are worn away, excite greatness to the most distant provinces conquered by her arms. Surely it was a glorious thing to build up, in those barbaric ages, an empire whose laws and systems still survive for the government of mankind, and whose public works, stupendous in their ruins, serve, in our feeble efforts, as models of strength and beauty! Honor enough was it even for the conquered nations, to share the glory of the Roman name."

We now proceed to speak of the localities illustrated in our engravings, to which the reader is requested to refer. One of the finest and most interesting valleys of Swabia is, doubtless, that watered by the Danube at its source, whose the enthusiasm of their friends and countrymen by their descriptions, and induce them to take their turn in breathing the pure air of this valley. At Mulheim, a little town of Wurtemberg, the valley begins to assume that austere aspect which renders it so remarkable. Thenceforth it is nothing but a chain of calcareous rocks, that rise everywhere like vast obelisks or immense pyramids from the bosom of dark woods, sometimes descending to the banks of the river, whose windings are lost in the midst of the richest verdure. Mulheim, with its castle inhabited by the baronial family of Enzberg, is especially picturesque when seen from the heights which crown the Kallenberg road. Thence the eye embraces at once the blackened mass of its buildings, the towers of the castle, the Danube, whose banks are united by a bridge, and all round, like a vast panorama, the extent of the valley, closed in the distance by an amphitheatre of hills of the most graceful form, their sides checkered by the shadows of the passing clouds. Still the road is only for the artist who explores these mountains on foot, and, before reaching Beuron, rests at the ruins of Kallenberg and Brunnen. Carriages must take the road to Friendingen, formerly a part of the county of Hohenberg, and beyond which you ascend the plateau which separates the two valleys of the Danube and the Beer, in the depth of which the eye delights to plunge. The slope which leads to Beuron, laid out a few years ago by order of the Prince Sigmaringer, whose tory, was restored in 940 by Abbot Hatto, of Wildenstein. Still, says the legend, a descendant of Gerold, Count Peregrine, having pursued a stag in the forest which then covered the whole valley, was surprised to see it halt and defy all his arrows, and all of a sudden, beholding a celestial light illuminate the wood, he recognized in this vision a warning from Heaven, and, having taken counsel of the monks, whom he consulted respecting this adventure, he built on the very spot where the stag had halted a new monastery, which was consecrated in 1077, on the day of the assumption of the virgin, in the church of which Peregrine himself was buried, on the 8th of August, 1092. The abbey, richly endowed, was afterwards directed by a succession of prelates, all sprung from the first families of the country, and who all enriched it with their estates commence here, presents a gentle and commodious descent through the forest. Before you reach the lower side, which extends a league in length, you perceive the buildings of the ancient abbey church, seated, with the houses which surround it, on a little hill on the shore of the Danube in the centre of a basin, bounded on all sides by walls of rock, and sternly commanded at the extremity by the fortifications of Wildenstein. Beuron, if we can credit the old chroniclers, was founded in 777, by Duke Gerold, of Swabia, Count of Boussen, a branch of the princely family of Hohenzollern. He erected this abbey, not on the spot where we now see it, but on a pile of rocks beyond the valley which still bears the name of Alt-Buren, and where excavations yet show the traces of buildings. The convent, destroyed in 907 by the Hungarians, in the course of their invasion of the imperial terri-gifts. The abbots wore the cross and mitre, and even extended their jurisdiction over many surrounding places, and obtained from the emperors divers privileges that increased their power. For four centuries, the fortunes of Beuron were on the increase, till the reverses which marked the close of the 15th century, when the ravages of the plague, the jealous cupidity of an impoverished nobility, and the exactions of the sovereign caused so many evils to the community. Now all is lifeless beneath the roof of the temple and the arches of the cloister. The curate of the place, and a forester with his family, are the only inmates of the convent. The church is forsaken, and but a few benches of the nave are filled on Sundays by the parishioners of Beuron. The organ, whose tones accompanied the chant of the monks, has been sold; the library, once so rich, has been scattered; and there remains, in fact, nothing of all that made the splendor and glory of this abbey, which was one of the richest and most renowned for learning and piety in all Swabia. But nature is still as beautiful as ever—and it is she who woos the stranger to this valley. During the twelve years of the existence of the sanitary establishment formed beside the old buildings of the cloister, its reputation has been increasing, and it already realizes that of Gais and Weissbad, which, on the score of the aromatic herbs with which their Alps are covered, do not exceed Beuron, and which, in poetic position, yield, perhaps, to the latter. The walks which surround the establishment are very numerous, and all offer an interest more or less powerful, according to the tastes of those who visit them. Everywhere they present something worthy the attention of the botanist, the geol-epoch. These objects were transported to Sigmaringen, and placed, by order of the prince, in the cabinet of that city. The grotto which opens under the rocks of Wildenstein, on the shores of the Danube, is now the goal of a long walk, and should be explored with a torch, to enjoy the brilliant effect produced in this its innermost and darkest depths, by the walls of stalactites which they enclose. On the summit of the rocks which rise perpendicularly above it, rest, on an immense base separated from the platform of the mountains, the colossal walls of Waldenstein. Of all the strong castles of the middle ages, this is one of the most interesting, because its preservation is perfect. A pillar of masonry, of rare boldness, sustains the drawbridge, by which alone, when it is lowered, you can cross the immense space which separates the fort proper from the external ogist, the historian, and the man for whom mediæval legends have a charm. There are picturesque points of view, natural grottoes, ruins dating from the feudal times, and various scenes and subjects of emotion. Among the nearest grottoes, are three which richly repay a visit. Those of St. Peter and St. Paul, which are reached by a delicious path along the flank of the mountains in the midst of the dense forest, once served as abiding-places to the men of old time, and an asylum to the monks of Beuron. The first, whence a fine view of the cloister and its pretty environs is obtained, tradition signalized as the asylum which concealed the monks during the persecutions they were subjected to in the 17th century. In the second, less spacious, but more remarkable in a geological point of view, were found, a few years ago, a great number of bones and arms belonging to the Celtic works. Walls of twenty-four feet thickness, pierced by a low and narrow archway, admit you into the interior of the castle. Other arches, sometimes hollowed in the rocks, sometimes cemented by art, everywhere display to the curious eye the old arrangement for provisioning and defending the place. All these works are of more recent date than the first building of the castle itself, and date, doubtless, from the times when, as in the Thirty Years' War, the valley of the Danube served as a communication between the military operations of Switzerland and Swabia. Seated on these battlements, we recall an instance of the audacity of the period, the interest of which is enhanced by a view of the scene itself. During the occupation of Hohentwiel by the Swedes, a subaltern officer, who was scouring the country with a small detachment, obtained possession of this fortress for several days. Schwartz (that was the name the country people gave him) had learned that the Furstemberg officers and the Bavarian troops that composed the garrison, had repaired to Moeskirch, and that only women and children remained within the walls of Wildenstein. The drawbridge was raised. But, having reached, by the aid of a light ladder, the cross-timbers, he clung there with such tenacity, that he soon tilted the bridge, and found himself at the entrance of the fortress. His appearance so terrified the women, that they fled for safety, not one of them having presence of mind enough to close with all the honors of war and as much booty as they could carry. Yet Schwartz narrowly escaped a court-martial, so severe was the discipline of the Swedish troops at the time—1643. A subterranean passage formerly led from the castle to the valley, and you are yet shown in the rock an opening covered with brambles, where it must have issued. The entrance was in the chapel, under the steps of the altar; you can still descend about fifty steps, but the rest of the way is choked up with stones.

the gate. Only three men had followed. Either from a disinclination to share the rich booty he found, or afraid at being surprised by the return of the enemy, he shut himself up in the castle without summoning the rest of his comrades whom he had left in the woods. The Bavarians soon returned, in fact, and found themselves compelled to call on the neighboring garrisons for assistance to render themselves master of the place again. The Swedish subaltern found it impossible to hold out any longer, so he submitted the terms of a capitulation, by which he and his comrades were allowed to march out from Beuron; one under the walls of Wildenstein and in the forest, which follows the windings of the river on the right bank; the other, crossing the covered bridge behind the convent, and winding at the foot of the mountains, beneath the overhanging rocks, and traversing the tunnel of one of them, which touches the river, forms the principal communication into the valley. Here, avalanches of stones, there, calcareous pyramids, the height of which the eye can hardly measure, and, on the mountain side, groves of beech, birch, larch and pine, vary, at each turn of the road, the perspective of the landscape, the rich verdure of the meadows, and the lucidity of the water completing the scene of enchantment. But as you approach Werenwaag, the valley enlarges, and the rocks, shaded with ancient ash trees, recede from the Danube, and lift their heads far above the forest.

Werenwaag is the most picturesque part of the whole valley, and nowhere else do you enjoy valley to the Danube, whence, ascending the opposite slope, its traces have not entirely disappeared, led to the plateau of Heuberg.

Beyond Beuron, and ascending the Danube, two more old castles are objects of interest. The farthest, Kallenberg, is wholly in ruins, and worth visiting only on account of the wild scenery around it. It formerly belonged to the so brilliant a general view. Rome doubtless raised upon this spot a fort of observation which, being dismantled after the departure of her legions, was afterwards made use of by the German nobility who rebuilt it. It is at least certain that a Roman road which, from Leptingen, passed by Wondorf, Buckheim, Leibdingen, and Krohenheimstetten, descended by a lateral barons of Ulm, and was held by persons who bore its name. Brunnen, a little castle which belongs to the barons of Enzberg, presents a picturesque aspect from whatever point it is viewed. From the Friedingen road, it rises majestically before you on the immensity of the rock which sustains it, and as a whole, forms one of those delightful pictures which please the artist.

COSTUMES AND MANNERS OF THE SWEDES.

The sketches in the present article refer principally to Sweden, and represent the striking and well-defined national costumes of the people.

Sweden, at the present day, is perhaps the only part of Europe—we might say of the world—where manners, usages and customs have not been modified or overturned by innovations. The deserts of this country, with their mines of gold, have become cosmopolitan. India, China and Japan are changing beneath the conquest of those eager merchants, whom nothing terrifies or daunts. In the islands of Oceania, they talk costumes from one end of the world to the other, we shall understand at what point all originality is effaced, and how far all modern societies are depoeitized beneath this pitiless uniformity. Russia herself is forced, on account of her great political influence, to share in this general movement, or, to speak more correctly, this unbridled movement. To this day, however, the vast Scandinavian peninsula has remained outside of this agitation, calm as the great forest of firs—calm as the grave but loyal and noble characters of the Swedes themselves. But because these

French, and in Hayti, they copy the Gazette of Fashion to please the Emperor Soulouque, that curious type, which seems created expressly to ridicule modern civilization. The East, with its reforms, is daily losing its aspect of grandeur. Germany, Italy, France and Spain, by their continual revolutions, are changing their appearance, as well as character; and if we add the effect constantly produced by those great levellers, railroads and mechanics, which cut down mountains, fill up valleys, and transport the same ideas, the same manufactures, and similar usages and people have not been subjected to the ardor of speculation, we must not conclude thence that they are less cultivated, and more retrograde than other nations. The Swedish peasant is, without dispute, better informed than the greater part of the peasants of France; and there is not a corner of Sweden, however near the pole, where the poorest inhabitant does not know how to read, write and keep accounts. They are compelled to do this, by the law which refuses marriage to whosoever would not fulfil the first duties of the father of a family, who is responsible for the education of his children. Their aptitudes are not limited to this information—a skilful farmer, an excellent horse-breeder, an adroit hunter and fisherman, in the midst of forests and lakes, which abound with game and prey, the Swede employs himself during the long winter nights in making household implements, furniture and cloth. In a word, all that is necessary, not only for the wants of life, but for its comforts, is done at home, in the interior of the house. Men, women and children are employed spinning, weaving and building, and these habits give them really remarkable skill. We trust that the good and noble Swedes will never rich. The rivers themselves are so impregnated with these ferruginous soils, that they seem reddened with blood; and this is not one of the least curiosities of the country. In presenting to the readers of the Magazine, these engravings of the costumes of the Swedish people, we naturally commence with that province which has preserved, in its greatest purity, its original type. Dalecarlia, in fact, occupies the front rank in the history of Sweden. Whenever Swedish liberty has been violated, that province has furnished its defenders; the Engelbrekts, the Stures, and the Vasas have there found their support, and a safe asylum during the storm. The inhabitants of be tempted to exchange their honesty, morality, patriarchal virtues, and the mild peacefulness of their existence for that thirst of wealth which only produces greed and discontent. Natural wealth is certainly not wanting to their soil, which may be termed a land of iron, or, as it is called in Swedish, järnbarland, in such abundance is the metal found, sometimes on the surface, as in the province of Scania; sometimes in blocks, as in the vast quarry of Vanemora. In a word, there is an immense chain of iron which extends from the Sound to the heart of Lapland. These mines, as well as the copper mines at Fahlun, in Dalecarlia, the silver mines of Kongsberg, and many others, are incalculably the parish of Rattvick are renowned above all others, for their strength, beauty, and purity of blood. They have a costume remarkable for brilliancy of color, and the richness of its gold and silver embroidery. The women of Leksand, one of the most considerable parishes of Dalecarlia, have a black boddiece, lined with scarlet, over a chemise white as snow, the straight, broad sleeves of which, after the fashion of the chemises of the East, are often, as well as the collar and front, embroidered with red silk. Here, the mourning color is yellow; in Scania, it is sky blue. The young girl represented in one of our engravings, is collecting her flock, by blowing a sort of Rans des Vaches on her horn, the melody of which is very charming; for the Swedes are gifted with excellent musical taste. We now come to the costumes of Orsa. This country is renowned for its grindstone quarries. The leather belt is the distinguishing mark of the costume of this country. The rural life of Sweden is sometimes perilous, for the chalets, which in Sweden, as in Switzerland, are very far from the great centres of population, instead of being placed upon the mountains, are found in the midst of forests, on the borders of lakes or torrents. The flocks are driven thither towards the end of May, and they remain till the end of September. We must go there, if we would study pastoral life in Sweden, and admire the celebrated also for its magicians, or, to speak more correctly, its illuminati. Let us now leave Dalecarlia, for the province of Smaland. The parish of Warend, which occupies the centre, is the most mountainous, and the richest in picturesque sites. The monuments found, and the traditions preserved there, bear the stamp of great antiquity. The costumes of the women are remarkable for their richness. The silk scarf, embroidered with gold, the ends hanging over the hip, is covered by a baldric of silver, which spans the waist. This war girdle is a prerogative, which tradition assigns to the days of paganism. The Danes having invaded the province during the absence of King Atle, who courage of the young girls, who, armed only with an axe, bravely encounter the bears, which sometimes attack the fleecy charges committed to their care. In the midst of these solitudes, on the borders of these fine lakes, the imagination is imbued with that poetic tinge, which characterizes, in so remarkable a manner, the inhabitants of the Swedish forests. From these chalets have issued the marvellous traditions, the Sagas of ancient days, and those charming melodies, which faithfully render the grand, virgin and mysterious scenery which inspires them. In the parish of Elfdalen—the River Valley—the inhabitants possess a remarkable skill in carving wood and porphyry. The country of Elfdal is had set out with all the men to fight the enemy, a young girl, named Blenda, conceived a bold project for decoying them into a snare. Aided by all the women, she prepared a great feast on the borders of a lake, and then sent messengers to meet the Danes, to congratulate them, and to say, that being abandoned by their husbands, they offered themselves as brides to the invaders. Finding the whole valley of Bravalla covered with provisions and liquors, the famished soldiers eagerly seized upon what was set before them; then, soon yielding to intoxication and fatigue, they fell asleep without suspicion of danger. Then, Blenda gave the signal to her companions, and they slew all their enemies without mercy, and cast them into the lake. It was in recompense for this high deed, that the women of Warend were allowed the privilege of inheriting an equal share with the men, of having military music at their weddings, and of wearing the war girdle. They still enjoy the same privileges. The country of Wingaker is situated at the western extremity of Ludermania. The inhabitants were formerly celebrated as pirates. Their dress is of white cloth lined with scarlet. The peasants of Upland have nothing particular in their dress.

We have hitherto spoken of the rural districts of Sweden. The cities are also interesting, and rocks, its islands, its bounding torrents, its sheets of limpid water, its fragrant bowers, its castle, palaces, churches and rocky streets, its sounding squares, its beautiful bay with its thousand masts, you have it all beneath your eyes—look! If your sight is wearied with so much splendor, you have only to turn your head, and there is a splendid reflector, placed on a pivot, which brings the entire panorama before you. Mosebacke is not only a stage for optical phenomena, it is the scene of joyous gatherings. The people flock thither from all parts of the city, eager for spectacles, dances, festivals and games. Mosebacke provides everything. Here is a carrousel, GRINDSTONE MERCHANTS OF ORSA.

Stockholm in particular, is one of the most delightful places in the world. The stranger cannot fail to be dazzled and delighted by it, and the life he leads there, when he ceases to be a stranger, is one of enchantment. It is no matter whether you frequent aristocratic saloons, citizens' circles or popular gatherings—there is no stalk without a flower, and no flower without a perfume. Stockholm is at once a city of nature, and a city of art. Would you see the vastest and most picturesque horizon that ever delighted the eye? Climb the hill of Mosebacke which commands the city on the south. Seen from that point, Stockholm has no mysteries. Its there, a ball-room, further on tennis and billiards. Does music delight you? Mosebacke furnishes an orchestra—two orchestras. Do you prefer silence and solitude? Mosebacke opens to you fresh bowers and mysterious gardens. There is not a wish that cannot be satisfied in this famous place.

No midsummer traveller fails to visit this hill to inhale the pure air. During the week it is visited only by a few idlers, or by strangers anxious to avail themselves of its fine points of view. The day of days is Sunday, when it is in its glory. Our readers are well aware that in all the countries of Europe the Sabbath is not kept in that reverential manner, which we are taught to believe essential, but is observed as a sort of holiday. The society gathered on Mosebacke is of a mixed character, with the plebeian element largely predominating, but for that reason it affords a fine field for the study of character. High life people are the same all the world over—most insipid and uniform creatures—it is among the working people that we must seek for vigorous nationality and individuality. The amusements of Mosebacke are cheap, and the honest mechanic of Stockholm can enjoy himself there for hours without lightening his purse. How animated the dances are on the green turf, in the shadow of old trees, or the open area lighted up with variegated lamps.

The Swedes are very fond of dancing, and are often hurried away by their Terpsichorean enthusiasm into feats of agility like those which characterize the Mabilles balls at Paris. During the intervals of the dances, beer and cold punch circulate, for the northern people make a pretty free use of stimulants. Then the trumpet sounds. This is a signal for the theatre, and the crowd rushes to a vast tent which serves as an auditorium, the stage opening on the extremity. Here they play operas, dramas and comedies. The players are persons who have not attained fortune on the stage of the capital, and who shed the last light of their genius here. The performances are really very respectable and never fail to give satisfaction to the audience. Under certain circumstances this popular resort displays unwonted splendor. On the birthday of a prince or princess royal, for instance, the whole mountain is a-breeze; the gardens and groves flame with Bengal lights, the orchestras are trebled, and first-rate actors take the places of the ordinary performers. A traveller in Sweden who visited the mountain on the princess's birthday, writes: "The name of the princess Louisa was on every lip, and by the multiplied toasts it called forth, her popularity in the kingdom may be estimated. The spectacle concluded on that day with a tableau vivant. The rising of the curtain displayed a full length portrait of the princess royal, richly framed. It was flanked, on the right and left, by two young girls, clad as geni, and holding in their hands a banner staff from which floated the national colors. The picture represented the princess floating in the midst of flowers and winged angels, as in a full apotheosis. Now let us descend to the plain. Here is Norra Tivoli, a name which reveals its purpose—I will add that it fulfils it admirably. There is Humlegården, a vast park containing a theatre with an excellent company, a ball-room and concerts, and grass-plats worthy of Versailles. Humlegården, situated within the enclosure of the city, is largely frequented; on Sundays and during fine weather, especially, it is thronged. Here they have eating, drinking, dancing, fireworks and balloon ascensions. I witnessed one of these ascensions which was commenced by an original peculiarity. The aeronaut's companion was neither a human being nor a horse, but a genuine Lapland reindeer. Poor animal, accustomed to the dull retreats of polar solitudes, he saw himself launched, in the presence of a noisy multitude, through the vast fields of azure! How he struggled when he was tied into the basket suspended beneath the aerostat! They were afraid he would rend the balloon by a strike of his wild horns. But, finally, the gas-swollen monster took wing; the reindeer shook convulsively; his haggard eyes were bent towards the earth as if he would fasten them there; but the balloon mounting, mounting upward, and was on the verge of the clouds, while the Lapland courser had not recovered from his stupefaction. A prophetic fear for some weeks after this ascension, the reindeer and the aeronaut perished together, near Elsinore, engulfed in the waters of the Sund."

There are many other pleasure-haunts in the vicinity of Stockholm, for picturesque sites are abundant, and perhaps there is not one unworthy of a pilgrimage. Djurgården, particularly, is an unrivalled casket, in which art and nature have gathered their most precious diamonds. It is at once a wood, a park, a garden, a promenade, a military parade-ground and a race-course—a collection of rustic villas and sumptuous edifices, naked rocks and green bowers, murmuring rivulets and sleeping lakes; calm trees and stormy chasms, hills and plains, narrow and broad paths and mysterious labyrinths. Djurgården presents all contrasts and caters for all tastes. There you find three or four theatres, exquisite restaurants and countless lemonade and confectionary establishments. A Tivoli has been established there some years with all the appliances for pleasure and enjoyment which distinguishes these places of enchantment. Hence, during the summer season, Djurgården is the favorite rendezvous of the whole city, especially of that part of society which seeks refined enjoyments and knows how to appreciate them.

Djurgården lies not far to the east of Stockholm, and is reached by land and water. The land route is constantly crowded with brilliant equipages, hacks, droshkys and omnibuses of every shape. One of these called the Napoleon, is distinguished by the beauty of its ornaments, and the comfort of its seats; it is of spherical form and looks like a balloon on wheels. The fare in the omnibus from Stockholm to Djurgården, is twelve skillings, about nine cents, to which must be added two skillings paid on entering the park. The route by water is still more animated. From the quay or Navy Island (Sheppsbron Skeppsholm), little steamboats, with their paddles painted green, and often decorated with leaves and flowers, start continually, freighted with joyous companions. The trip lasts but ten minutes and costs two skillings. The boat-service was formerly a monopoly, managed despotically by a company of women called, Matrons of the Oar, Roddar Madamerna. These matrons were generally of a sour temper; they rowed or did not row, accordingly as it suited their convenience, so that passengers reached their destination only after a long trial of patience which sometimes degenerated into violent scenes of anger. Now this monopoly is only a remembered grievance; the odious matrons have given way to charming Dalecarlian girls. Interesting creatures! Most of them engaged, they come here to earn money for an outfit, while their lovers are similarly occupied in other provinces. On the coming winter, they will return to their country when the rosy chains of marriage will confine them thenceforth to the domestic hearth. The Dalecarlian oarswomen are generally fresh and healthy-looking; rarely very pretty, but honest and well behaved. Robust and untiring, they faithfully perform their task. They do not compel the passenger to linger under the burning sun upon the water. Nothing can be more picturesque than their costume. They wear a short brown or green petticoat, a red vest, over which is folded the edge of a white chemise, scarlet stockings and thick-sole shoes. The last article conflicts with the rest of the costume. The women of the north show great taste in dressing their heads and persons, but very little in the article of shoe-leather.

but the charges are also higher. The dishes of Blaporten, the Casino, and Pierre's establishment are all famous, but Pierre bears away the palm. He is a Provencal who has long been established in the country much to the satisfaction of resident and visiting epicures. A speciality of these Djurgarden restaurants, as well as of all the hotels and cafes of Stockholm, is the personnel of the service. There are very few male waiters, but mostly pretty girls from Bleking, a province where the blood is rose-hued, and the complexion fair and ethereal. They wait on table with unequalled grace and dexterity. Ordinarily they retain their national costumes which are very piquante. The charm of this dress consists

SHEPHERDESS OF KETTERING.

Nothing is more agreeable than to go to Djurgarden under the charge of these Dalecarlian rowers. If you are alone with them, they will engage in conversation, and tell you the story of their lives—often a melancholy one. If, on the contrary, the company is numerous, they will charm it by singing their native melodies. When you land, you regret that the voyage has been so brief. Many a traveller has refused to land, but given orders to be rowed back to Stockholm, that he might not lose the thread of a Dalecarlian story or the conclusion of a Dalecarlian song.

We alluded to the Djurgarden restaurants—the table is excellent, better than the city tables, in a microscopic cap of velvet or lace, perched jauntily on the top of the head, which gives a rather saucy, but not immodest air. When they relinquish the business of waiters for domestic life, they exchange the cap for a red or blue handkerchief tied under the chin. If they rise in life they assume the bonnet. But cap, kerchief or bonnet, the young girl of Stockholm, or, to give her her specific name, the piga (from pigg, lively, alert,) wears them with the same elegance. Whether she remains faithful to the restaurant, her natural sphere, or follows the less brilliant career of public life, she generally attains the same goal—marriage. In the first case, she weds some honest fellow, a servant or a farmer, who has been her faithful beau. In the second case, she will perhaps go to Finland to St. Peter burg, marrying in the latter city some subordinate official, dazzled by her charms or her account of her savings. Ranking a little higher than the piga are the needlewomen or milliner, and higher yet, the daughters of citizens, who receive a good education, and are quite dashing characters. If we leave the inferior rounds of the social ladder, and rise to the highest, by the golden steps which conduct to the summit, we find ourselves in a serene and pure atmosphere. The woman of the North appears in all her traditional splendor, chaste, severe, Valhalla, and placed them on the prophetic tripod. What the legislation of barbarous times deprived them of, the moderns have restored, or moved by the spontaneity of their love, and the gentle influence of their manners. Thus, each step in the progress of the Swedes has been marked by new tributes paid to the worship of woman. They have hatred only because they have raised their social position to the same height as that of the men.

On her part, the Swedish woman has striven to make herself more and more worthy of this deference. A devoted mother, a submissive daughter, a lovely and faithful wife, she is the devoted to her family, beloved and respected by all. What an enchanting type! Much has been said and written in praise of the beautiful Swedes—they deserve it all. In their beauty we find a brilliancy which dazzles, and a candor which touches us. Luminous blonde types, eyes blue and limpid as lakes, cheeks seeming to reflect the rosy purple of the aurora borealis, a velvet and transparent skin, a charming figure; such is the picture. They lead gentle and calm lives—they are intelligent and pure, and fascinate all who approach them. In all time the Swedes have treated their women with honor. In the age of Odin they gave them a throne in their ornament of the domestic circle as well as the delight of the world of fashion. Enter a drawing-room at Stockholm, and you will be impressed with a feeling of admiration, there is something so pure and magnetic in all of the women who surround you. It is true that you see Paris furniture, Paris fashions and Paris usages—but what of that? The national type rises above all these borrowed decorations, and even a hurried glance will show that you have no counterfeit before you. The more the Swedish woman approaches her original type, the more beautiful and respectable she is, like those mountain rivulets whose crystal glitters with a greater brilliance as you ascend to their source. It is that which gives so much value to the efforts of King Oscar to attach Sweden to its nationality; by acting thus, he has not only elevated the honor of his race, he has exalted its beauty.

The Swedes feel; their sympathies are never more ardently manifested than when their local pride is touched. See them at the ball or theatre,—what are the dances in which they mingle the most gaily, the plays they most warmly applaud? They are their traditional dances—their national dramas. Does not Jenny Lind, the northern nightingale, owe her dearest triumph to the has nothing terrible, it is a pastoral crook adorned with flowers. They are delighted with sewing and fancy needle-work, instructive reading and quiet conversation. There is nothing so charming as an hour passed in the intimacy of a Swedish home. We learn there to appreciate that domestic life described so interestingly by Frederika Bremer in her celebrated novels.

Meanwhile, the men attend diligently to business, for in Sweden everybody is busy; the burghers at the exchange or in their counting-rooms, the nobles at the court or in the offices. At Stockholm, evening commences at three or national melodies of Scandinavia? Social life at Stockholm is very varied. Balls are numerous, and dinner-parties frequent. They play comedies and charades. There is no luxury, but an elegant simplicity. The ladies adopt Parisian fashions, but instead of copying them with servility, or exaggerating them to ridicule, as is sometimes done at St. Petersburg, they tastefully modify what is too outré or too exotic, to adapt them to their more simple manners. Outside of their drawing-rooms, the Swedish ladies devote themselves to domestic cares with activity and vigilance. Their household is a little empire, which they rule without control, but their sceptre four o'clock. It is a time of animation and gaiety, for everybody devotes the evening to relaxation. Of all the cities of Sweden, perhaps of Europe, not even excepting Paris, Stockholm is the most devoted to pleasure. If they earn money it is for the sake of spending it. Thus great fortunes are rare; they are in too great a hurry for enjoyment to hoard it up. Hence, that charming sociability which distinguishes the Swedes, and renders a residence in that country so agreeable to strangers. These rapid sketches of the Swedes may instruct as well as amuse our readers, to most of whom the peculiarities of the people are probably unknown.

THE LONG AGO.

BY EDWARD S. ELLIS.

When the fevered brow is burning,
When life's tide doth ebb and flow,
Who hath not, while wearied turning,
Conjured up the long ago.

At the sight of some loved token,
How will brighten memory's ray;
Thoughts of vows forgotten, broken,
Thoughts of faces passed away.

There's a look which time has faded,
Resting still within that book;
Resting there as she it bridled,
When she gave affection's look.

Now we see upon that finger,
Love's fond pledge which she placed there;
Now those songs she sang still linger,
Like a spirit from afar.

Now the winds go softly sighing,
O'er her shadowed, silent tomb;
Once our hopes there too were lying,
Once we too were wrapt in gloom.

Flowers have withered that we planted,
Grass and weeds now fill their place;
Grief hath lost the dirge it chanted,
In life's fiery, hateful race.

Brightly still those skies beam o'er us,
Other sounds and scenes we know;
Other forms are now before us,
Than were in the long ago.

THE HAUNTED LIGHTHOUSE.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

CHAPTER I.

HOW I GOT TO THE LIGHTHOUSE.

"It's now four and forty years ago come Christmas, and that's to-morrow, that it happened, young man," said old Captain Polwhele. "Four and forty years," he added, half mournfully, as he shook the ashes from his short pipe, and looked at the burning embers, as if he was contemplating within their glowing depths a red-hot retrospective calendar, "and it seems but yesterday; but I must go up and trim the lights, and rub the reflectors a bit, and then I'll tell you all about it."

"I shall be very glad to hear it," I said, as the old man left the little chamber where we were sitting—a quaint sort of a place, half bed-room, and the rest cabin and parlor combined—redolent of a strong smell of lamp and tar, that whiffed in when the door through which he had gone, opened.

I said it was a quaint place, such a one as I had never been in before, nor indeed heard of; and this was the way in which I became acquainted with it and its lonely inhabitant:

On the southern coast of Wales there are several splendid bays, great sheets of water, curving inland, with magnificent sweep, with jutting headlands forming their eastern and western boundaries. One of the most beautiful of these indentations of the coast is well known to Cambrian tourists as the bay of Swansea, whose sandy curve describes the segment of a circle seven miles in extent. Quitting the town of Swansea, one bright winter's afternoon, for the purpose of reaching a small fishing village, called Oystermouth, where existed the remains of an ancient castle that I intended to sketch, I travelled along the "ribbed sea sand" for some three or four miles, and then at the recommendation of another tourist, who by chance I fell in with, struck off into a northerly direction, and after crossing a few hills, descended to another and smaller bay, which for its surpassing beauty, and the picturesqueness of its caves, and fresh-water springs, was a favorite resort with those who visited that romantic region. It was not the easiest thing in the world to descend the precipitous cliff, and reach the sands below, but I at length did so, after many narrow escapes from falling headlong, and at length stood on the hard, white, sandy beach which was covered with shells and starfish. The little hollows here and there left full of water by the receded tide, were alive with actiniae, molluscs, and numberless sea anemonies, whose exquisite colors justly entitled them to the poetical designation of "flowers of the sea." At the period I am speaking of, Mr. Gosse had not written his work on the "Wonders of the Shore," nor had ladies learned the art now so fashionable, of rearing these ocean blossoms in drawing-rooms. An aquarium was then an unknown thing, or from the stores before me I might have stocked any number of those pretty scientific contrivances.

It is astonishing how insensible one becomes to the flight of time in such places. Absorbed in the contemplation of cliff and cavern, beach and ocean, I literally took "no note of time but from its loss;" and it was not until long shadows thrown by the tall cliffs which towered high overhead; streamed athwart the yellow sands, that I became aware that it was high time for me to make the best of my way toward some place of shelter for the night, for, pedestrian-like, trusting chance and circumstance, I had laid down no plan with respect to lodgings, knowing that in those localities, though inns were scarce, no cottage ever refused to entertain a traveller.—

So, disposing in sundry pockets the specimens I had picked up, and strapping my portfolio on my shoulders, I walked towards a point of rock round which I knew I must travel in order to reach Oystermouth; but on arriving at the spot, I found that the tide, which was now fast coming in, already forbade all progression in that direction. Nor was there any time to be lost, for at high water the entire space of the little bay itself would be submerged; it was, in fact, a bay only at ebb tide. What was to be done then? I concluded that at the other extremity of the land-locked space, egress would be alike impossible; so concluding that my only alternative was to return by the way I came, I put a bold face on the matter, and commenced climbing the almost perpendicular face of the cliff, determined, if possible, to gradually travel sideways in the direction of the fishing village.

If ever I worked hard, I did that evening, for, difficult as the descent had been, it was nothing compared with the labor, setting aside the risk, of climbing from one crag to another, in what at last became almost total darkness. It came on also to blow great guns, but fortunately, the hurricane was rather a help than a hindrance, for the gale blew directly from the sea into the little bay, and at times such was its force that it fairly pressed me against the rock, and held me there. I never had so satisfactory an illustration of atmospheric pressure before. The mischief of it was, though, that during the lulls of the blast, the sudden withdrawal of the pressure from without, more than once, by throwing me off my guard, nearly threw me off my balance also; but such was the terrible force of the gale, that I almost think, had I fallen, I should have been fastened against the face of the cliff once more before I had got far down.

I began to think I never should get to the top of the precipice, and was pondering the possibility of finding some large crevice in which I might secure shelter for the night, when looking upwards, I saw, or imagined I saw, the black, projecting point of cliff far overhead, relieved against what seemed a faint beam of dusky, reddish light, at intervals appearing and disappearing. I knew it could not be the moon, for it was in its last quarter, and besides no mortal moon ever yet shot forth such a red tinged ray. Clearly it was something extraordinary—the zodiacal light, and the aurora borealis were successfully suggested and rejected, for good scientific reason—and in order to solve the mystery, I renewed my climbing efforts.

I did not long remain in a state of uncertainty.

When I had reached within six feet of the summit, the strange ray having gradually increased in intensity, until at last it resembled the diverging pencil of rays from the lenses of a magic lantern; I was suddenly startled by what at first sight appeared a tall Cyclops, with one flaming eye, looming up through mist and darkness. For the space of a minute it glared steadily over the ocean, and then, as if satisfied with the survey, wheeled itself round, and looked unwinkingly landwards. "Hurra for the Cyclops!" I exclaimed, for well enough I knew it to be the beacon on Scargill head, with its revolving light. Tired and lacerated as I was from frequent slippings, and contact with sharp rocks, though no seaman, I bade its "lustre hail," and in a few minutes was loudly knocking at the door of the little cottage adjoining, in which the light-keeper resided. In such places, and at such times, apologies for intrusion are neither given nor required.

"It's a rough night; come along in, man," was the greeting I received, as soon as the door opened. So in I went, and speedily explained the circumstances which had drawn me there for shelter.

"Well, young man," observed my host, "you must have had a deal of the monkey in you to have scaled that cliff on such a night as this; it's hard enough to do it in day-time, leave alone when all is dark, and a gale blowing as 'tis now. But come, here's some prime Holland—it's the only liquor I've at hand, for the government people don't allow spirits to be used much in lighthouses; only ile, you see, 'cause one's apt to interfere with t'other—howsumever, your'e welcome to what there is, and after your climb you must want it."

He was a fine, venerable, but still hardy old fellow, and we speedily became acquainted. His name, he told me was Polwhele, and he had attained the birth of lighthouse-keeper in consequence of his long and faithful services in the navy. His dialect had that sing-song peculiar to the natives of the most western English county; and his name was also suggestive of the land of tin mines and pilchard-curing.

"Yes," he observed, in reply to a remark of mine, "it is a regular west-of-England name; for as the old rhyme says:

"By Tre, Pol and Pen
You may know the Cornishmen."

And then warmed with the Holland, he ran on to tell some marvellous Cornish stories of tame cougars, whipping of akes, and of that famous Cornish gentleman, who when condemned for treason, to be executed, was pardoned because from one end of Cornwall to the other, the stalwart miners and fishermen sang a song, whose bold chorus was :

"And must Trelawney die?
And must Trelawney die?
Then fifty thousand Cornishmen
Will know the reason why!"

The old captain at length relapsed into silence, and smoked his pipe perseveringly. Presently he uttered the words with which this story commences :

"It's now four and forty years ago come Christmas, and that's to-morrow, that it happened, young man."

"What happened?" I inquired.

"As that cliff you've just come up was climbed after dark," he replied. And he added, "It warn't exactly climbed then."

"I don't quite understand you," said I.

"Nor I don't quite understand it, either, young man; and to tell you the truth, I'm glad you dropped in here to-night—I generally take care to have company on Christmas eve, and should have had at this moment if the storm had not prevented—for this is a lonely place enough, to say nothing of its being sometimes haunted."

"Haunted! what, by a ghost, a real ghost?" I exclaimed.

How delightful, I thought to myself, to have fallen on such an adventure; and I forthwith urged Captain Polwhele, who now looked very grave, to tell the story, whatever it was.

"Well," he observed, "I aint nothing of a hand at spinning a yarn, and moreover, I'm obliged to turn in about this time, because you see I've got to be up in four hours from now, to trim the lights, and wipe the window-panes; but (taking a bundle of papers from an old chest) here's the whole account of it, which you can sit by the fire and read if you're curious on the matter. 'Twas written by the man who kept the light before me, and I found it among some rubbish after his death. His name was Jacob Varney, and a miserable old wretch he was, by all accounts. Some people said he was mad, and that this story was only fancy; but I've seen that as makes me think otherwise. When you've read the story you'll understand what I meant about some one coming up the cliff four and forty years ago."

I eagerly clutched the dingy old bundle of manuscript, and had settled down to peruse it, when I heard the old captain's returning footsteps. He entered the little room, and said, mysteriously :

"I forgot, sir, I'd better draw the curtain over this window. There, that will do. Good-night, sir."

All being again quiet, I opened the manuscript, and read the following strange story, which was evidently an autobiographical fragment, written at different periods, and blistered all over by what might have been tear-drops—Heaven knows a deluge of such were needful to wash away the crime which it recorded.

CHAPTER II.

JACOB VARNET'S ADVENTURES.

THUS ran the story : "It is not necessary that I, Jacob Varney—that's my name; it was not that of any relative of mine—should give any account of who my grandfathers and grandmothers were. Why I've changed my name from that which 'my godfathers and godmothers gave me in my baptism,' as the church catechism says, is my own business. If indeed such remarkable relatives I ever had, if I really was blessed with them, all I know is, that I never performed all the good things they 'promised and vowed' I should; more's the pity! I've had to bear my own sins on my own shoulders, and a heavy burden they have proved.

"Nor is it at all necessary to the right understanding of what will follow, that I should enter into any details respecting my early life. Enough to say that it was what is called a wild one; so wild that when about fourteen years of age, I was packed off to sea—a circumstance which did not at all tend to the improvement of either my mind or my morals. It was many years before I again saw my native land, and when I did return to the village in which I was born, there was not a single connection of old times to welcome me back. But for that I cared little, I had too long been accustomed to a roving life to enjoy domestic happiness, and so, when I had spent all my ready money, I walked to Bristol, and shipped on board a schooner bound for the African coast. Of course I left a weeping girl behind me, but of that hereafter.

"The captain of the vessel—his name was Feebin—was a devil incarnate. No sooner had we fairly got to sea, than he began to exhibit all the cruel tyranny of his disposition, and on the sixth day out, for some trifling omission of duty, he felled me to the deck with a blow of his huge fist. It was of no use to complain; but did I forget the indignity? No, it was always my creed never to forget, never to forgive; so I brooded over the insult in silence, determining some day to pay it back, ay, and with interest too.

"And I did so. Once, as we lay in the middle of the Bonny River, I was on watch, when I saw the second mate cautiously creeping along under the bulwarks toward the place where I was stationed. It was one of those nights which are only to be seen in the tropics; the stars, which appeared thrice the magnitude of those which are seen in northern latitudes, looked like many-colored globes suspended from the purple over-circling sky by invisible cords. That brilliant constellation, the Southern Cross, blazed overhead, a gem worthy the heaven in which it was set; and the only sounds which met my ear were the chatterings of monkeys among the trees that grew down to the water's edge, and the lapping of the water against the sides of the schooner, as the tide ebbed rapidly. A white mist hung above the low, murky shores, and extended for some distance over the surface of the stream; but towards the centre, where we lay, no fog-bank obscured the bosom of the water. To have slept on shore, inhaling that miasmatic vapor would have been death to an European, and that was one reason why we were moored mid-stream, another was that in the position we occupied, we were less liable to treacherous attacks from the natives.

"When the second mate came close to where I was standing, he made a sign that I should keep quiet, and feeling sure that some plot against the captain was hatching, for Tracy had also been ill-used by him, I answered the signal, and we soon understood each other. It appeared that on a previous voyage, Captain Feebin had overreached one of the native chiefs in a bargain, and that he and his people were determined to be revenged; this they could not do without being assisted by some one on board, and Tracy had been accordingly tampered with. I was only too eager to fall in with the arrangements of the second mate, and not the less so because a large amount of booty would be my share of the plunder; the schooner containing a valuable cargo of palm oil, ivory, and gold dust on board, she having just exchanged all the articles which she had brought out for the same.

"When the watch was set, the next night, Captain Feebin mustered all his crew to see that none were skulking among the barracoons on shore, and gruffly ordered the anchor to be weighed at day-break. He then turned in to his state-cabin bank, and all was quiet. But not for long. No sooner had the moon set behind a distant mountain range, than, emerging from the bank of mist on the left side of the river, Tracy and I saw the expected canoes, some twenty in number, all filled with armed negroes, paddling cantonally towards the schooner. In a very few minutes scores of dark forms silently clambered up its sides and reached the deck. Then, a preconcerted signal being given, a terrific shout arose, and I took my place, hatchet in hand, as also did Tracy, in the savage ranks.

"That yell—it might have startled the dead in their graves—awoke the captain, who, undressed as he was, rushed upon deck, and was instantly seized. In less than a minute a rope was placed round his neck—by me—and he was run up to the yard-arm, tackle having been previously arranged. It had been agreed between Tracy and the negro that only Feebin and the first mate, and the supercargo, should be sacrificed; but when once blood flowed, none could stay the carnage. Only Tracy and myself were spared! The work of death done, the schooner was fired, and then in one of the canoes we were taken on shore, and lodged in the house of the chief.

"Tracy soon died of the fever of the country, and I narrowly escaped. I now became mixed up with the slave trade, and for many months was superintendent of one of the barracoons. At the end of that time, growing tired of the country, I secured what property, in the shape of gold dust, I had acquired, about my person, and changing my name, proceeded along the coast to a remote settlement, Sierra Leone, and from thence shipped before the mast, to England. I landed in London, and speedily plunged into all the dissipations of the metropolis, so that my money before long melted away. Reduced at length to my last guinea, I began to cast about me for the means of bettering my condition, and to this end I strolled into a low, water-side public house, used as a place of call for sailors who wanted a ship.

"I had been some time in the tap-room, when a man entered, at sight of whom my eyes protruded from their sockets, a cold sweat bedewed my limbs, and my whole frame quivered. Had the African river given up its dead; had the man whom I had assisted to hang on the Bonny coast indeed come back to life and light? Evidently so it seemed, for before me stood Feebin, the captain of the schooner! I shrunk back into my corner, which was fortunately rather dark, and glanced sideways at him. Yes, there was no mistake, for when he spoke, I could have sworn to that voice among a million. From the conversation which ensued, I learned that he was picking up men for a cruise among the West India islands, pratical I had no doubt, from a remark by an old tar to whom he made proposals.

"'Why, cap'n, I don't mind shipping along with you—though they do say you're a hard 'un on the blue water—but then it's that sort of thing, you know, if caught.' And Jack indicated by a bend of his neck towards the right side, a pointing of his forefinger to just below his left ear, and a click of his tongue, what the that meant.

"'Hullo,' exclaimed another man present, 'don't talk about hanging before the captain, he mightn't like such a ticklish subject.'

"Nor in fact did I either, just at that time, for I feared every moment that Feebin would put his eye on me.

"'Pooh,' said he, 'I was in luck that time; when the black devils slung me up, they left me to enjoy the fresh air while they fired the ship, and as luck would have it, the flames consumed the end of the rope close to the belaying pin, so I dropped into the water and swam to the other side of the river, where I was sheltered by a planter whom I knew. But if ever I get hold of the fellow—one of the crew—who put the rope round my neck—and I'm always on the look-out for him—I'll give him good reason to remember his night's work on the Bonny River.'

"You may be sure I left that place as soon as possible. I then made for the country, got after some time to my native place, and fortunately arrived here just as the old lighthouse-keeper died. I procured the situation; married, and in time, two children were born to me—a boy and a girl; the latter of whom, as well as her mother, died of consumption, brought on by the bleak winds of the place; and the boy, who could not put up with my rough treatment, ran away, and having no trade to support him, went to sea. Left alone in the lighthouse, my heart grew harder, and my temper fiercer than ever before. None of the neighboring villagers cared to associate with me, for they believed I had hastened the death of my wife and daughter by rough usage, and that my unfatherly cruelty had driven Henry to sea. So hating every one, and fearing that whenever I saw any man approaching the lighthouse, it was Feebin, coming to seize and punish me for attempted murder, I passed ten years of utter loneliness and perfect misery. No wonder was it that women and children avoided me when I was compelled to go to the village to make necessary purchases, and that when I entered the parlor of the 'Three Puncheons,' no voice greeted, no hand was stretched forth to bid me welcome.

"The ship Endeavor, Captain Feebin, from the West Indies, was to sail from Port Royal, Jamaica, with a valuable cargo on the 1st inst. She will probably reach this port in about six weeks from that day.'

"Such was the announcement I read in a

Bristol paper, as I sat one evening by my solitary fireside. So then my dreaded enemy was still alive, and what was worse, he was coming to a neighboring seaport. What security had I that he would not visit my own vicinity, as captains often did, and discover me in my retreat? Well enough I knew what the consequences would be were I detected—neither he nor the law would be merciful. From that moment I watched every fresh sail with a terrible interest. Something seemed to whisper in my ear that my doom was fixed, that a fearful catastrophe was impending. But how to avert it?—that was the question that haunted me day and night. Then I considered that something might be done to prevent the calamity if I was acquainted with the appearance and peculiarities, if any, of the Endeavor. I had a vague notion that I might procure leave of absence, and remain away from my post until that ship had gone to sea again. So one evening, after seeing to the light in the lantern, I strolled to the 'Three Puncheons,' and calling for a can and a pipe, sat down in the chimney corner.

"As, in some public houses, the talk is all 'farm,' or all 'horse,' so in this seaside locality it was naturally all 'ship.' I listened long before anything occurred to interest me; but at length the name of Endeavor caught my attention.

"'Well, she is a fine barque-rigged craft,' observed one, 'and makes lucky voyages generally, though how Feebin will get along is another matter. People tell strange stories about him.'

"'Well, at all events, he wont sail in the Endeavor any more voyages,' observed another.

"'How is that?' I ventured to ask.

"'Why, because he has bought two-thirds of the Margaret, now on the stocks at Swansea, within two miles of where we're sitting, and he's going out in her to Cuba, to bring home copper ore, which will pay him a deuced deal better than sugar and coffee, at the present freights.'

"That was enough for me, and after gathering some particulars as to the appearance of the Endeavor, I made the best of my way home. I sat for some time moodily looking into the fire, full of dark, vague thoughts, and then I threw myself on my bed, but not to sleep. I believe the devil was my companion all through that night. I arose in the morning, feverish and unrefreshed. My first glance was seaward, and all through the day, and for many days afterwards, I stood in the balcony of the lantern, straining my eyes in the direction in which I knew that vessel must come. So it went on, until the af-noon of the twenty-fourth of December, when far away to the westward I beheld a large vessel beating up the channel, in the teeth of a tremendous gale which had been steadily blowing since the night before.

"Below the lighthouse, and about half a mile from the shore, was a bar of shifting sand, called the Hog's Back, over which the waves were now beating with tremendous fury—indeed the lighthouse had been built for the purpose of warning ships of this dangerous shoal. I know not how it was, but as I gazed on the world of waters below, a new idea entered my mind, which caused a thrill of excitement to run through my frame. The wind was blowing on shore, and there was every appearance of its coming on hazy towards evening; if so, and the ship continued in her present course, the chances were, as the currents set in this direction, and if she had no pilot on board—not a likely occurrence in such weather—that, the light being obscured, she would drift towards the shoal. Did I hope she might? Much more, I prayed that she might, with all my heart and soul. God forgive me!

"As I smoked my pipe that afternoon, how the past rose up before me. My dead wife and child, who lay in the churchyard near by; and my boy, poor Harry, who was now I knew not where—his features were fresh in my recollection, and I was trying to fancy how ten years had changed them, when, amid the brief lulls of the tempest, which now seemed to shake the tower to its foundations, I heard a bang, bang, bang—signals of distress, fired, doubtless, from the Endeavor. In a moment I was on the balcony of the lantern, and there, sure enough, for the sun had not yet set, I saw the ship driving madly along before the gale. She was apparently making for Swansea roads, on reaching which she would be safe. Her fore and main-masts had gone, and she answered but badly to her helm; that was evident to my practised eye in a moment, for every now and then she rolled heavily in the trough of the sea, as through my glass I could see 'Endeavor' painted on her side. As night was fast approaching, the lighthouse alone would be her salvation—without its aid, to gain the harbor of refuge would be next to impossible.

"'Now,' whispered the tempting devil at my side, 'now is your only chance!' It was time to light the lamps, but I still lingered until the vessel was no longer discernible, although she could not have been more than two miles from the fearful shoal over which the breakers were now foaming and rushing with tremendous fury.

"A lighted match applied to the lamp wicks would have saved that ship and its crew. Did I kindle one? No; I stood straining my eyes through the gloom, and listening intently for the fatal crash and shriek which I knew must come. And come at length it did; for all of a sudden a flash of lightning revealed the doomed ship on the summit of an immense rolling billow; then came the dull, heavy shock, as she struck, and in ten minutes' time, fragments of the wreck, and portions of the cargo floated on the surges.

"Then I lighted the lamps, and the red reflector, falling on the foam below, seemed to turn it into blood. Hurrying down from the lantern, I barred and bolted the door, hoping that the neglect of my important duty had not been observed; but in my blind madness I had quite forgotten that the light was a revolving one, and could be seen from the land as well as from the sea, from all points of the compass, in fact. And it was scarcely to be expected that a circumstance so unusual as that of not lighting the lamps for nearly two hours after dark, would pass unnoticed by every one. Half maddened, I seized an axe, and was about rushing up stairs in order to purposely damage the machinery, so that I might have some excuse ready, when I heard a tap at the little window, opposite the foot of my bed, and at the same instant a fearful wailing cry, such a cry as mortal ear never before heard, rose and died away upon the blast.

"I stood where I was, seemingly rooted to the spot, and almost petrified with horror. Suddenly the tapping at the window-pane was repeated, and at the same moment the logs on the fireplace blazed up fiercely. I glanced towards the window, and there, pressed against the glass, was a human face! Its eyes glaring fiercely at me; its cheeks pale; its lips blue; and the long black hair of its head mixed with tangled seaweed, streaming with brine. I rushed to the end of the chamber, but those eyes ever followed me. God of mercy! the countenance was that of my son! Burying my face in my hands, I sought to shut out the fearful vision; and when I again ventured to look towards the window, the face was no longer there. For a moment I believed that I had been deceived by my excited fancy, and under this impression ran to the outside of the window, thinking I might find some one there who had escaped from the wreck. But no, there was not a trace of any human being to be found.

"A miserable Christmas eve did I spend all alone in that dreary place. As soon as daylight dawned, I took a tumbler full of spirits to steady my shattered nervous system, and hurried to the edge of the cliff. As it became lighter, I could see on the beach far below, many fragments of the wreck, and some dead bodies. Actuated by an irresistible impulse, I hurried down the rocks, and then with trembling hands turned over a body which lay on its face. I knew it in an instant by a mole on the left cheek bone—it was that of Harry! my boy Harry! And I was his murderer! And for what? Intelligence reached me the same day that only one man had escaped from the wreck; he had lashed himself to a spar, and was cast shore some miles distant, and now lay in a cottage near Swansea—it was Captain Feebin!"

Here the manuscript ended. Its perusal had much excited me, and just as I concluded, a sudden gust of wind shaking the casement, drew my attention thereto. Walking towards it, I drew aside the curtain, and there, to my unspeakable horror, was a pale, ghastly, imploring face, whose dull eyes glared in upon the room! I uttered a wild shriek, and fell forward on the floor.

"Nonsense, perhaps, after all, 'twas all your fancy, young man," said Captain Polwhele, who picked me up, and restored me to consciousness. But to this day I am unconvinced.

"By the way," I asked of the captain, "what became of the villain, Varney?"

"Well," he replied, "you see no direct charge could be brought against him, as the revolving apparatus was found to be out of order; but he had warning to leave the post; and three weeks afterward—during which time I suppose he wrote out that story you've been reading—his body was found smashed to a jelly on the sands at the bottom of the cliff."

WHOLESONE EDUCATION.

Of all the know-nothing persons in this world, commend us to the man who has "never known a day's illness." He is a moral dunce; one who has lost the greatest lesson in life, who has skipped the finest lecture in that great school of humanity, the sick chamber. Let him be versed in mathematics, profound in metaphysics, a ripe scholar in the classics, a bachelor of arts, or even a doctor of divinity, yet is he one of those gentlemen whose education has been neglected. For all his college acquirements, how inferior is he in wholesome knowledge to the mortal who has had but a quarter's gout or a half-year of ague!—how infinitely below the fellow-creature who has been soundly taught his tic-douloureux, thoroughly grounded in the rheumatics, and deeply learnt in the scarlet fever! And yet, what is more common than to hear a great hulking, florid fellow bragging of an ignorance, a brutal ignorance, that he shares in common with the pig and bullock, the generality of which die, probably, without ever having experienced a day's indisposition!—Thomas Hood.

ELOQUENCE.

Eloquence, that charms and burns,
Startles, soothes, and wins by turns.—CLINCH.

BY-AND-BY.

BY ELPHALINE BOLTON.

Where'er heavy hearts are beating,
Comes the gentle whispered greeting,
Hope's sweet voice is e'er repeating,
By-and-by! by-and-by!
Chase the tear-drop, check the sigh,
Joy is coming by-and-by!

Rosy childhood's pulse is bounding,
To that magic whisper's sounding,
Telling of the joys abounding
By-and-by, by-and-by.

Haste the moments, let them fly—
Joys, we'll grasp them by-and-by.

To the student, pale and weary,
Through the night-hours, long and dreary,
Steals an echo soft, yet cheery,
By-and-by! by-and-by!

Flinch not, pause not, guard on high
Shall reward thee by-and-by!

To him across the ocean foaming,
Far from home and loved ones roaming
Floats an echo through the gloaming,
By-and-by! by-and-by!

Thrills the warm heart, lights the eye,
With thoughts of meeting by-and-by.

The watcher by some loved one lying
Wan and helpless, to her sighing
Hears angelic tones replying,
By-and-by! by-and-by!

Watch and pray—the languid eye
Health shall brighten by-and-by.

The mourner by the green grave weeping,
Where a cherished form is sleeping,
Hears a spirit softly speaking,
By-and-by! by-and-by!

Dear one, lift thy thoughts on high,
We shall meet thee by-and-by!

THE DOUBLE MARRIAGE.

BY MRS. MARY A. DENISON.

"TELL me a story, Pierre."

The lips that spoke so winningly were rosy-red and very beautiful. The cheeks, now flushed with the color of health, had deep dimples; the eyes were all alight with the steady flame of happiness and contentment that would have made them very lovely even if they had not been so very blue, so lustrous and almond-shaped.

Pierre Lasselle was the son of French parents. He was by birth an American citizen, loved his country, had been well-educated in its schools and its principles of government. He had not, at the time our story opens, been long wedded to his fairy of a bride. Intended for a profession by his parents, who were very proud of their good and handsome son, he had in only this one thing gone counter to their wishes, having from his youth had an unconquerable desire to be a farmer. And a farmer he accordingly became—a model farmer, a prince of farmers; and at the age of twenty-eight had won himself a farm, a cottage and a wife, all his very own. At first sight, Emily looked too delicate to be a farmer's bride. She had never labored very hard, but she could oversee and manage capitably; and fragile and timid as she seemed, no mistress was ever more quickly and willingly obeyed.

It was a whistling December night. The large room in which the handsome couple sat was well lighted, for in addition to the globe lamp on the small table beside them, the great logs piled in the ample fireplace threw up broad sheets of flame, sometimes, in their ambitious attempts to outshine the lesser light, overlapping the brass fender, upon one end of which the toe of a shining boot rested, peeping from beneath Emily's blue dress. The family room was one of Emily's planning. It had wide, pleasant windows, over which were looped long curtains of muslin, the inner coverings being green shades. At the great bay-window in the centre, stood Emily's work-table and guitar, a vase of flowers, and more than thirty pots of plants arranged on a fanciful stand, all showing the skill and care that were bestowed on them by their young mistress. There were pictures on the walls, and little busts on brackets; there were comfortable easy-chairs, hanging-shelves filled with books, bird-cages whose inmates nestled their little heads under golden wings, secure in the love that had so long protected them.

How could Pierre Lasselle help being very happy, surrounded by all these comforts, these luxuries, and sitting opposite that beautiful little lady, whose red lips had just said, "tell me a story, Pierre?"

He threw the paper down that had almost absorbed his whole attention, kissed his wife, stretched his slippered feet more comfortably over the bright colors of the rug, as he replied to her question by asking another.

"A story, Em? Well, let me see! I don't think of anything to-night, and after wading through that horribly dull political paper, I don't know as I have imagination enough left to invent one. What sort of a story will you have?—a ghost story?"

"O, nothing horrible, if you please—nothing of spirits who walk of nights—nothing of treason or murder—but something of love! something most charmingly romantic! It seems so cosy here! and I'm just in the mood."

"Well, let me see!" returned Pierre, musingly. Then snapping his fingers and smiling, till Emily wondered how deep that dimple did go in, he exclaimed: "There! just the thing. Strange I never thought of it before! Em, I've got a capital story, and I shall call it, 'The Double Marriage.'"

"Good!" cried Emily, clapping her hands; "now if it were only true!"

"It is true," returned Pierre; "and the actors— But never mind! I'll speak of that, when I get through."

"In the first place, it happened in an old French city, Chartres, that with its twin towers has been famous in history, you know. Its characters or heroes were students from Paris—all of them madcaps, wild with youth and high spirits, enjoying a vacation. They were foot-travellers just for the pleasure of the thing. Every day they would stop at some old inn and get their meals, or else, buying up a round lot of provisions, they would hire a man and his little cart, and stop as they pleased, dining under the shadows of lofty elms, spreading their repast upon the grass. As I told you, they were merry fellows, and drank, no doubt, plenty of wine; so that they were always ready for what they called a high old time.

"As they neared Chartres, there was a great din. Men rode by, blowing trumpets and proclaiming some great show. Now and then, a band with a dozen instruments filled the air with rude bursts of melody. The citizens wore eager faces; their daughters sat at the front windows and looked out. The peasants were attired in holiday costume, and the whole city seemed alive with mirth and festivity.

"We will put up at the great inn," said the leader of the students, a handsome-faced youth with light, glistening curls hanging over his collar. "Let us pretend that we are the sons of noblemen; nothing will be too good for us, you know. We will get the best beds, the best tables, and the best seats at the theatre."

"Agreed!" cried the others. And with a shout of congratulation, they went on within the limits of the city, dusted their clothes, shook their caps and themselves into decent order, and marched in a rollicking sort of way up to the hotel, demanding attention and showing their money.

"The landlord was extremely, nay extravagantly polite; but sacre! he couldn't accommodate the gentlemen—no, not if they were grand dukes or reigning monarchs. He was profuse in his expressions of regret; would rather his right eye had been plucked out, his right arm cut off, or even his neck dislocated, than disappoint the young gentlemen. But par dieu! what could he do? They saw how it was—every room, every bed, every seat, every standing-place taken up long before the last week. It was a terrible disappointment to him, but so it was.

"And so it was to the students, who conferred together as to the expediency of their demanding shelter at any risk, and ensconcing their pseudo noble forms in the couches to be occupied by country merchants, mechanics and peasants. Meanwhile a white-faced, green-eyed youth had gone towards 'mine host,' and whispered in his ear. The landlord's face grew bright, as with an approving nod, he said:

"Truly I never thought of it, young men! The Widow Britteng, who lives not far from here—she has a spacious house, and nobody occupies it but herself and her pretty daughter! Ah, Mademoiselle Louise is herself worth seeing! She is the belle of Chartres, and more than one worthy man sighs in vain at her feet."

"We wish the best accommodations," said the foremost speaker, curtly; "we are willing and able to pay liberally. If the Widow Britteng could lodge us for a night, or a week, she would lose nothing by it."

"The landlord made a profound bow, said that the widow never took lodgers in her life, being a lady who had once enjoyed a large fortune, but he was sure she would exert herself to the utmost to take care of the noblemen, adding that if they had a mind, they might enjoy the comforts of his table, and he went on to give them a list of the delicacies he expected to serve up.

"It was all soon arranged, and the wild young fellows were admitted to madame's house, and given the liberty of her handsome parlor. The furnishing of this room was elegant, but the furniture was of the last century, though so cunningly kept, that it seemed to have come but yesterday from the upholsterer's. A lute, a little pianoforte, and a box of music, spoke mutely of a womanly presence.

"That is the belle of Chartres!" he with the handsome face and light, soft, curling hair, suddenly exclaimed.

"He pointed to a portrait in an antique frame—a picture that gave evidence of very poor artistic skill, but whose beauty broke through the false shading and bad coloring like a glorious landscape seen through a shattered pane.

"The face was very youthful, quite childish in expression, and evidently belonged to a girl of fifteen or sixteen. The dark eyes, long, thick lashes, dimpled lips (just like yours, Em), and curly, waving locks rippling over the shoulder, towards which the face was archly turned, made an instant and dangerous impression on the fancy of Louis. He looked so long and hard, that his companions began to laugh and jest, after the manner of frolicsome students, and to repeat the pathetic declaration of the landlord that many a man was kneeling at her feet, ready to die for a look or word of encouragement.

"Pshaw! it would be an easy capture for me!" he said with a curling lip. "I have only to give her a few soft looks, insinuate something about my noble father, and the madame my mother, and she would melt as easily as sealing-wax."

"A hundred francs to your gold watch that she gives you neither look nor word."

"A thousand francs to your hundred that I win her consent to go to the priest and there be made my wife."

"What! would you marry her?" asked one of his companions, in a low voice.

"Louis was flushed with wine. Usually reckless and impulsive, his brain, inflamed now beyond its natural heat, urged him beyond reason.

"Yes," he replied; "I would marry her, just to show that the thing could be done. One is not always obliged to live with a wife," he added, with a heartless laugh.

"Even the wild students were shocked at this; but after a moment of reflection, one of them, clapping his hands, said it would not be a bad joke. They had come out expressly for an adventure, and here was one thrown right in their way.

"The landlord need not have told us about this Louise; but now that he has, and we are on a bout for fun, let's make the most of it. The trouble is, more than one of us may want to lay siege to this pretty damsel; if so, what then, Master Louis? O, you need not fear that I shall forget to address you in a manner befitting your assumed rank before company, but together, we are unnobled."

"What then?" said Louis, haughtily, lifting his slight form; "why, nothing then. I tell you I will carry her off before and in spite of you all—that will I! But how shall I contrive to meet her? It is evident her mother is very chary of this fine gem, and if she can help it, we shall not see the pretty Louise for a twelvemonth of Sundays, if we stay as long. But let me alone for managing; I'll contrive to meet this paragon in some way, and see if I don't win my bet!"

"They took supper at the hotel, and then wended their way to the old hall, where great staring placards announced that 'Monsieur' this and 'Mademoiselle' that, 'performers of his majesty's theatre,' were to delight the wonder-loving eyes of the Chartresites. It was a long, low hall, of no particular architecture, and furnished with seats below and seats above, in humble imitation of a real theatre. It was brilliantly lighted, however; and the stage, when the great green curtain went up, displayed quite an amount of pretty scenery, which it is likely the performers carried about rolled up on long poles, plenty of which our students had seen sticking from sundry wagons.

"The audience had gathered early, the better classes filling the most prominent seats, and a set of more contented or expectant faces never was seen. Whole families sat together, quietly eating bon bons. Every eye was turned to the young students, as they entered and moved towards a seat which they had taken the precaution to bargain for. People had been wondering who it could be for whom the very orchestra seemed waiting; for it happened that fiddles, trombones and kettle-drums struck up the instant they appeared at the door. This was favorable, and with haughty looks they followed up the effect, seated themselves, when the first one who had entered, turning his eyes, found himself beside the charming Louise.

"The mother saw the close proximity, and seemed inclined, at the first, to change seats with her daughter; but the recollection of a card she had picked up directly after supper, inscribed "Duc de Jours," made her resigned, even in permitting the elegant Louis to look and the sweet Louise to blush, without the slightest questioning of lip or eye.

"Louise was much more lovely than her picture. Her lustrous eyes sparkled, her rich lips moved, and the fine vermeil color upon her clear, dark cheeks came and went with every passing emotion. Louis was only afraid that he should love her too dearly, and regret his rash promise; it seemed so cruel, as the innocent young creature sat by his side, to be forming plans to capture a heart which had probably, as yet, never loved, and doom it to humiliation and anguish!

"The acting upon the rough stage was little seen by Louis; perhaps, also, Louise did not enjoy it as, in her little chamber, she had thought she should an hour before dusk. She certainly felt somewhat nervous, and not a little flattered that this handsome and distinguished-looking young man should notice her so much; and her timid heart, despite the consciousness of her young bellehood, beat faster than it had ever beat before under the glances of any man.

"A week passed on. Louis had won the confidence of the mother and the heart of the daughter. His heart, which was naturally good, pained him that he was using deception towards two such confiding beings—for they implicitly believed all that he said. But having begun by deception, he had either to unmask himself to their contempt and his honor, or to continue the wretched play which seemed now anything but sport to him. The advice and the jeers of his companions stimulated him to pursue the latter and less honorable course.

"It was nearing the close of the vacation. The students sat together in a room at the hostelry. On a round table were placed glasses and bottles of wine. Cards and pipes were before them.

"Our young count looks rather sober over his victory,' said one of them. 'His heart mis-gives him, poor fellow! he will lose the bet.'

"By no means,' exclaimed Louis, sharply, clearing the cloud which had indeed settled upon his brow; "I am nearer than ever to winning."

"How can that be, when we start for Paris to-morrow afternoon in the first diligence? our legs not being, as at the first of the journey, animated with anticipation. Ah, I predict that you will lose your bet!"

"And I, and I," said other voices.

"Louis silently swallowed glass-full after glass-full of wine. There was a red color on his cheek, and his eye flashed stiffully.

"Gentlemen," said Louis, huskily, 'will you all be witnesses of my marriage?'

"They answered 'yes,' with one accord.

"Then I invite you to be present in this room to-morrow morning, at the hour of nine. The priest will be in waiting, and the ceremony will take place."

"What! a real priest?" exclaimed one. 'I thought that to-day one of us might personate his holiness, and so you—'

"Man! do you take me for a demon?" exclaimed Louis, springing from his seat, shaking his long, fair hair back, and confronting the last speaker.

"The young man shrank away from his burning eyes.

"Confess now that you love her and intend to take her to Paris," said another; 'you could both manage to live capitally on love and hope.'

"I shall confess nothing," replied Louis, sternly. 'I have arranged matters with her consent. The priest has been told his story; Louise, hers. After we are married, I shall set off for the capital, alone and on foot. As to whether I ever come back, or Louise follows me, that concerns none but myself. I shall win my bet, and you will lose. Do you understand?"

"He is in a queer mood, at any rate," said one of the young students. "If we don't stop bantering him, there will be blood shed. Well, sir count," he added, turning to the young man, "I give you joy of your conquest; and permit me to say that a sweeter bride to grace any fortune, it would be hard to meet with."

"The lips of the rash Louis quivered a little, his eyes sparkled with a sudden joy, and he grasped the young man's hand tightly in his own."

"The next morning came without clouds. Louise, dressing herself very carefully, told her mother she was going out to shop."

"That is right, my daughter," her mother said, glancing up from her work; "and take a long walk beside. I see you have been looking pale for some days past. I am sorry I cannot go out with you, but Pauline will be company. Pauline has been in my house now ever since you were born. She is a good creature, loves you dearly, and would deny you nothing."

"Yes, mother—Pauline will go," said Louise, with trembling lips. "May I not kiss you, mother?"

"Certainly, love," said the widow, looking up in some surprise and presenting her forehead. "Are you well enough, my child? Are you sure you can bear the exertion? Do call a carriage, if you are fatigued in the least."

"Yes, mother," said the lovely young girl, as she drew her veil down and went out.

"She had not gone far, and had purchased but a few trifles, when she ordered her nurse to call a carriage. The two entered, and the driver set them down at the old inn. In a room of that old inn were assembled the students, each furnished with a small bouquet. Louis stood among them—very pale, but smiling. The rest tried to jest and laugh, but they could not succeed. It seemed as if they were smitten with a sudden panic. Even they were touched, as the beautiful girl entered, on the arm of the nurse who was to personate her mother. Louise walked feebly; Louis sprang forth and supported her, whispering something in his own lover-like way. The priest asked no questions, evidently feeling that he had none to ask, and the solemn ceremony was gone through with. Then the almost fainting girl went away, as she had come, with her nurse; and Louis, with white but determined lips, made preparation to leave Chartres."

"O, what did become of them both?" asked Emily, her whole manner betraying intense interest. "I do hope he was honorable; I do hope he did not desert her; for in some way I have grown quite attached to poor, wicked Louis. Tell me the conclusion, quick; I hope it is good."

"As quick as I can, Emily; but you know I am telling a story, and must not anticipate. Louis went back to Paris a changed man. He did indeed love, passionately love, Louise. He asked for no higher blessing than to call her wife. His resolution was taken. He could toil and save, and study, and become worthy to proclaim her as his openly. He had told her all his story; even the jest, the bet, the counterfeit—yes, to the lowering of self-respect. He had opened his heart to her, and shown her just what he was, and she did not despise him—on the contrary, loved him more that he had conquered himself. But her mother's heart was set upon seeing her wedded to a rich man. She had ambitious views for her handsome Louise. Who could tell but that, with her beauty, she might marry a title? So the little brave-hearted girl took upon herself a great responsibility. It was wrong—very wrong; but of course she did not stop to reason. So she pledged herself and the nurse to secrecy."

"A correspondence had been arranged, and the repentant Louis wrote often to his wife, but dared not yet trust himself in her presence. He wrote on, but after a few months, replies were not sent. This was very strange. He wrote again, and waited with feverish impatience; no answer. Then he hurried to Chartres; the house was empty—none knew where the widow and her daughter had gone. Some said they had gone to England—some to Germany; but all was vague, uncertain, mysterious. Nearly crazed, he returned to his home to be smitten with a fever of the brain, during which he raved about his wife, his bride, his good and beautiful Louise; and none knew what it meant, save the four students who accompanied him to Chartres."

"Poor Louis recovered, made a few more fruitless efforts to find the idol of his heart, and then settled quietly and sorrowfully to his studies. He gave his whole attention to fame. She was his mistress, his wife, his all. Not that he did not think of Louise, and at times mourn her loss passionately; for he was fixed in his determination never to marry."

"Only five years had rolled away, and Louis was a brilliant and promising lawyer. He had found many friends, and wealth came pouring in. He became so wedded to his business, so eager after success, that at last his health gave way, and it seemed as if premature old age was beginning to come to the young man of twenty-five. It was proposed that he should travel; he consented to an arrangement, made expressly for him, and accompanied some friends to America. There, in the capital of our country, he met with the first lady in whom he had ever taken the slightest interest, since his unfortunate marriage. Miss Brentworth was a superb woman—a gifted, glorious creature—gentle as beautiful, beloved by all who knew her, distinguished for her wit and elegance among all the belles that gathered in the metropolis.

"To her he bowed down; he could not help it. Some controlling impulse kept him ever by her side, and he grew to worship her as an angel of light. She encouraged him. Not another man did she so smile upon. Scholars and senators had contended for her hand; all had been courteously denied. But to Louis she was all affability. There was a terrible struggle in his mind. It was evident that she expected and was willing to be won; but whenever he thought of proposing, a cold perspiration broke over him, and the consciousness that he was bound by the strongest ties to another, prevented the declaration so eagerly looked for. Alas, he had not the power to resist! He allowed himself to think that Louise was dead—lost, at any rate, to him. In a moment when passion had mastered him, he declared, was accepted—they were married!"

"O, too bad! too bad!" exclaimed the sensitive Emily, her eyes filling with tears.

"He was well punished for it," said Pierre, smiling a little. "Remorse gave him no rest. His great love and his great grief were consuming him. He grew restless, miserable, and one day, feeling that he could endure the burden no longer, decided upon telling all to his wife, and then leaving her free."

"Surely," cried Emily, "he was not going to kill himself?"

"Even so," replied Pierre. "His brain was diseased; he had agonized over his own frailty till there was no longer a healthy action, and suicide seemed his only relief. One day he gathered courage, and with great sighs of contrition, confessed:

"O, what did she say?" cried Emily. "If it had been you, I should have dropped dead on the spot."

"She neither did that, nor fainted, but calmly said, 'I know all about it.' That seemed worse and worse, until she loosened her hair, bared her neck, and exclaimed—'Louis! Louis! do you not yet recognize me?'

"No wonder the man fell at her feet as one entranced. It was Louise; but so changed from beauty to beauty, changed in stature, complexion, fullness, that it was not singular that he had won his first love without knowing it."

"O, that is glorious!" And Emily sprang up, threw herself upon Pierre's neck, and wept for joy.

"It seems," said Pierre, as soon as she would let him go on, "the old nurse died and revealed her secret on her death-bed. The mother was frightfully angry. Having consulted with a rich brother, he advised her to change her name and that of her daughter, and leave the country, adding that if she would go to the United States, where he had long wished to settle, he would adopt Louise and leave her his fortune."

"Poor girl! She tried every stratagem without success. She sent letters from America; they never reached her husband. Finally she thought he had forgotten her; and when her mother and uncle were both dead, and she still refused offer after offer, she became known far and wide as the eccentric beauty—the prize whom nobody might ever capture."

"This, then, was all true—was it?" asked Emily, still snuggling up against Pierre's broad chest.

"Solemnly true," replied Pierre; "for Louise was my mother, and Louis my father."

Emily gave another cry of astonishment and delight. The clock at that moment struck eight—there was a knock at the outer door, and presently Pierre ushered in a tall, venerable man, and a handsome, yet graceful woman, though long past her prime. Emily gave them the best seat by the fire, and then told them of what she had just heard. And they all laughed heartily—though in the eyes of the aged father and mother there were a few drops that were not born of mirth.

DESPERATION OF ZEALOTS.

The Mormon power of resistance is generally under-estimated. It is forgotten that they are nearly all back-woodsmen, skilled in the use of arms, accustomed to camp-life and familiar with every pass and hiding place in the bleak mountains that surround them. In addition, the more ignorant among them believe themselves under the direct protection of the Lord of Hosts, who will strengthen their prophets, and send confusion on their enemies. We once had a conversation with an old man of Salt Lake, who had been so mutilated at the Far West that he was unable to walk. He showed where a rifle-ball had, as he believed, passed directly through the neck, crushing the bone, and leaving visible scars on either side. The scars were there, and nothing could convince the aged Saint that the preservation of his life had not been miraculous. The wife and daughters testified to the intervention of Heaven, and after relating the circumstances, the old man lifted up his tremulous hands, and "glorified the God of Israel."

DO YOU REMEMBER?

BY J. W. VAN NAME.

Do you—do you remember
 The cot upon the hill,
 Where flowers fair were blooming,
 And ran a rippling rill?—
 The little rustic bower,
 O'errun with trumpet-vine,
 Where wreaths of fragrant flowers
 For thee I used to twine?

The lawn in front the cottage,
 Where the clover used to grow;
 Beside the laughing brook,
 Whose waters gently flow;
 The path upon the hillside,
 Where the violets used to bloom:
 'Twas there we used to wander
 At twilight's deepening gloom.

TRUE LOVE AND FALSE.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

I think nothing so suddenly and effectually brings a woman to her senses regarding the true state of her affection as a dangerous rival. By this, I mean, that though she may look with the utmost apparent indifference upon all the gentlemen of her acquaintance, and consider herself as standing in a perfectly heart-whole relation to every one of them, let but another woman, be she more or less brilliant than herself, cross the limits she has marked out as the boundary of her own peculiar and inalienable queenship, and she is awake at once, with all her weapons in order to dispute the progress of the audacious encroacher; and ten to one before the battle is ended, she will discover some particular one among her wavering subjects, whom she is especially desirous of covering from the attacks of her enemy. Ten to one, she will find that all the while she has been asleep at her post, or lying among her inactive forces with colors down and sentinels off guard, the little god has been riddling her heart with his magical arrows, till, for the life of her, she cannot count a single pulse in the whole of that treacherous organ that is not beating and fluttering with an emotion which has smuggled itself into her bosom without her knowledge. I draw the above conclusion from my own experience, which I will now relate.

I called Edgar Richards my cousin, although he was only nominally so, being but the adopted son of the uncle and aunt with whom I went to reside after the death of my widowed mother. We were firm friends—Edgar and I—from the first of our acquaintance. But I never thought of loving him, or imagined the possibility of such a thing, until he began to talk to me about his beautiful cousin, Agnes Browne,—whom I had never seen, and if the truth must be known, never wanted to. I said I had never thought of loving. True, I had dreamed such intangible visions of love and happiness as must inevitably come to every womanly woman, earlier or later. But they were all hero-less romances, aimless fancies, air castles that I was content to build for the mere pleasure of building, without stopping to look for foundation or completeness. I cannot remember so far back that I did not have a lover; but he was always an ideal one—a combination of all that was honorable and manly, strong, upright and pure. I had never paused to trace resemblances, either real or imaginary, between that and any man of flesh and blood—least of all Edgar Richards.

I could not account for the decided feeling of annoyance that possessed me when he first commenced telling me about his cousin Agnes. He talked of his visits to her, read me passages from her letters, showed me a crayon sketch of her which he had drawn from memory, and talked my patience threadbare with his eulogiums. Cousin Agnes was beautiful, cousin Agnes was brilliant, cousin Agnes was graceful, charming, sweet, intelligent, bewitching, — adorable, if I might believe half the complimentary adjectives which he exhausted in her praise.

But the time came when I was to judge of her charms for myself. During the absence of my uncle and aunt on a protracted summer visit, Edgar wrote a pleading note to his favorite cousin, telling her how lonely the old homestead was, and begging her to take pity upon its disconsolate inmates, and revive them by a few weeks' enjoyment of her sunny presence. The result of the matter was, that in less than a week after the sending of the letter, we hailed the arrival of Miss Agnes Browne; who, to use her own words, had "come to rusticate and see cousin Edgar." It was very evident to me which motive influenced her the most strongly.

There is sometimes a silent antagonism,—a sort of magnetic repulsion carried on by quick glances, careless gestures, and an invisible spirit of bitterness which finds no perfect outward expression, yet, it is none the less keenly felt in its effects because it works in secret and in silence. Such a warfare commenced between Agnes Browne and I at our first meeting. I could not but pronounce her beautiful. Any one looking into her radiant blue eyes, watching the crimson flushing of her cheeks, or the red curve of her dainty lips, would have been insane to pronounce a different verdict. She was graceful, how could she be otherwise, with her slender, swaying figure, her matchless proportions and faultless symmetry of form? Brilliant, bewitching,—everything I had heard her painted, and yet I shrank with instinctive repugnance from her courteous greeting, and the soft clasp of her delicate white hand.

I will not go into a minute detail of the weeks that followed. It will be sufficient if I tell you that I saw another monopolizing attention that previously had been entirely mine, and saw it with a pang of envy. It was Agnes Browne's musical voice that sung Edgar's favorite songs—her smile of appreciation and sympathy instead of mine, that he learned to wait and watch for. I saw it all with the sharpened vision born of a disturbed and awakened heart. I saw it, and rebelled against the knowledge that came with it—the knowledge that I loved Edgar Richards with the first, pure, absorbing, passion-devotion of my womanhood. It was a bitter, galling truth for a proud woman to learn, and I tried to shut it out from my thoughts. As well might I have attempted to hide myself from the air of heaven and still breathe.

One other had possession of my secret. Need I say it was my rival? I knew it by the victorious, almost boastful way in which she queened it over me; the inimitable and apparently unconscious manner in which she managed to keep her dazzling, radiant loveliness in perpetual contrast with my plainness and awkwardness; the graceful sweetness with which she treated me in presence of others, and the haughty, exultant air which she put on when we were alone together. One morning I went into the garden to gather some roses for the parlor vases. The sunshine lay upon the flowers like a tremulous, floating film of gold. The air was delicious with perfume, and all Nature intoxicating in her rare and serene loveliness. But there was a sorrow in my heart which no outward beauty and peace could pacify; and with a spirit of almost defiant bitterness, I walked moodily down the garden walks. Suddenly, on turning the corner of a winding path, I became the witness of a scene not intended for curious eyes, and which sent the blood dashing back in an angry torrent upon my heart. Side by side upon a cushioned arbor-seat, sat Edgar Richards and Agnes. One of her round, white arms lay half shyly, half caressingly about his neck, the other swung coquettishly back and forth in the loop of a falling vine. Her head nestled against his shoulder, the eyelids drooping bashfully over the sparkling blueness of her eyes, and her curls drifting like a cloud of ringletty gold, all over her bright, blushing, happy face. His arms were clasped tenderly about her waist, and as he bent his head, and pressed his lips lingeringly to hers, I knew, as well as I do now, that I had witnessed the seal of their betrothal. I stole away as I had come, unperceived, and left them alone with their happiness, of which I was at best but an inappropriate spectator.

“Do you consider Mr. Richards dangerously ill, Miss Ellis?”

Agnes Browne had asked me this question in the softest and most musical of voices, as we stood together by the bedside of her lover who had been taken suddenly and violently sick during the night previous.

“I am not well enough acquainted with the different forms of sickness, to be a good judge,” I replied, looking up at her.

She had just come in from the morning ride, which she had been obliged for once to take without any attendant. The fresh air and invigorating exercise had brought a deeper crimson to her cheeks, and a livelier sparkle to her eyes, and I thought I had never seen her so lovely as at that moment, standing with the long skirt of her riding-habit trailing behind her upon the carpet, and giving her slight figure an air of queenliness; the dark plumes of her cap just shading her white forehead, and drooping against her rosy face, as if in envy of the tangled, sunshiny curls they could not keep in place; one soft hand resting lightly upon Edgar's feverish palm, and the other toying up and catching with a kind of childish grace the gauntleted gloves she had pulled off as she came in. I could not blame Edgar for loving her, or wonder that he should prefer her to me—plain Mary Ellis—with my brown complexion, common-place looks, and unattractive ways.

“Do you think he is dangerously ill, doctor?”

Agnes knit her brows with a pretty look of anxiety, as she turned to the physician who had but just entered the room, and repeated her question. The doctor bent low over his patient, felt his pulse, examined his tongue, and for a moment hesitated. Then he looked up with a glance so strange and peculiar that it thrilled through me like a vague foreboding of evil.

“Are you brave, young ladies?” he asked, looking first at Agnes and then at me.

“Do we look like cowards?” laughed Agnes, merrily.

“Mr. Richards is dangerously ill,” he replied, without noticing her remark; “and his disease is—” He hesitated.

“What?” I asked, breathlessly.

"Small pox!"

With a hysterical scream, Agnes pulled her hand from the grasp of the sick man's. The color fled from her lips and cheeks, and, fearing she was about to faint, I drew my arm within hers, and led her from the room. For at that moment I pitied her, and had no place in my heart for envy or ill will. She checked me as the door closed behind us.

"Will you go to my room and help me pack my trunks? The stage leaves at eleven o'clock, and I am afraid I cannot get myself in readiness without assistance."

"What! you do not mean that you are going away to leave us—him, at such a time." I dropped her arm, and moved away a step in my astonishment.

"Why not?" She opened her blue eyes wide upon me with a stare of wonder. "You don't think I'm going to shut myself up in a pest-house, do you? If I had only known, you wouldn't have caught me near him, I can tell you. I shouldn't wonder if I had taken the infection, already," she added, with a shudder. "If there was time for us both to prepare, I would ask you to accompany me. I can understand how you feel at being left in such a place!"

"Please borrow no uneasiness upon my account; my own personal safety is of but little consequence," I answered, indignantly. "I trust I am not selfish or cowardly enough to accept such an invitation, if you had the generosity to make it. I would not desert my worst enemy in such an extremity as this; and if I stood in the relation which you do towards Mr. Richards, no power under heaven could tempt me from his side. As it is, I shall remain with him in discharge of the duties which you seem so willing to relinquish. I shall only regret your absence because he will miss you."

Agnes flashed her eyes angrily. "Some people will do anything for display, and the sake of being thought more heroic than common persons. But I not one of the kind. I have not the least ambition for a saintship or a martyrdom. You can do as you choose about risking your life, but I thank my stars you are not mistress of my actions. I never was made for a nurse, and I do not intend to be one at present. It is different with you, you have no——"

"Beauty to spoil," I interrupted scornfully, for she paused in confusion.

"I didn't say so, though that's true enough. But such ill-tempered people as you never die young."

I made no reply, and she stood for a moment, gathering up her riding-shirts slowly, and beating the carpet impatiently with her gaitered feet.

"But don't let's part in anger," she said at last, holding out her hand with a forced smile of reconciliation. "I shall want you to write me every day how he is getting along, unless there is danger of taking the infection by letter. And you mustn't forget to tell me if he pits badly. It's so shocking! Even if he lives, which is not likely, he will probably be horribly scarred. Poor fellow! He's so handsome now!"

I did not try to conceal the fiery scorn that blazed up into my face at her words; but just then a faint moan came from the sick room, and I broke away from her with an inward feeling of thanksgiving that Heaven, which had given me an unlovely face, at least had not made me heartless. I will not say that I enjoyed the details of the next four weeks. There was something terrible in being shut up in that lonely old house, having no communication with the outward world, breathing a foul and contagious atmosphere, hearing no voices but those of the faithful old physician in his daily visits, and the delirious murmurs of the sick man. My uncle and aunt were still away, as I had refrained from sending for them until the house might be entered without danger. And so there was no hand but mine to bathe the fevered brow, and mix the cooling drinks—no one to share with me the wearying and nameless offices of the sick room. But at last, thank God! there came a day of reason and of convalescence; a day when the physician said all danger was over, and praised my skilful nursing as the saving of Edgar's life. It was the second week of his convalescence—a rainy August day, and at Edgar's request, I had kindled a light fire in the grate, and drawn his easy lounging-chair up before it.

"One thing more, before I shall let my patient little nurse sit down," he said, as I drew my chair up beside him. "Will you bring me the little rosewood box from the table in my room? I wish very much to open it."

I got it for him, and taking a book, sat down by his side.

"See, Mary, is it not beautiful?"

I looked up. He was holding a sunny ringlet of hair toward me, that needed no second glance to tell me from whose head it had been shorn. It curled silkily about his fingers, like a ring of amber floss, but the sight of it stirred up all the latent bitterness of my nature.

"Yes, Miss Browne had beautiful hair," I replied, biting my lips to keep harsher words in check.

"Why do you always call her Miss Browne?"

Do you not think with me that she has a sweet name—Agnes?" he asked, pronouncing the syllables lingeringly, and looking at me curiously.

"You cannot expect me to feel, as you do, a lover's partiality for it." I bent persistently over my book as I spoke.

The next moment I heard something singing in the grate, and looking up saw that the curl was gone from Edgar's hand. But surprise kept me silent.

"Please excuse me for interrupting you again, but I want your opinion of this daguerreotype."

I took it from his hand. It was the pictured face of Agnes Browne.—There was the dainty mouth, the delicately arched brows, the cloud of silky curls, and I thought as I looked at it, that the blue eyes put on their old look of triumph and exultation. I gave it back to him without comment, and turned again to my book. Something followed the curl into the grate, and if I hadn't been reading too attentively to be sure of anything, I should have said it was the daguerreotype.

"And see all these notes and letters she has written me. We have corresponded for years—long before I ever saw you, Mary. Look at the penmanship. Is it not fair and delicate?" And a bunch of old letters was thrust between my eyes and book, with a quickness of motion that made me start.

"Now, I am going to show you how I value them. Look."

A careless toss,—a bright, strong flash of flame, and there was a ring of white ashes upon the hearth, but no letters in Edgar's hand. I had an indistinct impression that his mind was wandering, and my face must have shown the thought, for he smiled quietly and shook his head.

"No, Mary, I am not insane. I never did a wiser or more agreeable job in all my life. But arrange this cushion at my back, and I'll tell you about it."

I did as he requested, but before I could withdraw my arm, he leaped quickly backward, and it was a prisoner about his neck. I tried to release myself from this unexpected bondage, but with a sudden clasp he circled my waist, and drew me down into his arms.

"There, now, you know I am very weak, and the doctor says I must not exert myself too much; so, you see if you struggle, you may make me worse. Sit still, like a good girl, and hear me through."

I was compelled to obey, though from the muscular strength he exhibited, I judged he need have no fear of a relapse.

"Do you know I overheard every word of your conversation with Agnes at the door of my chamber, on the first day of my illness?" he asked. "You did not speak in whispers, and if you had, I believe I should have heard you, for love and sickness make a man's ears sharp."

I made him no reply other than a second ineffectual effort to escape, but he held me fast, and continued: "I was not too sick to draw comparisons between her utter heartlessness and your generous devotion. I knew that a selfish, neglectful mistress could never make me a devoted and noble wife; and that moment was sufficient to turn love into scorn—passion to indifference." Again I tried to rise, but the arms drew me closer. "Since that time I have been very, very sick; but there has been always a ministering angel by my side—a gentle, patient, loving presence watching about me, and sweetening even the bitterness of pain with her untiring devotion. I have read your face for hours together, when you thought me sleeping, or followed your motions as you flitted noiselessly about my room, and I have learned that there is something more desirable in woman than grace or wit—something holier than beauty." His words thrilled me with a strange mixture of pain and pleasure, but I turned my face resolutely away from his glance. "And more. I have thought that the one who could devote herself so untiringly to my service, humor my exactions, bear patiently with my petulance and feebleness—breathe a polluted atmosphere, and brave the dangers of a possible death for my sake, without giving herself a moment's respite from her wearying vigils, must be very noble, very courageous, and very loveable. And I wondered why, instead of being caught by the glitter of a painted stone,—I had not realized the value of the precious jewel that shone with such a lustre within the outstretching of my hands."

There was a hot dashing of blood into my face, and I begged him to release me.

"Not just yet. I want to know why you did not desert me too, as Agnes did?"

"Perhaps because I loved you better." I did not realize what I had said until with a rapid movement he drew my face down upon his shoulder, and said in an eager voice:

"Dare I understand you as I wish I might? Say those words again, Mary, and let me be my own interpreter." A nestling in the arms that circled me—a whispered word, and then my lips were besieged with a shower of kisses, and Edgar was "the happiest man this side of Paradise."

That which is to be loved long, is to be loved with reason, rather than passion.

THE LESSON.

BY MRS. FANNY E. BARBOUR.

I sat to-night and gazed upon the western sky,
 All glowing with the tints that sunset leaves,
 Of gold and purple, richer than the Tyrian dye
 Which Egypt's son for his dark monarch weaves.

Then crimson lights streamed out like banners on the air,
 And far across the radiant slope of heaven,
 As if the weary day unloosed her shining hair,
 While tarrying but to welcome in the even.

Wild chanting winds, which all the sunny hours had sung,
 Grew quiet as the night drew on apace,
 And whispered low, sweet tales in their mysterious tongue,
 Of mother Nature, and her wondrous grace.

And little birds, thus early wooed by Spring's soft call,
 From their far home 'neath glorious southern skies,
 "Singing to rest," flew by,—while glorious over all
 I saw the moon, night's radiant queen, arise.

The watching stars looked down like eyes of angels bright,
 Who minister around the throne of God;
 A solemn hush and peace seemed to pervade the night,
 As if some holy presence earth now trod.

I had been faltering in the day,—my spirit's wings
 Low drooped, were folded, fearing still to fly,
 Till mid this scene I felt anew the love which brings
 All truth and goodness to our beings nigh.

Then reverently I prayed, for heaven seemed very near,
 And hope grew strong once more, and soared above,
 As in the sweet night calm I felt that "God is here!"
 And o'er us all the shield of his great love.

THE BLACK SATIN GOWN:

—OR,—

MURDER WILL OUT.

BY DARIUS BLACKBURN.

"DID I ever tell you about that curious murder in Bermondsey, and how I found out all about it—ay, and nabbed the criminals into the bargain?"

"No," replied I; "but 'twas a singular affair, so far as I am acquainted with the particulars."

"I should say it was—much more curious than half the stories you read in papers and magazines. Lord bless you, sir! we detectives see so many things in our line of business, that we could furnish a dozen story-tellers with better materials than they could trump up, if they harassed their brains till doomsday."

"No doubt," I observed; "but suppose we have these glasses filled—and then, perhaps, you'll tell me all about the matter. What will you take?"

"Well, sir, I'll have a little gin and water."

I've to see a lady respecting a jewel robbery, this evening, and so must not take anything stronger—d'ye see? But, Lor' bless you! there are times when I'm obliged to drink grog by the pailful. I've got to accommodate myself to all sorts of company."

The speaker was Mr. Digg, a member of the London detective force. Never mind how I got to know him; enough to say that we were on pretty intimate terms, and that we were cosily sitting together in my apartment at the Golden Cross—Charing Cross. Mr. Digg was a middle-sized, sharp-faced man, with a keen gray eye that seemed to take in everything at a glance. Nothing was too small to escape his notice, and no Indian ever surpassed him in the perseverance and certainty with which he would follow up a trail when he had once "struck" it.

"One morning," said the detective, "just as I was about sitting down to an early breakfast, congratulating myself on having a day of rest—for I had only come home from the North the evening before—a messenger from the chief of our division walked into my room, and said I was wanted immediately at head quarters.

"Do you know what's up, Grawler?" I asked; for Grawler was a special messenger, and in most of the secrets of our department.

"It's about O'Connor," he replied, sententiously; "those Bermondsey birds have flown."

"That's just what I expected. Tell Mr. File that I'll be with him in half an hour—stay, I'll go with you, Grawler!" And off I went.

"My wife was too much used to this sort of thing, to express surprise or disappointment; besides, it was all in the way of business, and business that paid well, too.

"Some six weeks before, a Mr. Patrick O'Connor, who was employed as a custom-house officer in the London Docks, was suddenly sen est. He was a man of some fifty-two or three years of age, and of penurious habits. He had therefore acquired considerable property, which was invested in stocks and bonds; and being a bachelor, he lived by himself, in a single room, at the eastern part of the metropolis. Here he was often visited by a Mrs. Manning, a Swiss by birth, a dashing, showy woman—the wife of a man who had formerly been a large hotel keeper in the west of England. Manning and his wife resided in a small house in Bermondsey, some four miles from O'Connor's lodgings, and there the latter often visited them—people said for the purpose of seeing the lady—indeed, no one doubted that an improper intimacy existed between them, and that Mr. Manning himself was privy to it.

"The day Mr. O'Connor was missed, he told his landlady that he was going to dine from home, but did not say where. He left his lodgings at about four in the afternoon, and not returning that night, or the next day, alarm was excited. A week passed, and a reward was offered for his discovery, dead or alive; but not the slightest trace of him could be discovered.

"The matter was placed in my hands when a fortnight had elapsed without any tidings of the missing man. I visited his lodgings, and examined everything and everybody, but could discover no clue. His drawers and boxes were all fastened with patent locks, and there was not the slightest appearance of their having been tampered with; so it was not deemed necessary to open and examine their interiors. Indeed, had I done so, not knowing what they usually contained, I could not tell what might have been abstracted. My next step was to find out what places O'Connor was in the habit of frequenting. He was too stingy to drink; so he was not likely to visit public houses. He did not care for amusements—in short, he never expended a penny for anything unnecessary. So said Mrs. Towler, his landlady, who had, however, a great respect for her lodger, who was, she said, 'the most punctil gentleman as she iver seed. His rent was always paid to the day, sir—yes, I might say to the minnit. And as for giving away anything, sir,' she added, 'Lord bless yer, I niver know'd him part with the vally of a brass farden—yes, I remember he did make a present, once, to that nasty trollop, of a black satin gownd.'

"I pricked up my ears at that, but said nothing.

"A great brazen-faced creetur,' went on the indignant Mrs. Towler; 'the only fault poor O'Connor had was being too fond of her, and she a married woman. Why, she was here the very day as Mr. O'Connor was missed—not an hour after he went out of the house.'

"O ho!" thought I; 'it is possible that this woman may be in some way or other mixed up in the matter. It will do no harm to see her, at all events.'

"So ascertaining her address, I at once went off to Bermondsey, which is a great district of the metropolis, not far from London bridge. This, let it be remembered, was about a week after O'Connor was first missing.

"I found the house of Mrs. Manning without difficulty. It stood in about the centre of a small row of some twelve or fourteen, all similar to it in appearance. It was only two stories high, with a basement. In front, was a small, neatly-furnished parlor; behind it, a back parlor, looking into a garden; and up stairs, were two bed-rooms. The basement consisted of a front and a back kitchen, which were both reached by a flight of stairs leading from the entrance passage. The back kitchen was furnished as a sort of half-parlor, and in it, when they had no company, Mr. and Mrs. Manning took their meals.

"In fact, they were dining in this particular apartment when I paid my first visit to them—or rather we, for I took Mr. Grawler with me for the sake of company. The front door was opened by a tall, fine, rather foreign-looking woman, who on my saying that I had called to make some inquiries about Mr. O'Connor, invited me, in a slightly foreign accent, to enter. She led us along the passage to the staircase, and we followed her into the back kitchen, in the centre of which was a table, with a fine roast goose thereon, and a gentleman, whom she introduced to me as her husband, busy picking a merry-thought.

"Begging her to resume her seat and continue her meal, which she did, I took a chair near the fire, refusing, as did Grawler, to join them in despatching the goose. I thought Grawler looked very anxious to partake of one of the drumsticks, but he quietly followed my example and declined.

"'Poor dear Mr. O'Connor!' said Mrs. Manning, applying her white cambric handkerchief to the corner of her eye. 'He was to have dined with us the very day he went off. We waited dinner for him till seven o'clock, and then I went in a carriage to his lodgings to see what had become of him.'

"And have you any idea, madam, where he went off to?" I inquired.

"Not the least, sir; it's a most mysterious affair. But he was an eccentric creature, and had some relations in Ireland. Maybe he's gone there!'

"I'll bet ten pounds he has!" said Mr. Manning, speaking for almost the first time.

"He was a rakish-looking man, with a broad, open, fair-complexioned face, and flaxen, curly hair—what some women would call good-looking, but with what I called a weak expression. In this, he was the very opposite of his wife, who had a bold, determined face; indeed, altogether she resembled, as I afterwards thought, a Lady Macbeth in present life.

"He was a particular friend of yours, madam?" I asked, quietly.

"I glanced at Manning, and saw that he winced. She, however, looked me boldly in the face, and said:

"'Yes, a particular friend of ours; and we feel very uneasy respecting him.'

"'No doubt of it, ma'am,' I said; but I did not at that time know how near I was to the truth, nor the particular sort of uneasiness she experienced.

"After a little more talk, Grawler and I left. Pretending to want to make a short cut, I asked permission to go out through the back door of the garden. Mr. Manning led the way cheerfully, and I purposely delayed for a few moments, asking some useless questions. My real object was to see if there was any appearance of the ground having been disturbed; but no! it had evidently been as it was for months. The place was utterly neglected, and overgrown with weeds. There were plenty of empty beer and porter bottles, but no flowers. A glance at Mr. Manning's eyes told me plainly enough who had consumed the contents of those vessels. He had evidently, too, been drinking something much stronger than beer, of late, for his hand was tremulous, and his eye had that glaring expression which ardent spirits alone causes.

"'There's a petticoat at the bottom of this business,' I said to my wife, when I returned home. 'I'll bet my life of it, though I can't see anything clear as yet.'

"Mrs. Digg looked daggers at me and said:

"'Men always supposed women were at the end of all mischief. I wonder you ever ventured to marry one,' she added.

"'There are exceptions to every rule, my dear,' I observed. And what with a kiss, and a little soft sawder, I made all things smooth again.

"Now when Grawler came in while we were at breakfast, as I have told you, and said the Bermondsey birds had flown, I looked triumphantly at Mrs. Digg; for I was sure I had got some sort of a clue of which Mrs. Manning was one end. She, however, merely lifted her head, as much as to say, 'you're a mighty cute fellow, in your own opinion!' I didn't stay to argue the point with her, but putting on a suit of plain clothes, started for head quarters.'

"'Digg,' said Mr. File, on my arrival (Mr. File was our superior in office—and a deep file he was, I can tell you), 'Digg, here's as pretty a job for you as you could take in hand. The Mannings have gone off suddenly, leaving their house shut up, without saying anything to anybody, and no one knows where to. We must know, however, and you must find out. In two hours' time, a large reward for the discovery of O'Connor will be offered; but the first thing to do, is to go with Grawler and search the house, and leave a guard of three policemen there, and the next thing to be done, is to search O'Connor's lodgings thoroughly for letters and papers, or for any traces of this mysterious matter. There's now no doubt that the Mannings know something about the affair; for, if they were not implicated, why this mysterious departure? However, the matter is now placed in your hands, and I need not say if you succeed in your investigation, you will be well rewarded. Here are the search-warrants; so now be off without loss of time.' And Mr. File bowed me out.'

"'Now, Grawler,' said I, 'that these people are off, there's no doubt; but that they have both gone in the same direction, is by no means probable. Together, they could scarcely fail to be recognized; apart, they might avoid being known. Now go at once and telegraph to all the sea-ports marked in this card these descriptions, which I have written out, of their persons, and then we'll take Bloker and Sawbridge and go down to the Bermondsey house. Meet me at my house in two hours from now, without fail.'

"When we got to the late residence of the Mannings, we learned from the neighbors that the pair had suddenly departed the night before, their flight having been discovered by the man who brought their milk in the morning. We soon opened the front door, and excluding the curious mob which had now gathered, commenced a still more careful survey of the premises than had yet been made.

"Up stairs and down stairs, from the cellar to the garret, in cupboards and under staircases, beneath the roof, and in out-houses—in short, everywhere we searched, but found nothing. The furniture remained just as the owners had left it, and as though they might soon return to use it once more. All looked natural, and only the absence of the tenants was suspicious. In short, having found nothing, we went away to search Mr. O'Connor's room.

"On opening his drawers and chests, nothing that we could see had been disturbed; his clothes lay all in order, his account-books were undisturbed, and with the exception that no money was found, there was nothing whatever to lead me to suppose that he had been robbed. All at once I remembered Mrs. Towler had told me that Mrs. Manning had been there on the day O'Connor went away, and I once more questioned her.

"'Mrs. Towler, when did you last see Mrs. Manning?'

"'She came here the evening of the day Mr. O'Connor left; and when I told her he was from home, she said she would, as she usually did on such occasions, wait in his room and see if he would arrive soon. She staid by herself for an hour or more, and then rang the bell. I answered it, and found her sitting by the fire. She said she would not wait any longer, but asked me to beg Mr. O'Connor to call on her to-morrow, as she was very uneasy, he having promised to dine with her that day, but had failed to keep his appointment. She then went away.'

"Here was a hint, at least. Mrs. Manning had held possession of the room for an hour, and no money nor securities—and it was known O'Connor held many of the latter—were to be found. I turned the matter over and over in my head, and that night but little sleep visited my pillow.

"Upon what trifles important events sometimes hinge. That evening, when I returned home, weary and disappointed, I flung myself on the sofa; and as my wife had been perusing Bulwer's novel of Eugene Aram—indeed, had it at the moment in her hand—I asked her to divert my thoughts a little by reading a few pages aloud. It chanced to be that part where the bones of Clark were discovered in St. Robert's Cave, where they had been buried.

"By Jove!" I exclaimed, a sudden idea striking me; 'we never digged in the garden. I'll try that the first thing in the morning.'

"And sending to Grawler and the two other men to be at my house by seven o'clock, I retired for the night, but as I have intimated, not to sleep.

"As soon as the men came next morning, we were off once more to the house at Bermondsey, which had been carefully watched night and day ever since the departure of the Mannings. We commenced the search, and dug every foot of the garden over; but not a trace of anything suspicious. In one corner were some pieces of unslacked lime, but at the time so ordinary a matter did not excite any attention. Grawler, however, looked about to see if any building had been going on, but could observe no traces of brick or stone. He had been once a working mason, and the idea of looking for such things was natural enough to him. Now, strange as it may seem, those few broken bits of quicklime led to a very important discovery,

"Men in our business are constantly on the look-out for what other people might consider as mere trifles; but trifles put and fitted together, become great matters now and then. Grawler, though he would have been a fool at book learning, had a mighty active and practical mind of his own; and though he said nothing, that lime haunted him, as he afterwards said. He couldn't tell why, but he felt sure it meant something; and as you will presently see, it did.

"We determined to make another search over the house, and commenced with the basement. Grawler looked up the chimneys to see if they had been repaired; but no. Then we threw open the shutters and examined the walls minutely, to see if there were blood marks, or traces of struggles; but, Lord bless you! the 'Happy Family' itself may have lived there, for anything we found to the contrary. Then we went up stairs, and in brief, we searched and searched until we all agreed that nothing more was to be discovered, and that we might as well give it over.

"We were just leaving the basement, having gone down stairs to close the shutters, when I happened to say:

"Well, Grawler, I shouldn't mind a slice of a goose now, like that which Mr. and Mrs. Manning was picking, when we called here, you remember.'

"Remember! Of course I do. He sat here, and she opposite to him; and hang me if there aint some of the gravy marks on the stone floor now!

"What! are you going to lick it up?' I said, as Grawler went suddenly down on his knees and put his nose close to the square stone flags.

"It aint gravy,' observed Grawler, quietly, as he took from his pocket a pen-knife and inserted the blade between the interstices of two large square flat stones. 'It aint grease, it's soft mortar; and that accounts for the lime!'

"He jumped up, like a man mad with excitement, and called for a crowbar.

"No mason ever laid this!' he said, as he raised the flag stone with the powerful implement. 'Look here! a man who's used to this sort of business would only put mortar round the edges; here is a thick bed of fresh mortar all under the stone.'

"It was so. Grawler's keen eye had seen the dark line between the flags, the cement not having dried—the mark which I had mistaken for a gravy streak. He fairly had the laugh of me.

"We quickly and cautiously dug down for three feet, and then came to a button and some bits of cloth. On removing another foot of earth, there, sure enough, was the body of Mr. O'Connor doubled up, with a great hole in his skull, made evidently by a ball. The weapon, whatever it was, must have been fired close to his head, for his gray hair and whiskers were singed by the explosion.

"It was no wonder Mrs. Manning should have said she was very uneasy respecting Mr. O'Connor, when I saw her and her husband eating roast goose over the grave their murderous hands had dug for him.

"The murder was now literally out; the body was identified, as was Dr. Parkman's in Boston, partly by some artificial teeth, and a reward of five hundred pounds offered for the arrest of the Mannings.

"Three days after the reward had been offered, intelligence was telegraphed from Edinburgh that a Mrs. Smith had disposed of certain railway scrip to a broker there, and was to call on the said broker with some more. She answered to Mrs. Manning's description. That night I went to Scotland, and by next day, at noon, Mrs. Manning was on her way back to London under my care. She asserted that her husband had done the deed, and compelled her to act as an accessory after the fact. Of course, I didn't believe that.

"A fortnight elapsed, and Mr. Manning managed to elude all our vigilance, though the reward was doubled. One evening, the post brought me a letter from a young woman, who described herself as a governess. She said she had known Manning when he kept a tavern in the west of England, and had seen him, or some one very much like him, on board a steamboat which plied between Southampton and Jersey—one of the group of Channel Islands between England and France. She had accosted him, but he had denied his being the man she took him for; but spite of his false whiskers and wig, she had no doubt he was the individual.

"On this hint, I acted. Taking Grawler with me, we went down in the night train to Southampton, and caught the morning boat for Jersey. Of course, we were disguised—I as a sporting gent, and Grawler as my livery servant.

"Arrived at Jersey, we kept our eyes open, I assure you. We soon became certain our man was not at the hotel, and next turned our attention to the lodging houses. With gun on shoulder, and a fine brace of dogs, Grawler and I strolled about, looking for other game than people supposed, but all to no purpose; no Mr. Manning was visible, and we, of course, did not inquire for him.

"'It's no go,' I said to Grawler; 'we may as well go back in the next boat. By George! how thirsty this sport makes a fellow. Suppose we call at this cottage, and get a drink! Every one keeps good French brandy in Jersey, where it isn't taxed.

"'It is capital tippie,' I said to the woman who provided us with the liquor; 'I never tasted better. I suppose that plenty of it is drank hereabouts.'

"'Yes; but mostly by strangers,' replied the woman. 'Why, there's a gentleman lodging over at Mrs. Bowlegs who takes a matter of a bottle full a day! He has his liquor, they say, in his bed-room, and never goes out at all. They assert he's half crazy, already!'

"'Visit a fashionable watering-place and never go out!' I thought. 'That's strange! And then perpetually drinking! That's strange, too! Remorse, perhaps.'

"I made some cautious inquiries of different people, and little by little wormed out that the stranger, whoever he was, was well armed; that he never ventured to the hotel, nor the pier; and that he always kept his room door locked, only unfastening it to take in his supplies of brandy. He even made his own bed and emptied his own slops.

"I found out, also, that he sent the last thing in the evening his bottle to be filled for the night's supply—the messenger being a little girl. My object was to intercept this child, and learn all I could. I did so; and without being suspected, ferreted out enough to make me certain the man was the person I sought, and I took measures accordingly.

"The next night, having secured the assistance of the local police, Grawler and I, with two other men, went well armed to the house where he lodged. The woman of the house was retained in our interest. Our plan was to conceal ourselves in the dark passage outside his room, and when the girl came back with the bottle of liquor, to burst in upon him suddenly when he might be off his guard.

"That night, however, half insensible and in fancied security, he did not open the door himself, but cried, 'come in!' when the girl rapped. She entered, and so did we. The moment I got inside, I saw him lying on the bed with his back towards me. In a second I had leaped on him, clasped him in my arms as in a vice, and Grawler clapped the handcuffs on his wrists before one could say 'Jack Robinson.'

"I never saw a man so cowed in all my life. He literally whimpered; and instead of showing a bold and defiant front like his wife, he snivelled and swore that she did the deed, and threatened to serve him the same, if he didn't aid her in disposing of the body.

"The facts of the case came out afterwards. When O'Connor arrived at the house of the murderess to dinner, Mrs. Manning persuaded him to go out into the basement to wash his hands. She followed him, and shot him from behind as he descended. Her husband and herself had previously dug the grave in which we found him. The moment he was dead, she rifled his pocket of his keys and went off to his lodgings, where, being left alone, she opened his drawers and stole all the money and securities they contained. She then returned to the house, and found her husband in the garden, smoking; he had not dared to stay alone in the house with the corpse. Together they buried the poor victim—and the rest, you know.

"Well, sir, the precious pair were tried and sentenced to be hanged. On their way to the gallows, in consequence of some repairs in the principal corridor of the prison, the procession was compelled to take a round-about way and pass through the prison yard. In that yard, their grave was dug; but that fact had escaped the notice of the prison officers. When the Mannings, husband and wife, came to their ready-made grave, a plank was thrown across it for them to pass over on; and I saw them give each other a look full of terrible meaning for me. You see, sir, they ate and drank over their victim's grave, and now they were obliged to walk over their own! Curious—wasn't it, sir? And another singular thing was, she was hanged in the very black satin gown which Mr. O'Connor had given to her."

RAPIDITY OF THOUGHT IN DREAMING.

A very remarkable circumstance, and an important point of analogy, is to be found in the extreme rapidity with which the mental operations are performed, or rather with which the material changes on which the ideas depend are excited in hemispherical ganglia. It would appear as if a whole series of acts, that would really occupy a long lapse of time, pass ideally through the mind in one instant. We have in dreams no true perception of the lapse of time—a strange property of mind! for if such be also its property when entered into the eternal disembodied state, time will appear to us eternity. The relations of space, as well as time, are also annihilated; so that almost while an eternity is compressed into a moment, infinite space is traversed more swiftly than by real thought. There are numerous illustrations of this on record. A gentleman dreamed that he had enlisted as a soldier, joined his regiment, deserted, was apprehended, carried back, tried, condemned to be shot, and at last led out for execution. After the usual preparations, a gun was fired; he awoke with the report, and found that a noise in the adjoining room had, at the same moment, produced the dream and awakened him. A friend of Dr. Abercrombie dreamed that he crossed the Atlantic, and spent a fortnight in America. In embarking on his return, he fell into the sea, and awaking in the fright, found that he had not been in bed ten minutes.—Reynold's Miscellany.

ROBIN REDBREAST AT THE CRUCIFIXION.

BY ELIZABETH BOYTON.

["There is a superstition current in Brittany that when our Saviour was bearing his cross, a robin took one thorn from his crown, which stained its breast, and since that time the redbreast has been the friend and favorite of men."]

Up Mount Calvary's height ascending, Tolled the Man of sorrows on,
Doomed to die for man's transgression,
He, God's sinless, only Son.

On that brow guilt never clouded,
A crown of thorns he meekly wore,
While like ruby dewdrops gathered
Round each point the crimson gore.

Fainting 'neath the cross his burden,
From his lips no accents flow,
Save, "Forgive them, Heavenly Father,
For they know not what they do."

All unmoved, God's chosen people
Heard the meek, forgiving word,
And no throb of human pity
In their stony bosoms stirred.

But a wild bird o'er them flying,
Caught the plaintive, pleading tone,
And one thorn plucked from his forehead,
As if to shame man's heart of stone.

From its tiny beak descending
Touched the point its little breast,
And upon the glossy plumage
Its own crimson hue impressed.

And still that sanguinary color
Dyes the bosom of the bird,
And still near the homes of Christians
Are its sweetest warblings heard.

DELPHINE.

BY H. C. BENNETT.

THE fresh morning breeze of early March came sweeping across my cheek from the wide sea, as I stood on the little bridge spanning the narrow channel which separates Rockcastle from Edgcombe, waiting for the stage, or rather for the huge, lumbering wagon that passed for one. The roads were free from snow, for the March winds had blown over them, and they lay in that dry and dusty state when every breeze sends a shower of earthly particles sharply to your face and eyes, grinding as it were the whole surface of the skin, and making a toilet powder not quite so pleasant or so odorous as Rimmel's.

But if the snow had forsaken the roads, it still lay nestled in the hollows, and from its edges, came up the tiny pink flowers of the trailing arbutus, that sweetest of all spring's daughters.

I heard the heavy wagon lumbering round the last turn in the road, but I staid to gather the arbutus, drawing it as gently as I might, from its thin, crisp covering of ice, through which the long, lithe stems had forced their way, and lay in clusters along the edges. A little farther on, one or two venturous blossoms of the sanguinaria were folded, each within its own blanket-like leaf; and those too I relentlessly plucked, although I knew that the delicate things must die in my hands.

There was a broad streak of crimson in the sky, reflected in the quiet sea, now gradually breaking up and floating off into fragments of light purple, and again into the delicate pink that makes the rare beauty of the sea shell. The blue smoke from the scattered chimneys was rising upwards like thin veils, and, catching the tint of the rosy clouds, seemed as incense from earth to sky; and then like a giant, refreshed from his slumber, came to the broad glory of the sun.

Sun, ocean, earth, sky! Involuntarily I took off my hat and bowed my head before their splendors, as one would do before the gates of the Beautiful City; but before I could replace it, the wheels stopped close beside me, and throwing my valise to the driver, I entered the close, dark wagon, with my rifled treasures in my hand. I sat for some time arranging them, and admiring their drooping clusters, paying but little attention to my fellow-passengers, of whom there were two or three, all closely wrapped and veiled; one of them was sleeping too, if I might judge by the heavy breathing that came to my ear from the farthest corner of the vehicle. Sleeping, with this glory of the rising sun! No doubt this man had walked miles, at some time in his life, to witness the mimic splendors of pyrotechnic art; but the grand spectacle which God prepares afresh each morning, had no charm for his dull eye.

By his side sat a lady, through whose thick veil I could distinguish nothing but the subdued sparkle of an eye which I felt bound to believe was beautiful, until I should find it otherwise. She was closely wrapped in soft furs, and only one hand was visible, peeping from the large sable cuff. The hand was far from being so small as the hands of heroines invariably are described. On the contrary, it was somewhat larger than the average size, but it was fair and white, and the nails were beautifully pink-hued, and almond shaped. I might have passed by a thousand hands, smaller, and as beautiful as this, without noticing them in the least; but as this was the most agreeable object inside the coach, and as the glare of the sunlight on the snow-covered hills rendered it unpleasant to look out of the dust-stained windows of the stage, I preferred to keep on gazing.

It was the left hand, and it bore no ring, so I inferred that the lady was unmarried; and her pure white hand told me too that she was young. No delicacy of treatment can preserve or bring back the fresh young whiteness of the youthful skin, any more than the bloom can be brought back to that shining bunch of grapes, from which you, my unwise friend, have just rubbed the crowning beauty which God's own hand scattered on their purple glory. Quietly, through our long, dusty ride, the lady sat, with the delicate hand half buried in the soft fur that warmed her. Not a word was spoken, nor did her next neighbor awake from his slumber until the stage drew up at Edgecombe, where I had business to perform which would probably detain me some days. I hoped that the unknown would remain there too; but when I crossed the tavern yard, I saw that she had not alighted. I was half tempted to get in, and see her to the end of her journey; but I could not work up to that pitch of enthusiasm for a lady of whom I had yet seen nothing but her hand, lovely, and happily unjewelled as it was.

So I went straight to the merchant whom I wished to see at Edgecombe. He was a man, who, in former days had had some experience in commercial affairs, but who, in the terrible crash of 1837, was stripped of all his possessions, and since confined himself wholly to the smaller gains which he could reap from the coasting and fishing trade. Through these he had gradually worked up again, with some loss of ambition, but none of self-respect, to a comfortable business, and I had supposed he would never venture upon anything more full of risk. I was therefore surprised when he met me with a more cordial grasp than his usually quiet one, and said:

"I have bought a ship, Mr. Crawford."

"Indeed, sir," I said, "I am glad to hear it, as it is a token of increased prosperity."

"Perhaps not; but at any rate I am going to try it, and what is more, I am about to offer you the situation of supercargo to London and Havre; while I place my own son in the rank of captain, which is a sufficient responsibility for one of his youth. I will not burden him too greatly on his first voyage as commander. Will you go?"

"Certainly, Mr. Grainger, and with a grateful heart too, for times are dull with me now, and I am not willing, at my age, to be unemployed a moment. When do we sail?"

"As soon as the cargo is all stowed. Probably in three days. You, however, will have time to arrange everything, as you are so methodical; and you will come to me on Thursday evening, and I will give you full instructions, and explain them verbally. It is short notice, I know, but the voyage was planned, and the ship half loaded when I bought her. It was a forced sale, to pay up debts of an enormous amount. I pitied the poor merchant, for I have been there myself. Come on board with me."

I went. It was a noble vessel, nearly new; had been at sea just long enough to get well bent, and was in fine trim in every part.

"There will be a passenger for this stateroom," said Mr. Grainger, throwing open a door which showed a fine, airy berth, and appointments of the nicest order. In fact, the whole ship exhibited a degree of neatness quite equal to that of a first class government vessel.

I had some little acquaintance with young Henry Grainger, who was to command the ship, and at dinner we improved it into a mutual liking; and greatly pleased at the transactions of the day, I cheerfully entered the stage, and returned to Rockcastle that night.

My sister Emma cried, and my mother looked grave, and both declared that they could not get my "traps" ready; but I soon lectured them into a sense of the good fortune which awaited me. Parting would be parting, and nothing else, if we waited longer for it; and the sooner I was afloat, the sooner I would see them again.

They could not gainsay this magnificent display of my logic, and they contented themselves with getting together an unheard of quantity of cake, and preserves, and all those little niceties with which careful mothers and sisters seek to pamper the incipient sailor. And on Thursday, as I had agreed with Mr. Grainger, I set off for Edgecomb, bidding the dear ones at home an affectionate good-by. As we wound the hill at Rockcastle, I saw Emma's green dress, as she stood looking after the stage which held her only brother; and I sighed to think how unprotected the poor girl would be, if the uncertain fortunes of the sea should find me a grave beneath its waters. The good and manly face of Henry Grainger arose to my mind, and I could not help wishing that such a protector as he, strong and upright in his noble manhood, could be her stay in life. Dear Emma, my wish was a prophetic one, after all; and to wish thee Henry Grainger's wife, was only another name for happiness.

We sailed on the 10th of March. The weather was beautiful. We had moonlight nights; and when once off from the coast, were in comparatively warm waters. The change from our proverbially trying winds, was pleasant to us all. All, I mean, who met together, for there was one whose face we had not yet seen, and who lay in the best stateroom, as was reported to us, in all the horrors of sea sickness.

"He ought to be brought on deck," said I. "This beautiful sea air would restore him, I have no doubt."

Captain Grainger showed his white teeth, and that irresistible smile which made him at those times the handsomest of men.

"He," said he, emphasising the pronoun, "is wholly unable to be removed."

I was called away by an observation from the first mate, and the thought of the sick passenger, I take shame to myself for forgetting him, did not occur to me for some days. I caught a glance after that, of a figure lying on a rude litter which the sailors had brought on deck, and imagining that it was the sick man, I considered that he would be too weak to talk, and purposely avoided going near him. When I went on deck after dinner, the litter and passenger had alike disappeared.

One day the strong air from the stateroom window forced open the door. I was passing at the time, and saw, as I supposed, our hitherto invisible passenger, absolutely covered up from head to foot in bed, with the exception of one hand which lay outside the quilt, and vied with its snowy folds in whiteness.

"He must be very young—a mere boy," I said to myself. And I approached the bed to give him some assurance of my good will.

A dark blue gauze, which had been suspended over the bed, had been drawn around his head and face, and by the breathing, I thought he must be sleeping. Again I glanced at the hand. There it lay in its unsunned whiteness, and I could have sworn that it was the same hand that I saw in the stage between Rockcastle and Edgecomb, three weeks before. That hand could belong to no one but a lady; and I escaped from the state-room, and shut to the door with a feeling as if I had committed sacrilege. I encountered Captain Grainger in the passage way; and he rallied me on the startled look which I gave when coming unexpectedly against him.

"Have you seen a ghost, Mr. Crawford? The sailors have a notion that this ship is a haunted one, but I did not know that the superstition extended to you."

"I believe it is haunted," I replied, "and I am going to write it in my log-book, that the good ship Metamora was haunted by a human hand."

"What on earth do you mean, Mr. Crawford?" asked Captain Grainger, looking at me anxiously, as if to ascertain whether I were quite right in my upper regions.

"I mean that I am haunted here on board this ship at noon-day, on the broad bosom of the Atlantic, by a human hand; and moreover, it is the same hand that haunted me through an entire half day in the Rockcastle stage, at the very time of my engagement to sail in this ship. Put those two things together, captain, and see if you can bring them into your reckoning."

The captain smiled again, the rich, open smile that lighted up his dark, sea-browed visage like a sunbeam, and said:

"I was just going in to see my passenger; perhaps you would like to accompany me?"

"Not until I know who or what it is. Besides, captain, it is hardly fair to wake up the deep sleep which the ghost is at present enjoying."

"Ah, I see; this is your ghost, is it, Crawford? Well, I am happy to be able to state for your comfort, that it is one of the most harmless little spirits in the world; and when this trance is off, it will be up, and in the highest animation possible."

"You really believe so?"

"I do, indeed, Mr. Crawford. And now, spite of your feeling that it is unfair or indecorous, I am going in to wake up the ghost, and ask it to join us at tea."

"Heavens! do sea-ghosts drink tea?"

"This one does, for I have seen it."

But tea came, and no one but myself, the captain, and Mr. Richards, the mate, and young Fred Spanlding, the second officer. Captain Grainger made no allusion to our conversation, and so neither did I venture upon it. I knew no more during the entire passage to London, than I did that night. A figure in a variety of endless wrappings and muffings, was carried on shore and placed in a carriage, and as it was chiefly done when I was engaged, I had no chance to renew the brief glance which I had of it at the beginning of its removal.

But one thing was certain, I heard the direction to the cab-driver, and kept it in my mind. There was growing up within me an instinctive aversion to mentioning anything of the mysterious stranger, whom our ship was thus carrying to English shores, in the presence of Captain Grainger, in whose eyes there was a lurking fun that I believed grew out of the ghost story. I know not what there was to make me feel embarrassed about it, but there was really a sensation of vexedness about it that disturbed my self-complacency. I am not sure that I did not feel somewhat defrauded out of my share of the mysterious passenger's society during the voyage, and that I had not a bit of a grudge against Captain Grainger, for abetting therein.

Our ship was quickly unloaded, and our freight beginning to come in for Havre. Everything so far had gone off admirably during the voyage. Captain Grainger was a model commander, and I flattered myself that Mr. Crawford was his equal as a supercargo. I could fancy Mr. Grainger's pride in his son and in his ship, and I believed that he would also have some pride in his judgment for selecting me. At any rate he should have reason.

In London, I chanced to meet a friend—the son of an old neighbor at Rockcastle—and he volunteered to conduct me round the city. We crossed innumerable squares, lighted by a splendid moon, which shone brightly even in the smoky and dingy atmosphere of London; and at last, when our steps began to lag, my companion said:

"We are almost at the very house where a cousin of mine is staying; I would like much to stop there awhile, if you do not object."

I did not know the street, but permitted myself to be guided wholly by him; and he led me to the door of a handsome house, and soon found ourselves admitted, and shown into a pleasant and handsomely furnished parlor, where several ladies were employed in sewing. I was presented to the mother, a fine, cheerful old lady, her two married and one unmarried daughters, and to another lady who sat with a fire-screen before her face, and a short, black veil falling also around it.

She did not remove the screen sufficiently to give me a glance at her face; but I saw her hand as it held the screen, and it was the ghost's hand—to make an Irish blunder—the ghost's hand to the life! We passed half an hour in this bright, cheerful English room, and then took our leave—I, impatient to question Austin about her.

"That lady is the very cousin whom I called to see, Crawford," said Austin, "and only a glance from her eye, imploring me to take no notice of her, kept me from keeping you close at her side; for I think you would enjoy her society, as she is eminently intelligent and interesting."

"Is she an English woman?"

"No; and by the by, you must have known her at home."

"I did not catch the name."

"Rochdale. Why, she visits often in Rockcastle, and Edgcombe also."

"Is she handsome?"

"She is under a cloud just now, which has threatened to destroy her beauty altogether. I may as well tell you, Crawford, although she binds me to silence. She unfortunately caught the small pox in going from Rockcastle to New York. She was miserably disfigured, as she tells me, and has never shown her face since. She is young, wealthy, talented, and this misfortune has given her much pain. She thinks her friends will be disgusted with her, and will not unveil to any one."

"How did she come here?"

"In the ship Metamora."

"I thought so. I came with her."

"You, Crawford?"

"I did, but my only recognition of her was of her hand."

"Ay, that is a study, is it not?"

"It is, and I regret that I cannot see her face."

"Well she goes to Havre with you, and she may possibly get over her sensitiveness about it before you arrive home. It is a whim which she is rich enough and independent enough to gratify, and she will probably carry it out. She says that she is glad of it on one account, that now she will be able to know her true friends."

"I suppose she means those of our sex. Those of the other will be more likely to value her higher than before, if she has lost her beauty."

"Perhaps so. When do you sail?"

"On Tuesday. Come on board to dinner with us."

"Thank you, I will do so; and moreover, I will try to effect an acquaintance between you and Delphine. I cannot help thinking that you will be mutually pleased with each other."

He kept his word—and between London and Havre, I learned what a truly noble and gifted being was Delphine Rochdale, although during that time I never saw her face. I implored her to let me look at her, but her pain was so evident that I forbore asking her again. But whatever were the incidental defects of her face, her mind was brilliant "beyond compare." With an intellect so highly cultivated, a heart full of the noblest and tenderest emotions, a grace and dignity which only fell short of being regal because it was so surpassingly sweet and gentle, Delphine could not have failed of being loved, even if her face were disfigured.

We were going into Havre, and Delphine and myself stood together on the deck. You may not believe that I was so infatuated as to offer my heart and hand thus blindly; but indeed I had done so, and she had accepted, on conditions that on our arrival home, she should allow me to behold her face, and if I were not irremediably shocked, she would consent to become Mrs. Crawford, the wife of a poor fellow like myself, with a mother and sister on his hands, whom he would never desert, not even for a wife.

The ship was rapidly nearing the port, and we were admiring the city from that point of view, when the wind which had been still until now, suddenly sprang up to a fresh, free breeze, carrying all loose, unprotected articles sweeping past the deck into the water, and among these, was Delphine's veil. I expected she would faint, but she turned her calm, meek eyes upward to my face, as if to deprecate any criticism of her own. I gazed at her in amazement. A few, a very few scars, already whitened and beginning to be smooth, were slightly visible on a countenance which, for shape and nobleness of brow, could be rarely surpassed. The complexion, it is true, was slightly injured; but what variation of color or of texture could destroy the beautiful expression?

"And this is the face which you have withheld from my gaze?" I said reproachfully, as a blush rose to its pale surface, and the eyes, so full of tenderness, absolutely sparkled with joy.

"Forgive me if I taxed you too severely," she said, at last. "From my earliest years, I have heard nothing but praises of my beauty, until I was absolutely glad when the disorder that spoiled it, attacked me. I wished to be loved for other qualities than the mere 'tincture of a skin;' and yet—and yet, I was a woman, and when I first looked at myself in the mirror, I confess to a certain degree of horror which I have not yet been quite able to quell."

We were married on board ship, by the only Protestant clergyman whom we could muster, and I carried home a new daughter and sister to my mother and Emma; and it was not long before Henry Grainger came to believe also in the attraction of souls, and straightway his own and Emma's were bleomed in one.

My own Delphine, won without being seen, but still more truly known and loved without the intervention of the visible! There is no shadow between us now, no darkness, no mystery. Our love came unsought, unmet, and it abides with us still. Loving, hoping, trusting, we shall walk together to the shores of that vast ocean, where we must separate for a little while, only to meet again in perfect, immortal, undying love.

As long as a man has six dollars a week, he can live and get along rather quietly and contented; but as soon as his wages reach twelve dollars a week, he needs twenty-four, runs in debt, and "busts up" at that. Man is a high-pressure engine, vanity is the steam, money the fuel; apply the principle, and you have the facts. Make a note on't.

MY FRIEND.

BY JAMES W. HILFURN.

A youth, graceful and fair,
 With lovely brown hair,
 And eyes of heaven's own blue;
 A dimpled chin,
 A clear white skin,
 And teeth of a pearly hue—
 Such is the friend
 At whose shrine I bend,
 Offering bright friendship true.

STORY OF A SCULPTOR.

BY ARTHUR C. BLISS.

Just where the hills of Asolano sink into the plains of Treviso, lying on the lowest slope, and nestling in under the shadow of the higher hillsides, is the pretty town of Passagno. Just one hundred years ago, the first of November, there was joy and gladness in one of the picturesque and romantic old houses that gem that beautiful region. A child was born to the humble family which inhabited its quaint and homely apartments. It was the child of a simple stone-cutter, poor in the wealth of gold, but rich in that of honor and integrity.

Time passes on, unfeeling old wretch that he is! (it is a comfort that we can call him old, though he shakes his hour-glass in our faces the next minute.) He passes on, and in the short space of three years, that good and kind father who sang peans of praise and thanksgiving to Him who gave him this one little child, was suddenly taken away from the life which its music was making so beautiful to him, and, sadder still, the mother—she who had borne the infant on her bosom, and had seen how the father's heart was bound up in the new love which had thrilled through his whole being—she had gone away too. Not as the father had gone—but to the home of a new husband; and the only pledge of Pietro's love for her was thrown upon the care of his grandmother.

That grandmother—blessed be her memory!—was Caterina Cecatto; and the child, who but for her would have been doubly orphaned, was one whose name the world has since learned to speak only with veneration—Antonio Canova!

But Heaven was kind to the little Tonin; and in the full measure of love which the good grandmother bestowed upon him, he missed neither father nor mother. Even in infancy, before he could fully make them understand what he wanted, the little hands would eagerly catch at the fragments of wet clay which his grandfather, Pasino Canova, dropped from his modellings; and the slender fingers would mould them into actual forms, rude enough, of course, but still showing the genius that lay within the baby brain, waiting for that same old time (sometimes beneficent!) to develop it into maturity. So the boy grew up to his ninth year, every day working in the fragments of clay; every day learning something of the elements of that noble art which astonished the world in its grand creations of the Saint John, of the recumbent Magdalen, and of our own Washington; with others worthy to bear them company.

Soon the boy begins to work in marble—sculpturing a bust or figure—I am writing from memory, and cannot tell which—of his venerable grandmother, in the dress of the province; and in the very height of his after fame, this childish effort was affectionately preserved by him as a dear memorial of her who took such care of his infancy.

"What has Tonin been hiding himself away for, whenever I come into the house?" asked his grandfather one day, as the cheery old housewife spread the table for his dinner.

"Ah, thou wilt know sometime, Pasino; but at present it is a secret between him and me."

The old man looked fondly at her, as she moved briskly round, still graceful and beautiful in her green old age.

"A secret, my old Caterina! Well then, I may be sure that thou wilt tell me before long. Thy sex cannot keep them long."

But Caterina kept Tonin's mystery, until one day, with pride and satisfaction in her good, honest face, she beckoned her husband into a small room, which was called Tonin's work-room, and, drawing a curtain, she exhibited two shrines of Carrara marble, as the work of the nine year old artist. Surprise and delight kept the aged father silent, and Caterina stood by, thoroughly enjoying his eager gaze.

"God's blessing on the child!" he at length exclaimed, "he will be a great man."

"If our poor Pietro could but have seen this proof of his child's genius!" said Caterina, weeping.

"He does! depend on that," replied her husband, reverently. "Do you suppose that spirits cannot look down upon those they have loved on earth?"

"Ah, my God! I trust so!" was her fervent ejaculation, as she went to call Tonin to hear his grandfather's praises.

"Do you know that the Seigneur Falleri is to have a grand supper at his castle?" asked tonio of his grandfather, one morning, when the boy was busily engaged in moulding the figure of a lion, in the clay which was falling from the old man's bench.

"No, my son; I had not heard it before."

"Well, then, just look here, father. See this lion. Is it not a good one? Ah, you don't say, but you smile. That says it is very well for a little boy."

"Nay, it would be good in any one, Tonin. It is a real lion—well-proportioned, and very finely formed. What are you going to do with it?"

"I—I thought if mother would give me—what do you think?" asked the boy. "Some of the butter which she has been churning to-day from the goat's milk?"

"Butter? For what?"

"To make this figure for his table to-night. Wouldn't he like it?"

"You can try him. I will engage that you have the fresh butter."

The lion appeared at Seigneur Falieri's grand feast, and was much admired. The next day, the two Falieris, father and son, alighted at the door of Pasino Canova, and asked for Antonio.

"Should you like to have me send you to a person who would teach you an art you have begun so well, my boy?"

"I should, indeed," murmured Tonin.

"Well, if your grandparents do not object, I will engage him to take you immediately, and have no doubt you will do him credit."

This settled the fortunes of Antonio Canova. Next to Michael Angelo and Bernini, he ranks as forming a new epoch in Italian statuary; and of this fame, Falieri laid the first stone.

From that time he progressed rapidly, and statue after statue, group after group, came from his hands with that facility which can only be attained, when the works are appreciated, and the artist encouraged. If the good Caterina exulted when she saw her grandson's childish efforts, with what delight would she have gazed on those of his after life, when he challenged world-wide admiration. How her old heart would have beat at sight of the lovely Hebes and Pachyes, that softened the rage of the Jacobin mob, searching for his colossal statue of the king of Naples! Still more, perhaps, would she have loved to dwell with woman's tenderness, on that divine altar piece, painted (for Antonio was painter as well as sculptor) for his own village church in Passagno, where the dead Christ lies under the gaze of the mother, and the weeping Marys by her side.

Kind, good and benevolent, still Antonio had not felt the gentle influence of a warmer love than that of filial affection to the beloved woman who watched over his childhood. He, whose cunning hand wrought Pachye from the cold marble, held no warm, living Pachye in his heart. Loving all forms of beauty in the abstract, transferring them to canvass with all a lover's ardent heart, there was yet no tangible, living love, that could be said to rival his art. This was his mistress—his world.

At the time of his return to Passagno, he had been travelling in Germany with a Venetian prince. He was now forty-two years old, and from his calm temper and temperate life looking much younger. The mild benevolence of his nature shone through and irradiated his countenance; and the serenity of his features was such that he might have sat for the picture of the beloved disciple.

While painting in the Passagno church, whose romantic situation on the hillside of one of the Asolano group—the Venetian Alps, as they are called—he often prolonged his work, until the shadows of evening were fast shutting out even the subdued light by which he brought out the figures on the canvass. Here and there, a solitary image of a saint filled up its appropriate niche, showing ghastly and white in the approaching darkness. The short wintry twilight had faded too soon. A few moments more of light would have fixed an expression, which he might vainly seek for the next day.

He had seized a taper from the altar, and was about to put the brush to his work, when a deep sigh, which, in the stillness of the church, struck on his ear, that seemed to come from the recesses of a wounded heart. Believing it to be some poor penitent, who had chosen this silent hour to pray for pardon and acceptance, he abstained from looking round, or even moving, so that he might not interrupt the solemn service, which he imagined was being offered. But as he stood, silently awaiting the close of the service, a shadow projected on the wall by the altar, caught his eye, and he turned to see who thus intruded on his labors, and broken the spell which bound him to the painting so much longer than usual. It was a slight, frail figure that stood before him, and as the light flashed upon the face, he thought he had seen it before. Memory was busy with a scene in Florence, where he faintly remembered, some such face as this might have been, when not worn by suffering as now.

Gradually all the events of that night came back to him. A memory of a frantic father, a dying mother, and a sweet, suffering daughter, rose up before him. It was his own hand that had closed that mother's eyes, his own hand that had led away the maniac, and wiped the tears of the daughter. Afterwards, it was by his exertions that Armida Villetti, the last of a noble Florentine family, was admitted into a convent,—not as a nun—for that she refused to be, inexplicably to Antonio, who thought that one so desolate, might well become the bride of Heaven—but as a teacher of harp-music, in which she excelled. Satisfied that he had done well in thus placing her in safety, and absorbed in his art, Armida had passed out of his mind, except for some occasional likeness that he encountered sometimes, in the beautiful faces which he painted, or the heads that he sculptured, reminding him of the grace and loveliness of hers.

His first glance showed him now, a pale, worn face, with large, sorrowful eyes—so large indeed, that they seemed preternatural; a wasted figure, and hands, through which it seemed as if light would be visible, so thin and transparent they looked as she meekly crossed them on her bosom. He forgot the years that had elapsed since he left her in the convent—forgot that she had grown older, just as he had done; and with almost a paternal salutation, he said:

“My poor child! My little Armida! what have they done to you, that you look so desolate?”

The checked fountain of her tears flowed fast at the words of kindness. He took her hand, and led her out of the church, where the cold, bracing air revived her. The old sacristan came to close the doors of the church; and Antonio asked shelter for the stranger, in his dwelling near by, and after the evening refreshment had been taken, she explained why she was here. A continued series of threats and persecutions had been employed to press her into becoming a nun; her peculiar talent being very desirable to be retained in the convent permanently. Her repugnance to a religious life had been so strong, as to make this attempt at compulsion very hateful and abhorrent to her; while at the same time, the thought of her friendless and desolate state had made her almost frantic. She had heard nothing of her father for a long time, but had hoped that he would sometime recover, and return to her. Every ray of hope was however shut out by the news of his death; and, sick at heart, and feeble in frame, she had managed to escape, by snatching up the hooded cloak of one of her day pupils, and thus passing out without suspicion.

Probably there had not been much search for her, lest her disclosures might prejudice the public; so that she travelled at last, slowly and without fear. One man's fame had penetrated to the interior of that gloomy convent. His paintings hung on its walls; his statues adorned its gardens, and filled the niches in its chapel; and added to all this, he had once saved her from utter misery. To whom could she flee? Knowing nothing of the world, its forms or conventionalities, she saw no impropriety in seeking him; and step by step she had traced him hither; her own innocence, and his name upon her lips, equally protecting her from insult; and her sorrowful look engaging the compassion of the peasants, who readily supplied her with bread, wine and milk, and a night's rest, as she journeyed towards the Venetian territory.

Had Antonio possessed a romantic spirit, it might be recorded that he took the signorina for his bride; but such was his calm, gentle benevolence, that he seemed not to know that any emotion, save perhaps of gratitude, could be hidden beneath that fast restoring color, which he soon joyfully beheld tinging the cheeks of his “little nun,” as he called her. While he painted, she was almost constantly playing on the great organ in the church—sometimes softly, sometimes grandly, as suited her mood; his gentle, paternal manner towards her unconsciously tempering her ardent love for him, and subduing it to a deep reverence.

There was a marriage in the church one day, and Armida shrunk from the crowd, and took refuge beside her benefactor. The bride was young and pretty; the groom, at least, seventy. She looked at her diamonds—the baubles with which she was purchased—seemingly unconscious of the giver. It was the old story—so long known, and so often repeated, but still new and fresh as ever—of frozen winter and smiling spring—of December and May. Antonio turned his eyes away, and saw Armida's cheeks crimsoning with the flush of restored health. It seemed to him as if her lost youth had come back to her, so purely lovely had she become, since she had sheltered herself under his smile.

The crowd were just passing out of the church, and when the last footstep crossed the threshold, the painter took up his brush again.

“What a desecration!” he said at last, to Armida, who was musing thoughtfully. “I shall never marry,” he continued, softly speaking, as if to himself. “There are so many weddings, but so few marriages. I shall find mine in the other sphere, perhaps, but not here.”

Armida's sentence was contained in the above words; and she bore it nobly. If her love and grief did not all subside at once, it was soon mellowed into a tranquil peace, that made her worthy to become his bride in heaven.

When, fifteen years later, Pius VII. inscribed the name of Antonio Canova in the golden book of the capitol, declaring him to have "deserved well of the city of Rome," and bestowing upon him the marquisate of Ischia, and a pension of three thousand scudi, for restoring the works of art to Rome, there was one heart that beat with gladness that he was entering upon the last year of his threescore, with new honors and new prosperity. And when in a few more years, Venice mourned him, and both continents took up the wail for a great and good man departed, a woman—not sad or weeping, but with a look of inspiration upon the face that showed, as yet, no sign of age, entered the ivy-covered church at Passagno, cast a single glance at the altarpiece, and then turning to the organ, she waked its grand, triumphant chords, and sang "I know that my Redeemer liveth!"

Who knoweth that she is not the bride which he expected to find in another world? Who knoweth that the unselfish, sacrificing love of true hearts, shall not meet with the reward it never knew below?

HAPPINESS.

Is pleasure willing to keep her assignation with thee equally in an open cow-house and a decorated parlor? says John Forster. Thou art a happy man. Dost thou behold goodness, though accompanied with vulgarity, with complacency? and baseness, though arrayed in elegance, with disgust? Thou art a happy man. Dost thou behold inferior talents without vanity, and superior ones without envy? Thou art a happy man. While thou art diffusing gay pleasure through thy social circle, and receiving pleasure from it, is thy cheerfulness undamped when thou observest Death drawing a chair, and taking a place among the company? Thou art a happy man. Dost thou pray, not because thou darest curses, but because thou hopest blessings? Thou art a happy man. Does not thy retrospect of regret cast a shade over thy prospect of hope? Thou art a happy man. Amidst prosperity, canst thou detect the futility of means which may have gained thee pleasure?—in misfortune, canst thou triumph in the rectitude of those measures of wisdom to which yet success may have been denied? Thou art a happy man. Let the windows of thy soul, like the windows of a house, not disclose everything within; but at the same time, admit notices of everything from without.

SPRING.

So forth issued the seasons of the year;
First lusty spring, all dight in leaves of flowers
That freshly budded, and new blossoms did bear,
In which a thousand birds had built their bowers,
That sweetly sung to call forth paramours;
And on his head (as fit for warlike stores)
A gilt engraven morion he did wear,
That as some did him love, so others did him fear.

SPENSER.

LINES FOR LIZZIE'S ALBUM.

BY W. FELIX TIMBER.

Sweet, artless maid! thy sparkling eye—
Whence all the darts of Cupid fly;
Where all the silvery moonbeams seem
To nestle in a twilight dream,
Hath wove around my heart a spell
No living tongue can ever tell.

But I shall sing to every flower
The rapture of that blissful hour,
When thy sweet spirit flew to me
Like a soft strain from "memory's sea;"
I'd loved in childhood's ruby morn,
E'er Passion had revealed his thorn,
And poured within my melting soul,
A stream of rapture, that shall roll
Through flowery fields and vine-clad hills,
Chiming its joy in all the rills;
By day, reflect yon glorious blue;
By night, the stars that wander through,
And glow in life's tempestuous stream,
A holy, bright, and glorious beam;
In which I'd guide my light canoe,
And pray that Heaven may smile on you,
Till nearer, clearer, comes the toll
Of the dark bell, whose solemn roll
Flings a bleak shadow o'er my soul;
Ever and onward, till that sea,
Still unexplored, shall chime to me
Its unrecorded melody.

FLOWERS IN THE WINDOW.

BY RACHEL MOORE.

For the first time since its completion, Harry Walden and his new male bride went over their new house together, one lovely morning early in June. And a charming little new house it was—with the brightest, neatest, best arranged kitchen a young housekeeper like Amy could ask; with the cosiest sitting-room, the prettiest and most tasteful parlor, the airiest and pleasantest of sleeping-apartments.

And when they had been all over the house together, they came back once more to the neat, cool, airy sitting-room, with its pretty carpet of green and oak, its pure, light-painted walls hung here and there with beautiful engravings; its simple cottage furniture, where Amy's pleased glance fell upon pretty cane chairs of her own favorite pattern, a beautiful little escritoire for her books and papers, her tiny work-table standing between the windows, and the low sewing chair for her own especial use, drawn up beside it; and then her smiling eyes turned to the windows themselves, which were open, with their snowy linen shades half raised, and letting in the soft June sunlight, and the lovely June air, fragrant with the odor of flowers in the window.

Harry's hand—the careful hand of a young and loving husband—had had the arrangement of everything in and about this pretty little household; and with a happy heart, he watched his wife's pleased eyes glancing so bright, so satisfied, from one thing to another about her.

"You like it all, Amy?" he said, with a smile.

"Like it? O, yes, Harry! How pretty, how tasteful everything is! this room that I shall sit in has everything so convenient and pleasant—and the flowers in the window! how beautiful they are! and so fragrant—so full of bloom!"

Smiling, he led her to the windows to inhale their perfume.

"Yes—I knew your love of flowers; and I had so much pleasure in arranging them! They make the room so pleasant, do they not?"

"Yes, pleasant and homelike. Ah, how delicious!" smiled the young wife, lingering to breathe their odors again and again.

"And not only are they pleasant to us, Amy, but the sight of flowers blooming in a window is sweet to many and many a passer-by who sees such things rarely. I thought of it while I was putting them there."

Tenderly Amy kissed the kind hand that held her own. "Dear Harry," she said, lovingly, "you think of every one!"

"And I thought, Amy," he went on, "that whenever, as you sit in this room, you see little children, or poor people such as may often pass, going by and looking up at the flowers in the window, you could cut off for them some of the blossoms they may covet. So that perhaps our flowers may make some other hearts as happy as ours."

Treasuring in her loving heart the words of her kind and thoughtful husband, Amy turned with him at last from the window. She remembered them the next day, when Harry was gone away for the day, and she came into the sitting-room to water her plants. Standing behind their blossoming screen, she showered the bright drops upon them till their leaves hung wet and glistening; and while she watched the colored rays of light glancing through the dripping water, a party of merry school children came running gaily by.

"What pretty flowers!" said one of them—a gay little girl of ten, who made Amy think of her favorite little sister Sarah, whom she had left behind when she came from the country.

And the children half-stopped, looking partly at the flowers, and partly at Amy's pretty face behind their thick-clustering leaves. Smilingly, Amy clipped off a knot of gay blossoms and scattered them suddenly among the childish group. There was an eager scrambling, a merry laugh, in which Amy's was not the least merry or sweet—a chorus of thanks, and the children with their fragrant treasures divided among them ran on to school. Later a little pale, ragged boy came by selling matches.

"Matches—matches! buy some matches, please, ma'am?" he cried, looking at Amy through the window where she sat sewing.

Amy's purse came out—a tiny piece of silver was drawn from it, and she placed it on the sill outside, while the boy drew from his basket half-a dozen bundles of his wares, and passed them up to her. As he took the silver and put it in his pocket, a little knot of roses and heliotropes fell into his basket.

"For me, ma'am?" he said, looking up wonderingly.

"Yes," was Amy's pleasant answer; and the surprised look, the smile, and the grateful "thank you, ma'am," did her very heart good.

And after this, many a little cluster of blossoms was bestowed by Amy's kindly fingers; now on a lame child who came limping by on crutches; now on a poor woman, going along with her baby, that cowered and clapped its little pale hands at the sight of the blooming treasures; and again, when a wan-looking milliner's girl, half pausing at the window, looked with longing eyes at the flowers upon the sill. Flowers that she never hoped to raise in the dreary back attic where she lodged; that she never beheld, in the half twilight of the sunless, silent work-room, where day after day, she was drudging her life away for a mean pittance to buy her scanty portion of daily bread.

The poor little milliner carried her precious flowers with her as she went to her day's labor, and dreamed over them all day long of green country lanes, and broad blue skies, and free sunshine that she might only see in dreams—and the baby played with its nosegay, with the delight with which a petted child of fortune would have welcomed its gilded and costly toys; the little lame child forgot that he was lame, while sitting down on a doorstep, he leaned his head upon his hand, and with curious eyes studied the mysteries of every silken leaf and bud, thinking how wonderful they were, and remembering something he had heard of a kind hand that made flowers alike for poor and rich.

And thus, while Amy scattered flowers, she was also sowing seed. Among her childish "pensioners," as Amy half-playfully, half-affectionately called them; there was one who passed her window nearly every day; a pretty, delicate, almost frail-looking child of some eleven or twelve years of age; a child for whose daily approach Amy gradually found herself watching with interest. She was poorly, plainly dressed, yet neat and tidy-looking; the faded hues and worn texture of her garments being only equalled by their fresh and cleanly look.

Every day she came by the window; and every day she received from Amy's gentle fingers, a knot of fragrant blossoms.

Amy only smiled as she gave them; and this smile, with the little girl's grateful look, and low-spoken, earnest thanks, were all that passed between them on these occasions. There was not a day in which this child failed to pass the windows, not one day, let the sun shine, or the rain fall, she came regularly, and never failed to receive her accustomed gift of flowers.

Amy often mentioned this child in her evening talks with Harry; so that he came at last to make a point of asking each evening, if she had been during the day to receive her flowers.

"Do you not know her name, Amy?" he asked thoughtfully, once.

No, Amy did not. "It is odd—but I never thought of asking her," she said. "I suppose it is because there are so many others who come in the same way, and I should never think of asking their names, so many, you know. But I mean to ask her to-morrow, Harry. Perhaps we may be of use to her, or to the family if they need help."

Another morning saw the pale little girl coming along earlier than usual—paler than ever before, and her large, blue eyes heavy and dim with tears. Harry had not yet gone away, Amy was sewing a button on his sleeve as he sat by her at the work-table, and neither of them knew the child was so near, till the door-bell rang, and Amy answering its summons, beheld the little girl standing there.

"Why, poor child! what is the matter?" she said, kindly, taking one of the tiny hands in her own and drawing her into the passage-way—"what is the matter?"

The child's face flushed painfully, and Amy's tender words brought a burst of sorrowful tears.

"O, ma'am, he's dead!"

"My dear little girl—who is dead?"

"O, ma'am, my brother—my dear brother Charley! him that the flowers were always for! O, he loved them so much—and he wont need them any more now!"

The tears were streaming over the child's face like rain; and Amy's own eyes were overflowing as she lifted them to those of her husband, who had come out to the door.

"O, Harry—Harry!" she said, tremulously—"Harry, hear her!"

"My dear," he said, gently, "bring her in." And each holding a hand of the child, they led her into the sitting-room.

There, with the rapid tears rendering her words broken and painful, she told the simple story over, that needed so little time to tell. It was her brother Charley, who had been sick for so long, and had died this morning; and she had come to let the lady who had been so kind to him know about it.

"My child," said Harry, gently, "where do you live? we will go home with you."

And soon the husband and wife were on their way to the dwelling of the child. It was not far distant; they had only the length of a few streets to walk, and in an humble tenement, the home of respectable and honest poverty, they found what they were seeking. A plainly, poorly-furnished, yet clean and tidy room, with a pale, sorrow-bowed woman weeping by the hearth for the treasure she had lost; and lying upon a narrow couch in the corner, that ere long he would exchange for one narrower yet, the rigid form of the young man—the child's dead brother—the widow's only son.

The sheet that covered him, was folded aside, discovering a pale and wasted, but beautiful and serene face, bearing the traces of a long illness, patiently borne; the heavy, gold-fringed lids were closed calmly over the full eyes—the fair hair smoothed away from the pleasant brow that seemed yet to wear the smile it had known in life. It was already arranged for its last resting-place. The thin, white hands, were crossed upon the breast, and one of them held a little bunch of faded flowers—Amy's flowers. Their perfume lingered yet around the dead. He had died with them in his hand, asking that they might go with him to his grave—with the blessing of the dying breathing over the last of THE FLOWERS IN THE WINDOW.

BEAUTY.

What greater torment ever could have been
Than to enforce the fair to live retired!
For what is beauty if it be not seen?
Or what is't to be seen—if not admired?
And though admired, unless in love desired?
Never were cheeks of roses, locks of amber,
Ordained to live imprisoned in a chamber.

Nature created beauty for a view,
(Like as the fire for heat, the sun for light:)
The fair do hold this privilege as due,
By ancient charter, to live met in sight,
And she that is debarred it hath not right
In vain our friends from this do us dehort,
For beauty will be where is meet resort.—DANIEL.

Calumny may be defined, a mixture of truth and falsehood blended with malice.

A BIRD GOING OVER THE FALLS.

BY ELIZABETH BOUTON.

On the giddy verge of a cliff I stood,
And heard Niagara's thunders roar,
And watched the mist that from the flood
Ascended like an incense forever more.

I saw the billows madly bound,
Like living things in frantic play,
Flinging their feathery spray around,
And dashing madly on their way.

And onward still, they fiercely urged,
Wave o'erleaping wave, until
Upon the cataract's very verge
The tumbling flood grew smooth and still.

Then swifter than the stream of thought,
The mighty torrent swept along,
Till foaming, thundering down, it sought
The depths earth's central caves among.

Each sense absorbed in that of night,
Long silent, gazing there I stood,
Awe'd by a feeling of His might,
Who piled the rocks and poured the flood.

And as I gazed a bird flew by—
A tiny, bright-hued, joyous thing,
New soaring aloft through the azure sky,
Now skimming the wave on extended wing.

I watched it wheel o'er the rushing stream,
Till it stooped its pinions bright to lave,
Then quick as the lightning's arrowy gleam,
It vanished beneath the hurrying wave.

'Twas only a bird, and no frightened call
Told that its nest was desolate,
And save His who notes the sparrow's fall,
Few eyes there were that beheld its fate.

But its little mate, where the nestlings rest,
Shall wait in the greensward long;
He comes no more to the lonely nest—
Though she pours to recall him her sweetest song

THE LAST OF THE SAVELLI.

AN HISTORICAL FACT.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

IN the very shadow of the Appenines, lies a little village whose name is too insignificant to be traced on any map, and is only remarkable for being the site of one or two summer castles belonging to the Roman nobility. The other dwellings are those of peasants, with here and there a habitation of a somewhat higher order, belonging to decayed families; and these have, mostly, a look of the past stamped upon them that heralds the "unsubstantial vision" that will soon be all that is left of them.

Somewhere about the middle of the sixteenth century, there stood one of those summer palaces whose beauty was equal to its fragility. Taste and skill had presided over its erection, giving it fair and beautiful proportions, and adorning it, without and within, with all that could please the eye—but lacking the solid and imperishable look that distinguishes the buildings in cities.

This belonged to the Duke of Savelli. Some of the people living here, were his vassals; and the castle, when the duke's family were absent at Rome, which was nearly the whole year, was the object of their care and attention.

One of these persons, Michello Roberti, had a very beautiful daughter, Arvia, whose talents and accomplishments were far beyond her station. The library and picture-gallery of the duke were consigned to her especial oversight; and she would shut herself up in them whole days, eagerly appropriating their treasures to her own improvement.

She had been betrothed, when scarcely more than a child, to a young man of her own rank in life, but with far less intelligence. Christoforo was handsome, but scarcely intellectual enough to be a companion for the daughter of Roberti, who was, himself, a man of strong natural abilities.

Still Arvia liked the strong, healthful and handsome peasant, whose whole life was devoted to her, and whose only care was to gather all the wealth which an Italian peasant might ever hope for, to shower it upon her. Already the pretty cottage was built, and the vines planted around it. Already a little olive grove was obtained by his untiring labor, and even the wine was purchased for the bridal.

Christoforo wondered, and was sometimes chagrined at Arvia's preference of the duke's library, when he asked her to come and see some new invention which he had made for her comfort and convenience; for the youth, although not much given to book-learning, was both skilful and inventive in mechanical labor. His own hands had performed almost the entire work of building his cottage; and when finished, it was, indisputably, a sweet, picturesque casket for the jewel he intended to place in it.

He spoke almost testily to Arvia about this preference; and she, looking up at him with her soft, liquid eyes, only answered:

"It will be only for a few days. Spring has advanced so suddenly that the Savelli will soon come to the castle. Then no more reading nor painting for me!"

"No; but there will be work in our cottage, love, for which I trust all these fine studies of yours will not give you a distaste. Remember, Arvia, a peasant's wife must do many things that her husband would willingly, nay joyfully, spare her from doing, did not poverty forbid."

"Nor shall I be unwilling to perform them—believe me, Christo! But as you have tried so hard to embellish your cottage outwardly, surely I may be pardoned for wishing to have some of my own within it. You will be pleased, I know, when I show you the paintings I have executed, and with which I intend to adorn the walls; that is, if you approve my wish."

"Who has taught you these things?" asked Christoforo, suddenly, and with a singular expression on his countenance.

"No one, Christo. I am self-taught, as far as I am taught at all. I have a natural taste for drawing, and the rest comes easily enough, with the aids I find in the castle."

Her lover was satisfied; and Arvia devoted herself, with redoubled earnestness, to finish a picture which she had copied from one in the Savelli collection, and which, if it did not reach, did not, at least, shame the original.

On the very day on which she hoped to complete it, the family was to arrive. Her hurry to get through with her task, and to remove the evidences of it from the room where she had painted, did but retard her efforts; and she had the vexation of seeing the carriages driven into the courtyard before she had given the last touches to her picture.

She consoled herself with thinking that the family would not dream of coming into that remote part of the castle that evening. It was near sunset, and she believed herself safe, as already she heard preparations going on for an early supper. She had finished at last, and the picture was standing on the easel, too freshly painted to remove. How she should get it away, was the question; but she thought her father might be able to take it away in the morning, before the family should have risen.

One last look, and then she would leave it. She placed it exactly in the right light, and stood gazing at it with a pardonable pride; and a pleasant feeling came over her, at the thought of seeing it in Christoforo's beautiful little home. And then the subject, too, was so fitting!—a merry gathering of Italian peasants in their picturesque costume, enjoying a gala day in the woods; a pair of lovers wandering off by themselves, and a roguish boy pointing the attention of the whole party to the tree behind which they stood, but which did not hide the girl's white dress. It was a simple picture, and Arvia had the good taste to feel that it was more appropriate for her future home, than those where lords and knights were depicted.

She stood thus until the twilight came on, in which she hoped to get home unnoticed, when the door gently opened, and one of the Savelli, as she knew by the strong family resemblance, entered the room. She judged him to be Romano, a son of the duke, who had been absent on his travels for several years, but who, she had heard, had now returned. She stood in the shadow, trembling at what he might consider her presumption, and not daring to move. Once she thought he was about to leave without noticing her, in the dim twilight of the room; but just as her hope was highest, and he was at the door, he caught a glimpse of her figure and returned.

It may be that Arvia's surroundings, of late, had given a perceptible air of dignity and grace to her appearance. Certainly Romano Savelli had no mocking look, when he addressed her as "Lady," and greeted her as he would a princess.

She made her excuses in a modest and tremulous voice, which, however, resumed its clear, silvery tone before she finished speaking. He listened, as if spell-bound, and again addressed her as before.

"Indeed, my lord prince," she said, "I am no visitor, as you seem to think, but only the daughter of Roberti, the duke's servant. I have to ask pardon for intruding here; but my desire to copy this picture, made me bold. Forgive me, and I will take it away directly!"

He scarcely comprehended her. The daughter of his father's servant, and making not only very tolerable, but really admirable copies of some of his best paintings! It mystified him completely; and while he was pondering upon it, Arvia made her way to the door. Of course, he could not impede her exit; but he threw himself into a chair, after the vision had departed, and wondered if indeed he had been awake or dreaming.

Romano Savelli was one of the most gifted sons of Rome. He had hardly attained his twenty-first year, and already he had exhausted the stores of learning. The hope and pride of his family, they had already negotiated a marriage for him with the young and lovely daughter of a noble Neapolitan, and only the extreme youth of the lady prevented it from taking place. Eight hundred thousand scudi was the sum named for the bride's dowry. Romano had never yet seen her; but the fortune was a temptation to the duke, his father, and hitherto the young prince had been obedient to his wishes.

He was, in person and manners, the perfection of nobleness and dignity—causing him to be worshipped by the class of patricians to which he belonged, as much as he was loved and cherished by his own family. Altogether, Romano Savelli was an idol which all would have been shocked to see descend from the pedestal on which it was placed; and hitherto he had shown no disposition to abandon it. He lived in an atmosphere of love and adulation, and if it had been withdrawn, he would have died.

No one had suspected that under the calm, self-possessed, dignified exterior of the prince, a passionate nature existed, which, once roused, would never be subdued until a great wrong had been done, to either himself or others. True, the demon had seldom or never been awakened; but woe to him or to her who should awaken it!

Such was the being whom Arvia had met for the first time. She had been struck by the beauty of his countenance, and the inexpressible sweetness of his voice; but further than that, she thought of nothing but the intrusion of which she had been guilty.

On the morning succeeding her strange interview, she besought her father to go for her pictures and materials as early as possible. He did so, and returned with the news that the duke's son was there in the room, and was pleased to admire the paintings and to ask many questions respecting the artist.

Arvia said not a word. She helped her father to frame the paintings, and to carry them to Christoforo's cottage, where already he had removed the simple furniture they would require. Christoforo was there, when they arrived. He had never seen any specimen of Arvia's genius, and he received them with surprise and delight.

"They are too beautiful for the rest of our surroundings," he said; but Arvia thought otherwise, and told him that if she could only have plenty of flowers, her rooms would be quite splendid enough for her.

They talked long and pleasantly of their future, and parted with kind words and looks, such as linger fondly in the memory of lovers.

As the maiden turned from the little home so soon to be hers, she encountered the prince; and, much to her annoyance, he turned and walked by her side. She was embarrassed, thinking only of her intrusion at the castle. Before parting, the infatuated prince declared her love for her in such terms as made it plain to her that he would never give her up, until she should be safe under Christoforo's protection. She determined, in this view of the case, no longer to delay the marriage which Christoforo was constantly wishing to take place.

She tried to get rid of the prince, on plea of an engagement at home; but he insisted on accompanying her thither, and her father was too dependent on the duke to allow her to affront his son by refusing so simple a request, even though she constantly felt the discrepancy of the prince and herself walking together, and trembled lest she should be seen with him. Christoforo, she knew, would be racked with jealousy; and, altogether, the poor girl entered her home as miserable and wretched as she had hitherto been happy and cheerful.

Importuned constantly, as she was, to dismiss her affianced husband, and annoyed by the rich presents which Romano was always sending her, but which she scrupulously refused to accept, she was driven almost to desperation—the more, because her father, to whom she had confided the persecutions of the prince, feared to acquaint the duke with his son's passion for one so far beneath his own rank.

One thing, however, he could do; and that was, to keep his daughter out of his way until she was Christoforo's wife. Arvia's mother, a sensible, good woman, hastened on the marriage as much as possible, to prevent the ill effects of close confinement within doors on her daughter's health. In fact, everything was conducted with as much prudence and delicacy as possible—their dread being, chiefly, that the affair should transpire at the castle.

The marriage day arrived, and the bridal train proceeded to the church. Never had Arvia looked so lovely as on this day. Her thoughts were all concentrated in the solemn ceremony which was taking place, and an expression of calm happiness rested on her beautiful features. She forgot the prince and his persecutions, and gave up her whole soul to the words of the priest who was the friend and adviser of the Roberti family, and had known her from childhood.

Christoforo, too, was manly and self-possessed on this day; and every one thought it was a pleasant bridal to witness, of two so handsome and equally matched. Not every one—for behind a pillar, in the darkest corner of the church, stood Romano Savelli, the picture of despair and rage. To see the only woman whom he had ever loved, torn from him in this way, was death to his pride, as well as bitter for his affectionate and loving heart. It made a madman of him; and, peaceful as his outer life had ever been, he now swore revenge.

In coming out, the bridal train passed the very angle where he stood. He came forward a few steps, so that her garments touched him. He leaned towards her, and whispered in her ear. Till then, she had not seen him. She grew pale as death, and leaned heavily on Christoforo's arm; but the bridegroom saw nothing, and joyfully clasped her nearer—and then Romano disappeared.

The few days devoted to wedding festivities and company were over, and Arvia had settled down in her little home, and Christoforo had gone to the duke's vineyard, to his labor. She was happy in that home, save for one thought. The whispered words on her marriage day still rung in her ears. She busied herself about her house, which was like a little paradise, with its olive grove and vines without, and the flowers and pictures within.

She had prepared Christoforo's simple dinner, carried it with her own hands to the vineyard, and sat down at her window to read. It was the first time she had taken a book, since the Savelli had arrived; and absorbed in its contents, she heeded not that there was an eye at the window opposite, watching her. She was on the garden side of the house. A light railing separated the possessions of Christoforo from another's, and Romano had hired the room of their neighbor, to watch Arvia's movements. When, at length, she raised her eyes and saw that he was in her own garden, having leaped the railing, and stood before the window, she almost shrieked aloud; but at that moment, Christoforo opened the door at the other side of the cottage, and she ran eagerly to meet him.

It is useless to record the persecutions of that summer. Romano was constantly writing to her—constantly sending costly and beautiful presents. She showed the letters to her husband, and returned the presents. At length, Christoforo declared that he would give the prince a lesson which he should never forget, and which should leave her in peace from his absurd and annoying attentions. He compelled Arvia to answer a passionate letter from the prince, appointing an interview; and Christoforo, dressed as a woman, was to receive him. The absurdity of such an affair, and the dread of its being known, would, he assured his wife, be the means of driving Savelli back to Rome, where the family had already taken up their abode—the summer being now over.

Arvia, knowing the jealous temper of her husband, dared not resist the plan, although she had an indefinite dread of its result. She wrote to Christoforo's dictation; and shutting herself in her chamber, she left him to await the prince, in the disguise of a woman. She heard Romano when he came—a dead silence succeeded, and then, the sharp ringing sound of a pistol echoed through the house. The presentiment was only too true!

Arvia awoke from her long, low swoon to find herself in the prison-house at Borgo Castello. Her husband had fled, as soon as the deed was committed which destroyed the prince; and she was awaiting examination as a witness, or perhaps accomplice. Her asseverations of innocence were unheeded; and the Savelli family were determined that she should die. Even the rack was applied to make her confess; but she remained true to her first statement, and declared her ignorance of her husband's intentions. Great efforts were made to find Christoforo, upon whose head a price of thirty thousand scudi was set, and leaders of banditti were negotiated with to find and deliver him, but without success.

Margaret of Austria, daughter of Charles V., and wife of Octavio Farnese, the Pope's grandson, was then residing in Rome. The fame of Arvia's beauty reached her, and she visited her in prison. To the prisoner, debarred for months from any of her own sex, this visit was like that of an angel.

She related every particular to the princess, who, struck by the intelligence and beauty of the youthful prisoner, applied to Paul III. for her release. The Pope was ready to consent, if she could win the Duke of Savelli, and the broken-hearted father listened to her words, and withdrew the persecution of the unfortunate Arvia, who was now set at liberty.

The poor duke was soon after seized with a fever, resulting in madness; and, dying in a lunatic asylum, the title ended with his life. Arvia returned to her solitary home; but the loneliness and gloom connected with the fatal remembrance of her brief period of happiness there, made it insupportable. She entered into service in the household of Margaret of Austria, to whose solicitations alone she owed her life. The princess was much attached to her unfortunate attendant, and kept her constantly about her person; and by her tender solicitude, she partly weaned her from her deep grief.

Of her husband, she never heard again, except from unreliable sources. Some persons said that he had been seen in Aleppo; but nothing certain was known of his fate, from the moment in which he avenged the persecution of his wife so fearfully.

Fiery Wine.

The employment of sulphur in the treatment of the vine disease, has had a very singular and a very awkward effect. The wine made from grapes which have grown on vines so treated, has an unmistakable brimstone flavor. Those who are singular enough to like a fiery wine, may now have it in the highest degree; but the flavor is described by those who have experienced it, as being abominable.

THE OWL.

BY GEORGE H. COOMER.

I love to hear, when trees are bare,
And woodland paths knee-deep with snow,
The long halloo fill all the air,
Where flits the great owl to and fro.

Strange visions then the mind recalls,
Of things Minerva's bird has seen;
Old crumbling towers and ghostly halls,
Wherein the round-eyed owl has been.

I've listened pensively, and felt
My soul return to days gone by;
To seasons when the old owl dwelt
With grander folks than you and I.

In days when want's remorseless frown
Made poets seek the attic too,
He watched them under shadows brown
As the brown wing wherewith he flew.

That noiseless wing, methinks, indeed,
May once have waved o'er Otway's head,
While paused the bard in woful need
Twixt love of fame and want of bread.

And while the poet's lamp grew dim,
And dimmer still his hoped-for prize,
The great owl through the garret grim
Stared on his work with curious eyes.

"Mayhap," he mused, "I'll live like you;
Brief fashion dies, whate'er its cost,
But nature's own creations, true
To nature's self, can ne'er be lost."

And when as now his voice is heard,
Or when I mark his ghostly flight,
I can but love the solemn bird,
That with old bards out-watched the night.

THE MYSTERY.

BY HARRY MCMAHON.

THERE was not a spot—no, not a foot of ground about Merton Woods, that I had not explored thoroughly; not a pond or lake in their vicinity where I had not bathed and fished. I knew the history of all the old houses and people, just as well as if I had been born amongst them—which I had not. I spent every summer there,—and all summer, too—not the miserable, foggy dog-days—and I can truly say that I relished it. No matter if that little town in New Hampshire, on the borders of the Ammonoosuc, did boast of but one church, and if that one stood for all practical purposes of lecture-room, town hall and "meetin' us." No matter if all the people did not understand all that the minister said. They were good, hospitable, kindly people, with a deal of plain, sound sense, and very little nonsense.

There is ever, in these out-of-the-way places, some one or two families who seem scarcely to belong to the rest of the inhabitants, and yet are part and parcel of the village, and bound to the others by certain cords which would pain both parties to sever. My connections lay equally with the highest and lowest of the village of Clydeville. I had my home with an old couple who lived at the end of the village, apart from every other family—a sweet, quiet place, where the stillness was almost unbroken through the long summer day, save by the rustling of the leaves, and the voice of the Ammonoosuc.

Merton Woods formed the boundary to Clydeville, separating it from another and a busier town; to which, however, I seldom bent my way, satisfied, as I was, with the waving cornfields, the rich meadows, and all the delightful scenery which rendered Clydeville so pleasant a retreat. My home was in an old farm-house, with wide, low rooms, and standing almost in the midst of a locust grove, of my host's own planting, which effectually hid all the unsightly accompaniments of the farm-yard. Two very high elms shaded the front of the house, and the orchard lay on the southern slope, displaying its thick blooms, or its crimson and golden fruit to the full gaze of those who sailed on the pretty river. Altogether this was as comfortable and pleasant a home as I could have found. My hostess was the best and dearest of old ladies, and her husband, although somewhat authoritative and dictatorial, was in the main, a good-hearted, kind man. There were three or four hired men, a stout country lassie, a thin, pale maiden, not over young, the niece of Mr. Fielding; and the pretty, rosy grandchild of eight years, whose father and mother had left her to the care of the two old people when they died.

Miss Sophronia Fielding was, as I have hinted, an old maid; but a meek and mild one, with not a drop of acid in her whole composition. Little Maud—where did they get that quaint old English name?—was a rare little playmate, full of mirth and laughter, yet with a wisdom occasionally, beyond her years, as children are apt to have who live only with their elders. At the other extreme of the village, a loftier house than the farm could boast of, reared its tall chimneys above the rest of the dwellings. This was the abode of a gentleman named Clyde, the last representative of the family from which the town took its name. He lived alone, excepting that he employed an old woman to cook his meals, and keep the house in order; after doing which, she retired to a small cottage near by, never staying at her employer's excepting when actually at work. That Mr. Clyde was an intense student, I inferred from the fact, that his light was streaming at nearly all hours of the night, from what I had been told were his library windows. That he was a solitary, perhaps misanthropic man, I also inferred, from his lonely walks, his sails upon the river without a companion, and an occasional shooting excursion on which I had met him in the woods.

He interested me—this lonely being—lonely amidst a peculiarly social and companionable people. I longed to know something of the inner life of one whose outer was mingled so little with that of others. There were times when I thirsted for more of intellectual life than I could find at the farm-house. Pleasant and good as they were, there was not sufficient of the intellectual for a rainy day, when neither sporting nor sailing could be accomplished. Then I would have given much to have stepped quietly into Mr. Clyde's library, and discuss with the close student some literary point, or wage with him the war of criticism.

Moreover, his home had the reputation of being haunted. Some had seen the figure of a white lady, who was supposed to be a former Mrs. Clyde, at the window of the north chamber, by moonlight: and others had seen a boat, with a white figure in it, land close under the garden wall which was built on the river bank. A haunted house in the country is an object of no mean interest to visitors; and I longed to become acquainted with a man who had such a desirable curiosity in possession. But, strange to say, the name of Clyde was never mentioned by any one at the farm, and the only question I ever asked respecting him was met with such decided coolness, that I was prevented from ever renewing any conversation leading to the subject. I said I was intimate with the highest and lowest of the Clydevillers. Sim Jackson, a poor, half crazed, half idiotic lad, was my helper in all excursions, whether of boating or shooting; and although I ran some risk of his bringing me into a scrape, and both of us into danger, by his witless carelessness in handling fire-arms and oars. But he seemed so genuinely happy to be employed, and I was spending so pleasant a summer myself, that I could afford to give pleasure to one being, at least. I was rewarded by the intense satisfaction he displayed on these occasions; his gentle, feminine face lighting up with a smile which would have been very beautiful, had it not been so soulless. Poor Sim! He saw the pained look which I wore, and immediately looked as grave and sorry, as if he knew all my speculations about his deficiencies.

We rowed almost under the wall of Mr. Clyde's possessions one day, and Sim put on a wonderfully wise look, as he glanced up at the windows of the chamber reputed haunted. A sight of the master of the house, walking up and down the garden paths, stopped the words he was about to speak, and he shrank down in the boat. Carelessly enough, I gave Sim the oars, because I could better gaze at the man I had so much wanted to know; and resigning myself to a half lying posture, I marked every motion and look of the person in the garden. He was handsome, well formed, and with a certain air of dignity which impressed me. Sim was handling the oars with rather too much of a flourish, and I leaned towards him to check him. He was muttering something about Mr. Clyde and "Miss Sophrone," as he called her, and seeing that he was in one of his strange moods, I attempted to take the oar from his hands. I knew no more until I was lying under an apple-tree in that same garden, and Mr. Clyde bathing my head, which ached horribly. Sim was crying a little way off. I put my hand to my head, and when I withdrew it, I saw it was covered with blood.

"You have had an ugly blow, sir," said the sweetest, yet most powerful voice that I had ever heard. There was music in every tone.

I began to apologize for the trouble I was giving, and attempted to rise, but found myself incapable.

"Lie still, sir," said the voice, "I am something of a surgeon, and will attend to your wound as soon as you have taken this powder, which will prevent any ill effects from it."

Bandages, sticking plaster and a pail of water were near him, and a case of minute bottles lay on the ground, from one of which he took an atom of white powder, and laid it on my lip. He then bound up the wound, and signing to poor Sim who was yet weeping, he assisted him to carry me to the house, where a shaded room, and a cool, white couch received me and my aching head, and I was left to the care of the poor fellow who had so innocently injured me.

"How was it, my good lad?" I asked.

"O, that oar—that oar," he began, but broke down at once.

"Don't cry, Sim. I shall be well in a day. I have had twenty worse blows than this."

"Have you?" he asked eagerly. "Then I shan't have to be hung, shall I?"

"Of course not, Sim. What put that into your head?"

"Why, Master Robert, you know Fessor

Webster is hung, don't you?" He said this with a shiver that was painful to see.

"Well, that was quite another thing. You did not mean to strike me, my poor lad, and you are quite sorry, are you not?"

"Sartin, sartin, master Robert."

"Well, no one can touch you, and we will have many a sail yet together."

He curled himself down upon the floor, when I signified that talking hurt my head, and when I awoke after a quiet sleep, he still lay there.

"I shall be able to go home to-night," I said to Mr. Clyde, who came in about sunset, with a cup of tea.

"No, sir! I am responsible for your cure, and I shall not permit it. I have sent old Betty down to the farm, and they will not expect you."

I submitted only because I thought I should know more of my host if I staid. Betty returned, and brought word that "Miss Sophronia" would be up to see me. Mr. Clyde turned pale.

"He does not like intrusion," thought I, and again I entreated to go home. He refused: and then I would have sent Sim to prevent any one from coming. He would not permit it however, and I had no power to resist his will.

I lay quite still until the room was perfectly dark. Then I heard a quiet and familiar step beneath the windows. Mr. Clyde sat in the porch. I had been so quiet that he probably thought me asleep, for he said, in clear, musical tones: "Love, do I see you once more?"

Her answer was low and indistinct, and I knew she was weeping. I supposed she asked for me, for he answered:

"He is in no danger, and could have gone home; but I knew that you would come if you thought him injured. He sleeps now, and this hour must be mine. Sophronia, do you love me still?"

"How can you doubt it? Does not my wasted figure tell you how I have suffered?"

"Do you believe my innocence in regard to your brother?"

"God knows I do. But my uncle will not hear a word in your defence, and although you were so justly cleared at the trial, he still believes that you killed poor Edwin."

"Edwin! I would have given my life to save him. I tried hard to do so, and did as I would have desired another to act by me. He was imprudent, and I tried to check him. He grew angry, and then—why, you know the rest, Sophronia. After that terrible storm of anger, he still threatened me, still sought my life. He drank deeply, and then he came and insulted me, so that I might strike him. I thank God I never did! Had I given him a single blow, it would have lain on my heart like murder. In his mad attempt to draw me down stairs, he fell backward, and that blow killed him." He made a pause, and then resumed. "Does your uncle know—did he, or his wife ever suspect that we were married?"

I started up in bed. Miss Sophronia—that pattern of maiden ladies—that quiet, good, amiable old maid, as I had thought her, married! and to Mr. Clyde, too! I did not hear her answer, but suppose it was in the negative.

"No!" he said, bitterly, "they would turn you from their door. I wish they would. Love, will you never come to live with me?"

"Never, until I convince them of your innocence. They were softer than usual to-night, and did not object to my coming up to see Mr. Merrifield. Let me go and see him, Richard."

He came into the room with her. I pretended to awake, when they brought in the light. Miss Sophronia was full of compassion for my injury, and of pity for poor Sim, who had fairly cried himself to sleep, as he lay curled up like a dog, at the foot of my couch. I looked at the two, as they stood beside me. Mr. Clyde was very pale; but Sophronia was absolutely radiant. I could hardly believe that she was the pale, haggard woman, who walked so silently about the old farm-house. As they left me, and went back again to the porch, where they sat until midnight, I found by their conversation, that she had once or twice visited him in his lonely home, at night, and that this had given rise to the story of the White Lady. A few interviews had alone been practicable. The marriage took place just before Sophronia's brother died, while she was away from the farm-house, and being naturally timid, and much afraid of her uncle, she dared not tell him that Clyde was her husband. It may be thought strange that he consented to her silence; but he had promised her that he would not claim her, until her relatives believed him innocent; and as no one but Edwin knew of her marriage, it could easily be concealed. That year she had spent with her brother, but all the rest of her life, she had been with her uncle, and her obligations to him, and the thought that she had not consulted him about her marriage with Richard Clyde, kept her silent. Richard himself was too proud to insist upon it. In fact, the strange occurrences that broke in upon Miss Sophronia's quiet life that year, so wrought upon her frame, and disturbed her mind, that the rest and silence of the farm house were more desirable for her state than anything else.

Part of this history came out on the evening I lay in Richard's house. The rest I soon learned ; for Miss Sophronia told Richard to let me know how they were connected. I returned home in the morning with her, and spent a week in idleness, only that I was revolving in my mind some incidents which had come to my knowledge, respecting this affair, just before I came away.

On my bed, that evening, the whole story of Edwin Fielding's death came back to me. A friend of mine had witnessed a death very similar, but had not mentioned the names. He did not speak of it at the time, because he wished much to go in the steamer, the next day, and when he returned home, there was nothing more to hear, only that somebody had been accused, tried and cleared. He knew that the dead man had come to his end by his own hasty and ungovernable temper. I wrote him immediately to meet me at Clydeville, without delay. I longed to see Sophronia in that now lonely house, and to see the color permanent in her cheek, that had flushed up so brightly on that night.

My friend came. The Fieldings thought he came because I was somewhat unwell still from my injury, and they showed him the kindest attentions. I made him recall every word of his former narration to me. It was the very scene, names and all, fresh in his memory. I got him to relate it as if incidentally, one evening, when we sat by moonlight in the old porch, without mentioning the name. The farmer started from his chair, and made him repeat it, and after he had done so, and my friend had said, "by the by, Mr. Fielding, the man's name was the same as yours," the old man turned to his wife, and said :

"Becky, we have done great wrong to Mr. Clyde, I believe after all that he is innocent."

What words were these for the meek, patient woman who was sitting behind the old couple, and from whose heart I heard a deep, deep sob ! It was one of thankfulness, I knew.

The next morning, quite early, I saw the old farmer take his oaken stick, and calling to little Maud, who went every where with him, he ascended the hill which led to Mr. Clyde's house. He was there long, and when he returned, he went up to poor Sophronia, who was trembling like a leaf, and said simply :

"I am sorry to part with you, niece, but you will be wanted at home ; and before he had well got the words from his lips, Richard Clyde entered.

I never saw a man look so much a man, as he did, when he went up to Mrs. Fielding's chair, shook hands with her cordially, and said a few words in reply to her petition for his pardon. It was all that one could ask of a man who, for so long a time, had lain under unjust suspicions.

"My brother Edwin was rash and inexcusable," he said, "but he was my brother still. I never harmed him."

Sophronia's dewy eyes looked tenderly upon him as he called her brother his own ; and the old people to whom Edwin had been very dear, wondered how they could ever have been so hard hearted, as to doubt him. The old farmhouse looked lonely after the light step and soft voice of Sophronia had left it. She had a queer successor there, too ; none other than poor Sim ! He grew somewhat more rational after leaving his wild and idle life, for a real home, which Mr. Fielding said he deserved, for being the real cause of Sophronia's happiness.

And very happy she was ; and very cheerful now was the haunted house, with the White Lady flitting about its rooms, and the windows all open to the sun and air. Old Betty gave place to two fresh country maid servants ; but she is amply provided for by the Clydes. My friend and myself are invited to pass the whole of next summer at the house on the hill ; and if they will find room for two ladies also, we shall certainly do so, both of us entertaining serious thoughts of marrying.

While I write, Sim is continually coming up to me, pushing the hair from a great scar on my forehead, and meaning as if in pain ; and although it annoys me, still, I cannot bear to send the poor lout out of the room. If I were only to speak of getting out the boat for a sail, he would weep for an hour, so sensitive he is to the remembered dangers of that day.

NOT IN TUNE.

When those aids to singing, called musical pitchforks, were first introduced, the precentor of Carnock parish, a few miles from Dunfermline, Scotland, thought he might not be the worse of one, and accordingly ordered the Edinburgh carrier to bring it over. The honest carrier, who never heard of any other pitchfork but that used in the barnyard, purchased one at least ten feet long. It was late in the Saturday evening before he came home, and as a message had been left to bring it up when he came to church next day, he marched into the churchyard before the bell rang, where the master of song was standing amid a group of villagers. "Aweel, John, here's the pitchfork you wanted ; but I can tell you, I ne'er thought muckle o' your singing before, and I'm sair mista'en if ye'll sing ony better now.—Scottish Guardian."

THEY'LL NE'ER RETURN AGAIN.

BY CHARLES STEWART.

Youth's flowers, though falling, still do cast
 Perennial perfume,
 And, through the vista of the past,
 In pensive beauty bloom.
 Bright visions oft unbidden start,
 And o'er the spirit reign,
 Until a voice swells through the heart—
 "They'll ne'er return again!"

How strange and sad that echo beats
 The prison bars of joy!
 How true the lesson it repeats—
 How soon it doth destroy.
 Alas! 'tis o'er—we now must tread
 The pathway proud of man.
 Farewell! my dearest dreams are dead—
 "They'll ne'er return again!"

The rarest gems on hope's high throne
 Are scattered now and gone,
 While on life's ravished altar stone
 A weary heart lives on—
 A heart that cannot all forget,
 Though close akin to pain—
 The loved and lost, and feel regret
 "They'll ne'er return again!"

Fond fancy often brings the glow
 Of childhood's pleasant years,
 And seals awhile the fount whence flow
 Wan recollection's tears;
 'Tis then in memory's brimming bowl
 I steep my world-worn brain,
 Till, ah! an echo strikes the soul—
 "They'll ne'er return again!"

THE SURPRISE PARTY.

BY ANNA M. CARTER.

"This is preposterous!" exclaimed Mr. William Loring, as he glanced over the newspaper, while seated at the breakfast table, one cold winter morning.

It was a cosy room, with a bright coal fire sparkling in the handsome grate, making the view from the large French window look infinitely colder, with its white, snow-covered fields. Mr. William Loring was a widower, handsome, rich and jovial; opposite to him sat his handsome, buxom sister, Marianne Harland, a widow with a small jointure, and by his side was his niece, Alice Harland, a very beautiful, self-willed girl of nineteen. Six years ago, when his brother-in-law, George Harland, a poor clergyman died, William Loring offered his sister and her daughter a home, which they had thankfully accepted. The brother and sister were very fond of each other, and the three formed a very happy household, their only point of difference being the aforesaid Alice, whom her mother petted injudiciously. This her brother William saw and gently remonstrated about, but all to no effect. When Mr. Loring made the exclamation, both sister and niece looked up, though neither spoke, waiting some further remark, which was not long in coming:

"This is equally preposterous! In my opinion, the people of Ashton are going crazy!"

"About what, William?"

"About surprise parties!"

"What; delightful surprise parties, uncle William?"

"Do you think them delightful, Alice?"

"Yes, indeed, uncle. Only think, without any of the trouble of writing and sending invitations, ordering supper or music, you have a splendid party. Your friends come without any notice, and there is not the slightest trouble. I wish the people would take it into their heads to give us a surprise."

"Pooh! pooh! Alice. I think it is a barbarous custom; perfectly piratical. You look at only the bright side of things, dear Alice. Look at my picture. I'm in my library, smoking a quiet cigar, listening to the distant sound of your voice, as you sing some of your pretty songs; your mother sits near you, quietly embroidering, when a ring is heard—the servant goes to the door, expecting to usher in some of our pleasant friends, when in rushes, perhaps forty people, followed by servants carrying baskets, boxes, tubs of ice cream, kegs of oysters, and nobody knows what. Like a horde of Cossacks they come in, disturbing all your quiet—take possession of your domicile, pull up the carpets, upset your China closet and pantry, and half craze the cook. Then comes dancing and feasting, and about two o'clock in the morning, they take their leave, and your house is a perfect scene of confusion."

"Ha! ha! ha! uncle William, you have presented a very dreadful picture to my eyes, but I still keep to my own view of the affair," and whistling to her canary, Alice put a piece of sugar between the bars of his cage. As she stood on a cricket, in her pretty, rich, carmine, merino morning-robe, she looked very charming, and her uncle could not help glancing admiringly at her.

"Suppose, uncle," and the girl smiled maliciously, "the Ashtonites were to give us a splendid surprise party?"

"I believe I should be tempted to shoot the first intruder."

"Oh, fie! You are a very wicked man, uncle William. I should be delighted with one, but, if they are so very disagreeable to you, I shall take care to spread abroad the news, so that any evil-disposed persons may be deterred from making the attempt."

As she spoke, Alice jumped down from the cricket, and ran to get her uncle's overcoat, hat and cane, for he had risen from the table, and was preparing to go out.

"William, what put the notion of surprise parties into your head, this morning," asked his sister, Mrs. Harland.

"Seeing an account of one in this morning's paper—the seventh this month, and it is only the twentieth to day. It is a perfect mania with the inhabitants of this hitherto sane, quiet village. Good morning." And so speaking, Mr. William Loring left the house.

His sister Marianne watched him, as with a quick, firm tread, he walked down the avenue, leading from the house. Her eyes grew moist, for she thought of his unvarying kindness to her all her life, and especially, since she had been a member of his household. Mrs. Harland was fast losing herself in tender, grateful recollections, when the clear voice of her daughter brought her to her senses.

"Mother, what are we to do?"

"Why? What has happened?"

"O, nothing has happened yet, but will. I have a suspicion that we are to be surprised as well as the rest of the villagers, and this very evening."

"What has put that notion into your head, child?"

Alice blushed, hesitated, and at last spoke as if in sort of desperation:

"John Marshall said—"

"You have not been associating with him again, against your uncle's express wishes, have you?"

Alice blushed still deeper, and she panted as she answered: "Yes, I have too. I don't see why I should give him up, just because uncle happens to have a prejudice against the poor fellow. You, yourself, say you see nothing objectionable in him, and rather like him."

"So I do, Alice, but your uncle has more means than either you or I of knowing the character of the young man, and he says, that although he seems gentlemanly and refined, his tastes and habits are low."

"That's my uncle's nonsense. He dislikes him, because I don't, and then he wants me to have that stupid, old-fashioned, prosy, bookish partner of his, Sydney Ellis, who has only his handsome eyes and aristocratic name to recommend him. I can tell him he'll never be my husband, if I stay an old maid all the days of my life!"

"Alice Alice!" exclaimed her mother, as she listened to her daughter's petulant exclamations. "Don't speak so decidedly. If you love John Marshall I am sorry; yet, unless there are proofs of his unworthiness, I cannot counsel you wholly to discard him, but you can treat him rather coolly, and not meet him so frequently. I have an idea that the next time he calls here, your uncle will forbid him the house—so be very careful how you behave. I'll do all I can to make your uncle look with favorable eyes on his suit."

"You are a dear, good mother. Now just listen to what he said. He did not say anything very particular—yet it was too. 'The first night the moon is full, your house may be too.' Wasn't it prettily said? Just like him."

"Really, Alice, I see no way of avoiding the calamity, for I agree with your uncle, in thinking surprise parties a perfectly absurd custom. The only way to escape, will be to get your uncle to take us to the theatre to-night. That will fix everything nicely. We'll stay in the city over night, and I will give the servants a holiday. The party will come, find the house shut up, and be obliged to go away. A capital idea, is it not, Alice?"

"No, mama. It would be very mean to serve people so. It has become the fashion to have these parties in the village, and uncle must abide by it; for my part, I think they are delightful."

"They may seem so to you, having only attended them, but only wait till they come here, into your own house, and you will see the difference."

"I shan't have long to wait, mama, only till evening."

"Then you will not agree to my plan of going to the city?"

"No, indeed. I'd rather stay here."

"Well, do as you like, but I hope your uncle will not be very angry, or that the house will not be turned topsy-turvy."

The day seemed endless to Alice. She practised some of her most brilliant pieces and sweetest songs; sewed diligently, and yet, when she looked at the mantel clock, it was only two—time for her uncle to come home. She stood at the drawing room window, idly drumming with her fingers on the pane, and gazing dreamily down the avenue. Suddenly she walked away, and taking a seat at the farthest end of the room, began to work, as if against time.

"Most time for your uncle, Alice."

"Yes, he'll be here in a few seconds; I saw him coming up the avenue with that bore, Sydney Ellis. I don't see what possessed uncle to bring him home to-day, of all days. I won't have much to say to him, that he'll find out."

"You will try and please your uncle, Alice, and behave like a lady," gravely spoke Mrs. Harland; for although she too often weakly yielded to her daughter, she wished always to have Alice please her uncle.

A stamping in the hall and the cheery voice of Mr. Loring, then a little pause, and the door opened, and the two gentlemen entered the cheerful, elegant room, their faces glowing with their walk in the cold air. Mrs. Harland came forward to welcome the comers, but Alice only rose, bowing stiffly and shyly, almost without raising her eyes. Sydney Ellis came up to her, shaking her extended hand very cordially.

"Ah, Miss Alice, I am glad to see you looking so well," and the voice was very rich and musical, and fraught with a mournful cadence, as he turned to Mrs. Harland, and said:

"I would gladly give my own excellent health, if I could but see my sister Annie looking as fresh as your daughter."

"How is your sister this winter?" hurriedly asked Mrs. Harland.

"She looks about the same as usual in flesh, she is no thinner, but much paler and weaker. She fades daily."

Just then the dinner bell sounded, and for a moment put an end to their conversation. But there had been that in Sydney Ellis's voice, which had made the heart of Alice thrill, and she took his arm with gentler feelings than ever before, and seated opposite to him at the table, she found herself looking at the face before her very often.

Sydney Ellis could scarcely be called handsome, for his features were irregular, and when the face was at rest, the eyes lowered, he might be termed actually homely, but call up a smile and glance of the eyes, and the face was transformed. The smile was rare, but when it came was like a gush of sunshine, spreading over the face, and lighting up the dark, soul-full eyes. More than once during the pleasant meal, Alice saw the wondrous beauty of the smile, and felt the deep, penetrating glance of the eyes. Every time she looked at the speaking face, she felt a strange thrill, a great softening of her feelings towards him. When the dinner was over, and they all had adjourned to the drawing-room, Alice felt to a greater degree the fascination Sydney unconsciously exerted over her. In vain she called to her mind the handsome, regular features of John Marshall, to whom she had all but pledged her faith, a shudder almost passed over her as she thought of him. At last she gave up the attempt, and entered with her whole heart into the conversation of her gifted companion. Just before six o'clock, Sydney rose. He must go, for his mother was going out, and his sister Annie needed his company. It was with a sigh of regret that Alice saw him rise, and as he stood speaking to her uncle, she glided from the room. Sydney Ellis lingered, hoping she would return, but as she did not, he took his leave. As he opened the front door, and made his parting salutation to Mr. Loring, Alice glided up, and putting a box into his hand, said:

"A few flowers for your sister Annie, Mr. Ellis. Good-by." And before he could return any thanks she was gone.

Mr. Loring walked into the conservatory which was filled with flowers in full bloom. In one corner stood a beautiful tea-rose, the especial pet of Alice. A smile spread over the handsome face of the old man as he looked at it. Its only blossom was gone. As the hours flew by, Alice grew restless and sad. With her whole heart she dreaded what a few hours before she had so longed for—the surprise party. About half past seven o'clock, to the utmost consternation of Mr. Loring, his house was filled with guests, and in a little while the parlor carpet was covered with a white cloth, and people were gaily dancing, and a few hours later, the dining-room presented a festive scene. In the middle of it stood a large table covered with a snowy cloth, and glittering with cut glass and silver, and loaded with all the delicacies of the season. With perfect politeness and good nature, Mr. Loring treated his unwelcome guests, though his face flushed slightly, and his bow was very stiff, as he received the dashing John Marshall. Alice was vexed and uncomfortable, for the assiduous attentions of her admirer had become very distasteful. The face she had always thought handsome was rapid and bold, the conversation soulless and shallow, and the manners she had always liked as spirited and gay, now struck her as bold and presuming. In vain she endeavored to shake Mr. Marshall off, but she had permitted his attentions too long to get rid of him so easily, so she had to resign herself to her fate, inwardly blaming herself for the self-will which made her reject her uncle's affectionate advice. After supper Alice was seated at the piano singing, for she had a beautiful voice, and sang with taste and feeling. By her side, stood John Marshall, in a devoted attitude, ready to turn over the leaves of the music-book, or murmur soft nothings in the no longer infatuated ear. As Alice sung, she raised her eyes, and beheld reflected in the mirror opposite to her the form of Sydney Ellis. His eyes were fastened with a look of infinite contempt upon her companion, and Alice's voice trembled in spite of herself, as she saw that contemptuous smile change to a look of mournfulness, as his eyes rested upon her for a moment. One glance, and Sydney turned and left the room. The song finished, Alice rose, and with a weary, heavy heart sought the solitude of the conservatory, there to shake off the weight upon her mind—to analyze her feelings. With a deep sigh, she seated herself upon a little rustic seat, and unconsciously her eyes filled with tears. A voice, which caused her heart to thrill, sounded close beside her.

"A few minutes since, I saw Miss Alice the centre of a gay, admiring circle, who listened almost breathlessly to her sweet singing—now, I find her alone, a sigh on her lips and tears in her eyes. What is the cause of your trouble?" asked Sydney Ellis, while almost unconsciously his voice grew low and tender.

"A common and not very gracious cause for trouble," answered Alice, the sadness fading away from her sweet face—"only dissatisfaction with myself and two-thirds of the world. But how is it that I find you here?"

"My mother returned early, and I wanted to thank you for the beautiful flowers you sent my sister. You were gone, before I could do so, this afternoon. I didn't expect such a company. One of your uncle's hated surprise parties."

Alice laughed gently, then said: "I have always liked them—that is, those that I attended, but when they are brought home to you they are less pleasant. I can now fully agree with my uncle. But I must return to the drawing-room—I shall be missed."

"One moment, Miss Alice. I must ask you one question, and believe me, if it seems impertinent, I can give you a reason for my boldness, which shall excuse me."

"You may ask the question, while I reserve to myself the liberty of refusing to answer it, if it is too impertinent."

"Will you tell me, Alice—if—if—Mr. Marshall is, or ever will be, to be caught to you?"

"No, he never will be. I must go now—your question is answered."

"God bless you!" and Alice felt her hand seized, and a warm kiss imprinted on it. "I must speak to you, Alice, now. I love you—love you dearly. Can I hope you will ever love me in return."

"Yes, Sydney, yes," and with a sudden bound Alice sprang from him, and in a moment more was in the drawing-room. She had been in the room but a few minutes, when Mr. Marshall came to her side.

"Your pardon, fair Alice, but I am unexpectedly called away. Have I your gracious permission to depart?"

"Yes."

The answer was courteous, though cold. A moment more, and she was rid of her persecutor, and in his stead, stood the man she loved. Some of the company were dancing, others looking at collections of engravings, others were conversing, when a servant burst into the room—

"Mr. Loring! Mr. Loring! Mr. Marshall has taken all the silver, and your best horse and buggy, and gone off! The coachman has gone after him, but the rascal has got the best horse, and ten minutes start!"

The whole room was in confusion. The young men of the party, who came in carriages set off in pursuit of the villain. Alice sat motionless, covered with confusion, for she thought of her own willfulness, and her uncle's words. A few minutes, and the house was empty of all its guests, save Sydney Ellis, who, stepping up to Mr. Loring, asked the hand of his niece. Alice stood before her uncle covered with blushes, knowing he would give his consent to the match, but dreading what he would have to say about the surprise party.

"Take her, Sydney, she is a good girl, and you are worthy of her. Ha! ha! ha! I laugh to think that the hated party has done me such a good turn. It has rid the village of a great scamp, and I hope frightened the good people of Ashton out of the notion of having any more SURPRISE PARTIES."

A BEAUTIFUL IDEA.

It is pleasant to see a green old age, like a Christmas tree, comfortably boxed in at home. It is pleasant to see its trunk, bent beneath the weight of riches, surrounded by a host of happy children. It is pleasant to see it stretching out its hospitable arms to all, as though it were anxious to embrace the entire party. It is pleasant to see it blossoming with generous things, and shedding a cheerful light on the gay circle it delights in drawing round it. And it is pleasant to see it distributing, with a lavish hand, the treasures it has accumulated on all branches, and to notice its head rising higher every time it parts with a fresh gift!—Irving.

The sunshine lies upon the mountain-top all day, and lingers there latest and longest at eventide; yet is the valley green and fertile, and the mountain-top barren and unfruitful.

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

BY GEORGE F. MORRIS.

"A song for our banner?"—The watchword recall

Which gave the Republic her station;

"United we stand—divided we fall!"

It made and preserves us a nation!

The union of lakes—the union of lands—

The union of States none can sever—

The union of hearts—the union of hands—

And the Flag of the Union forever

And ever!

The Flag of our Union forever!

What God in his wisdom and mercy designed,

And armed with his weapons of thunder,

Not all the earth's despots and factions combined,

Have the power to conquer or sunder!

The union of lakes—the union of lands—

The union of States none can sever—

The union of hearts—the union of hands—

And the Flag of the Union forever

And ever!

The Flag of our Union forever!

O keep that flag flying!—The pride of the van!

To all other nations display it;

The ladies for union are all to a—man!

But not to the man who'd betray it.

Then the union of lakes—the union of lands—

The union of States none can sever—

The union of hearts—the union of hands—

And the Flag of the Union forever

And ever!

The Flag of our Union forever!

A GLANCE AT THE BRIGHT SIDE.

BY E. H. GOULD.

"I'm almost home. How glad dear Mary will be to see me, and the children too; but perhaps they'll not know me. It's all a dream, that I've been gone these three long years; have toiled early and late beneath a burning sun for a little gold: little enough I've got, too. I almost wish I had never thought of repairing my fortune."

With these words, Mr. Hopewell sat down upon the deck of the vessel, where he had been standing quite in despair. The moon was shining brightly in an unclouded sky, which seemed only to laugh at him, and the stars winked at each other, and looked coldly down upon the discouraged man.

"But why am I now murmuring because I have not made a fortune?" at length thought Mr. Hopewell. "I have health, strength, a resolute heart, and willing hands; with these, no one need beg or starve. I ought to feel rich with such possessions, and only one year since, when sick, lonely and sad among strangers, I should have felt richer, happier far, to have been presented with these, and placed where I now am, than to have had all the wealth of California laid at my feet. I needn't tell everybody that I have but a few hundreds, nor shall I, and if I feel rich, it will be just as well as if I were so." Thus reasoned Mr. Hopewell with himself, and with quite a happy heart he left the vessel at the dawn of day, and soon procured a carriage to convey him home.

The stillness and beauty of a Sabbath morning was resting over the quiet village of M—. The bells chimed out the hour for church, which opened at once every door; and immediately the streets were filled with neatly clad, sober-looking men and women moving towards the church, among whom was Mrs. Hopewell and her two children.

Mr. Stone, the village lawyer, and Mr. Frost, the chief merchant, came along.

"I wonder if Hopewell is doing anything at California now?" inquired Mr. Stone.

"I don't think he is," replied Mr. Frost, "at least, he doesn't send anything home, I judge, for she doesn't purchase any goods compared with what she did when he was at home. I didn't believe he would do anything when he went," added Mr. Frost.

"No; there's no business in him," continued Mr. Stone. "He signed paper for that miserable brother of his, and went down once, and just as he was climbing up nicely again, bought railroad stock, which was soon of little value, and then he left us."

They had now arrived at the church, which put an end to their conversation, and they sat down, whether to worship God, or to think of bargains and gain, He who readeth the thoughts best knows.

Mr. Hopewell reached his residence at M—, soon after his wife left it and was on her way to church, as we have seen. But no sooner did he express a regret that she was not at home, than Jim, his father's hired servant, offered to go for her, assuring them that he could reach the church before the parson. But to his dismay, when he arrived at the door of the church, all out of breath, he heard the parson giving his text. The sight of so many people, and the loud tones of the parson quite confounded poor Jim, who had not for years found himself within the door of a church. The extreme pleasure he had anticipated in telling Mrs. Hopewell her husband's arrival, now left him. He stood for a moment hesitating, whether to return, or attempt to proceed, when moving forward a few steps, he became convinced that ere he could reach the pew in which she sat, the floor would come up, and give him an unpleasant meeting, and as there was no other alternative, he made known his errand to Peter Dowd, the wood-sawyer, who sat in a free pew near the door.

The man who dwells in a crowded city may go and come, be sick and get well again, be rich and become poor, may live and die, and those at his very door scarce know of his existence; but not so with him who has his home in the little village, where all are neighbors, all are friends, and each feels an interest in the other. When Mrs. Hopewell went out of the church, there was such a rustling and whispering all over it, that the parson could scarce proceed with his sermon. All felt quite sure Hopewell had returned, and each felt anxious to see him, but the main question was, whether he had made anything, and anxiously many waited for the sermon to be o'er that it might be answered; but the parson was preaching on total depravity and predestination, which took him a great while to "clear up," and apply to his mind. Dolly Jenkins left while they were singing the doxology, in order to be the first to greet Mr. Hopewell, and learn the success of his three years at the gold regions. Just as she passed by the window, which was open, she heard Mr. Hopewell say to his wife, "I feel I'm a rich man, but I shall not tell every one just how much I've got."

Dolly on her way home from Mr. Hopewell's called at old Mr. Dane's, to tell them what an excellent sermon they had in the morning, and also of Mr. Hopewell's return.

"Lord a' massy!" said the old lady, "then that was he I saw going by in that nice carriage, which I took to be the new doctor that has just come to the upper village."

"Do tell, if Hopewell has really got back?" asked the old gentleman, as he laid aside Baxter's Saint's Rest, in which he had been reading. "I suppose he's got a lot o' gold."

"I guess so," said Dolly, with a significant nod of the head.

"I hope he has," said Mrs. Dane, drawing down the corners of her mouth; for it's too bad for his poor father to have to support his wife and two children for nothing."

"Hush up," said Mr. Dane, "Hopewell has sent home money. I don't know how much, but this is certain she had two hundred dollars about six months after he left."

"O, Mr. Dane, it can't be so," said two female voices together. "I should have heard of it before now," repeated Dolly; "then, if it were true, why didn't she buy herself a new shawl, a better bonnet, or a new silk? And Charlie a hat with a feather in it, like Esq. Belton's boy, and Susan a better tunic, and some pretty ankle-ties?"

"But they will have these things now, I assure you," said Dolly, looking very wise again. "Now I'll tell you just what I know about it," said she, lowering her voice.

Mr. Dane raised his spectacles on his forehead, and the old lady drew her chair close to Dolly as possible, so as not to lose a word.

"I hurried out of church," said Dolly, "and went right down there. You know, of course, I don't approve of making calls Sunday, but still there can be no harm in just dropping in to see a neighbor who has been gone so long. Well, as I was going to say, just as I passed the front window, which was open, I heard him say to his wife, that he was a rich man, but he shouldn't tell everybody just how much he was worth. Now what do you think of that?" said she, and all exchanged meaning glances.

"Before I left," added Dolly, "Mr. Frost and Mr. Bates came in, and they asked him if he had been successful, and he merely replied that he wasn't sorry he went to California, that it was a good place to make money, and so forth; but he didn't say right off how many thousands he had, just as I wanted him to. Now," said Dolly, putting on a serious face, "you must not mention what I first told you, for the world, as I overheard it, and you know the Hopewells and I have always been on the best of terms, and I should be sorry to offend them by repeating anything they wished to keep a secret, but I should like to know his reasons," said Dolly, and she closed her eyes and shook her head, as if some terrible thought haunted her brain. "But then, I suppose it's his oddity—I always thought him odd," added she, as she closed the door, and started on her way home.

Mr. Hopewell was not a little surprised when he went into the street next morning, to receive congratulations from all on his wonderful success at California, and on his return asked his wife, if she could conjecture from whence they gained such an impression.

"Most assuredly, I cannot," replied Mrs. Hopewell, after a moment's thought, "unless Dolly Jenkins heard what you were saying to me as she entered yesterday."

"I was saying that with health and strength, I was a rich man, but I shouldn't tell everybody just how much I was worth. That is it, she heard the latter clause, and thinking she had some secret, has got the whole village to help her keep it."

"I suppose you contradicted the report," said Mrs. Hopewell.

"Contradicted such a report? No, not I," said Mr. Hopewell.

"But what benefit can arise from the whole village believing such a report now, which they must learn to be false by-and-by?" said Mrs. Hopewell, looking a little troubled.

"I don't know what benefit may arise from it, but of this, I am sure, that if it should be known that I have brought home but a few hundreds, no more than I carried away with me, I should be scorned for my stupidity and want of talent to do business. And if I wished to do business here, who would help me? Who would patronize me? There is nothing, Mary, men forget so soon, as the struggle they were obliged to make to get established in business; the many times they were ready to give up in despair, when a little assistance from some one, timely given, would have removed all difficulty; for no sooner does one reach the top round of the ladder, than he looks with astonishment upon the many that are striving to reach the same; wonders that they are obliged to do this or that, to retain their position, and still more at the slow progress they make."

The village of M— nestled closely down upon the banks of a little stream, and was pleasant and flourishing, with its two physicians, two lawyers, three merchants, the judge and county officers. Most of these were related by marriage or otherwise, and boasted with great pride (yes, greater than Mary, Queen of Scots, that she descended from a hundred kings) that they were descended from Col. Ezra Gardner, who had owned the spot on which the village was built.

During the session of court, which was held at this village, some one or more of these gave a party in compliment to the brother lawyers, and others that chanced to be in town, to which few, except the royal family of Gardner were invited. About two weeks after Mr. Hopewell's return, he and his very charming wife, were present at one of these parties at Esq. Belton's, where unexpectedly they found themselves the centre of attraction, and the great theme of conversation, the far-famed gold region.

"How beautiful Mrs. Hopewell looks to-night. Have you called on her since her husband's return?" inquired Mrs. Frost of her cousin Mrs. Wilson.

"No, I have not," replied Mrs. Wilson, "and I feel quite diffident about calling now, I have neglected so long to do so; but you know, Mrs. Frost, it has not been because I didn't wish to, but owing to my poor health. I have made few calls, except among our own relatives. I suppose you have called on her," added Mrs. Wilson.

"No, not since his return; but shall do so at the earliest opportunity," replied Mrs. Frost. "I was very intimate with her a few years ago, but somehow I've not seen her so frequently of late. I entertain the most exalted opinion of her," added Mrs. Frost.

"She is a lovely woman—a model wife," said Mrs. Sprague, the judge's wife, now joining in the conversation, "but I fear we shall lose her soon, for I heard yesterday her husband thought of leaving the village."

"Indeed," said the judge, who caught these last words, "but we must persuade him to remain, he is too valuable a citizen for us to part with."

Many remarks were made to Mr. Hopewell in order to ascertain the amount of his possessions, but in vain.

"I'm glad you've been so fortunate," said Mr. Wilson. "I wish I had money enough, that I might retire from business."

"It's no more than we might expect from one of his abilities and energy," said Judge Sprague, addressing Mr. Wilson.

"I hope Mr. Hopewell will not despise our little village, and seek some other place in which to enjoy his wealth," said Dr. Gray, "and thus we be the losers in the matter."

"I would ask for no lovelier spot than this, in which to enjoy wealth," replied Mr. Hopewell, "but I must do business of some kind; I am far happier when my hands and mind are employed."

"Sure enough, what benefit will it be to me, that the whole village suppose I am rich?" thought Mr. Hopewell, as he returned home, after an hour spent in Judge Sprague's office. "But if I only had a thousand now (yes, that thousand so many wish for in vain), just to start with."

"Why are you looking so serious and thoughtful?" inquired Mrs. Hopewell, not a little troubled.

"Because," replied Mr. Hopewell, "if I had a thousand dollars my fortune would be made, and now, I know not what to do, nor where to go."

"If that is all you want," replied Mrs. Hopewell, her countenance lighting up, "I can let you have it."

"You?" inquired Mr. Hopewell, looking quite surprised; "how came you in possession of a thousand dollars?"

"It is what I have left of the amount you sent me during your absence," replied Mrs. Hopewell, smiling.

"How, and upon what have you lived then, as I have sent you nothing the past year?"

"I have lived as economically as possible, spending not a cent I was not obliged to; for I thought of the toil that won it, and that if you were unfortunate, what I might save would be of some benefit to us, and if you were successful, it could still be applied to use. I let Hannah go soon after you left, and have let rooms in our house till within a short time."

The next week found the returned Californian commencing business with Judge Sprague's son, with the custom and influence of the best half of the town; and as the business was soon doubled by the building of several mills, he soon found himself upon a firm foundation, with nearly as much as he was supposed to start with. He has never regretted that in the village of M— there once lived an old maid, who, having no business of her own to attend to, very generously interested herself in her neighbor's affairs; nor forgotten that a prudent, loving wife is a treasure.

THE GREEKS.

Next to the pleasure enjoyed by the traveller in contemplating the ruins of Greece, must be ranked that of comparing the singularity of the manners of the present inhabitants with those of the ancients. In many of the ordinary practices of life, this resemblance is striking. The hottest hours of the day are still devoted to sleep, as they were in the times recorded by Xenophon, when Conon attempted to escape from the Lacedæmonians at Lesbos, and when Phœbidas surprised the citadel of Thebes. The Greeks still feed chiefly on vegetables, and salted or pickled provisions. The eyebrows of the Greek women are still blackened by art, and their cheeks painted occasionally with red and white, as described by Xenophon. This latter custom, in particular, is universal in Zante among the upper classes. The laver from which water is poured from the hand, previous to eating, appears by many passages in the Odyssey to have been a common utensil in the time of Homer; and something like the small, movable table universally used in the Levant, seems to have been common amongst the ancient Greeks. According to Herodotus, in his description of the banquet given by the Theban Antigonus to Mardonius and the chiefs of the Persian army, there were two men, a Persian and a Theban, placed at each table, which circumstance, being so particularly remarked, was probably a deviation from the custom of each person having a table to himself.—Turner's Tour in the Levant.

If rich, it is easy enough to conceal our wealth but, if poor, it is not quite so easy to conceal our poverty. We shall find that it is less difficult to hide a thousand guineas, than one hole in our coat.

CASE OF CONSCIENCE.

"Friend Broadbrim," said Zephaniah Straight-lace to his master, a rich Quaker in the city of Brotherly Love, "thou canst not eat of mutton at the noon-tide meal to day."

"Wherefore not?" asked the good Quaker.

"Because the dog that appertaineth to that son of Belial, whom the world calleth Foxcraft, hath come into my pantry and stolen it, yea, eaten it up."

"Beware, friend Zephaniah, of bearing false witness against thy neighbor. Art thou sure it was friend Foxcraft's domestic animal?"

"Yea, verily, I saw it with my own eyes, and it was lawyer Foxcraft's large dog, even Pinch'em."

"Upon what evil times we have fallen," sighed the harmless Quaker, as he wended his way to the office of his neighbor.

"Friend Gripus," said he, "I want to ask thy opinion."

"I am all attention," replied the scribe, laying down his pen.

"Supposing, friend Foxcraft, that my dog had gone into my neighbor's pantry and stolen therefrom a leg of mutton, and I saw him, and I could call him by name, what ought I to do?"

"Pay for the mutton; nothing can be more clear."

"Know then, friend Foxcraft, thy dog, even that men denominate Pinch'em, hath stolen from my pantry a leg of mutton, of the just value of four shillings and sixpence, which I paid for it in the market this morning."

"O, well, then it is my opinion that I must pay for it." And having received the amount, the worthy friend turned to depart.

"Tarry a little, friend Broadbrim," said the lawyer. "Of a verity I have yet further to say unto thee. Thou owest me nine shillings for advice."

"Then verily, I must pay thee, and it is my opinion that I have touched pitch and been defiled."—Christian Freeman.

A LIFE OF ROMANCE.

The Breton, of Nantes, France, gives an account of the recent death in that city, of an old woman, named Juliette Davy, who for more than half her life wore men's clothes, and was not known to be a female. During the great revolution she embraced the Royalist cause with fervor, and being captured by the Republicans, was condemned to deportation, which in those days meant death, but was pardoned on her declaring her sex, and reassuming female attire. Some time afterwards, she entered as a seaman on board a French merchant vessel, and being taken prisoner by the English, she was eight years confined at the hulks at Portsmouth. On her sex being discovered, she was released, and returned to France with an exchange of prisoners. On her arrival at Nantes, near which she was born, she entered into service as a laborer, but was eventually induced to resume the dress of her sex, and to take a place as a servant in a religious community, where she remained fifteen years. After that period, however, she again resumed the occupations to which she had been accustomed as a laborer, alternately wearing male or female attire.

THE BRIGHTEST SIDE.

BY BELL BRANDON.

Behind yon canopy of cloud
 The monarch of the day is sinking,
 And as he fades, I think aloud
 Of what I have all day been thinking;
 A voice, not loud, but plain to all,
 Is breathed all day from that bright ball,
 "Like me, in poverty or pride,
 Look always on the brightest side."

See how, his daily labor done,
 He glides the blackest clouds with light,
 O, may you always, like the sun,
 Shed golden hues on sorrow's night;
 For life is but a cloud at best,
 Though bright the robes with which 'tis dressed,
 Remember, then, what'er betide,
 Look always on the brightest side.

O, learn to imitate the sun,
 To gild, like him, the clouds of sorrow,
 And when at eve your labor's done,
 You'll think with joy upon to-morrow;
 And were that eve the eve of life,
 The sleep of death will end the strife,
 And then you'll cross the chasm wide,
 And be upon the brightest side.

EVELYN'S TRIAL.

BY ELLA A. WELTON.

"Now tell me how it happened, Milly, for mama will never let me know; and what hurt can it possibly do, now that the mischief is done?"

"Please, Miss Evelyn, I don't dare. Mistresses would not like it, if I told you."

"She shall never know it, Milly. Nobody will hear you tell me, and I promise—see, I cross my two little fingers, and say I will never let anybody know that I have heard anything about it."

"Well, then—you know I can't refuse you anything, my darling, and Miss Maria won't be home very soon, and perhaps I will tell you some things that happened about that time."

"Milly, tell me all. I don't want half a story, and have to guess the other half. Tell me the whole truth. Tell me, Milly," I continued, bursting into tears, "how I came to be such a frightful looking child."

"Don't say so, Miss Evelyn. It is wicked. It was God's will, and you must not murmur at it."

I covered my face, and wept bitterly. Was it God's will, that I should be so repulsive to all around me—that the poor, mutilated cheek and eye should so repulse all loving hearts from me—that while others, who had no beauty in their hearts, no intellect comparable with mine, none of the strong, imperishable, passionate love which I knew was in my heart, they would be petted, caressed, fondled, while I must stand aloof, with my strange, sad look, longing, dying for that which was bestowed upon them, yet not daring to approach? Was it God's will?

Milly Carr had been my mother's head servant before I was born—a sort of upper woman—a housekeeper if you will, and the confidant of the whole household. Nothing was ever done without Milly's advice and consent. She ruled my mother, people said. At any rate, she never resisted Milly. I had known my mother to promise a thing, and Milly to prevent the performance, just by a look of warning.

Milly's story was short and hurried. She looked frequently to the door, shut down the window, and sat upon the edge of her chair, with her hand on her knee, ready to start in a moment, all the time she was telling me. Tyrant as she was, she yet feared to commit the breach of trust to which I had been urging her.

The story was short, as I said. It was a wild tale of miserable weakness, of passionate temper, of long, long repentance, and the crushing down of a noble heart. As it unfolded, I learned my mother's causeless jealousy of my father, who, on discovering that she cherished it, went away from his home, and had never returned—that on the night when he left her, nearly distracted with her feelings, she had taken glass after glass of wine, until she was perfectly stupefied, and had been put to bed—that after Milly, who slept with her, was asleep, she rose, took me from my cradle, and sat as they supposed, rocking me by the fire.

"I woke up," said Milly, "with a great start, hearing you cry out. I sprang out of bed, and ran to the fire. There you lay with the red-hot andiron against your little head. I took you up, and saw that it had burned deep into your neck and cheek, and injured your eye. I thought you were dead, but you revived, and I covered the burns as well as I could, but they were too deep to heal without terrible scars."

"If I had only died, Milly!"

"Hush, child! Was not your poor mother punished enough by seeing that frightful mark upon the face of her delicate baby, without the feeling of having killed it? Besides, have you no thankfulness that lips and forehead and nose were not destroyed? Is it not something, that the scars were just where they were?"

"O, Milly, you are too hard upon me. I do feel thankful for what was not done—but is it not hard that I am so frightful as I am?"

"You are not frightful, Miss Evelyn. Your skin was so fair, that it was impossible to mar it one atom without showing it a great deal. It is only when you are angry that the spots look crimson, and at other times your eye shows but very little difference to the other, and your hair covers the worst scars in your neck. No, indeed, Miss Evelyn, you are not so terrible as you think; neither are people so much repulsed by you. It is only because you seem so shy and conscious, that it makes every one avoid you, just so as not to hurt your feelings."

"Well, dear Milly, would you have me go up to strangers, and say, 'Look at these scars, see how they deform me!'"

"No need of that, dear. People see it fast enough. All people notice it; I won't deceive you about that—but all people do not think so much of it. I often hear it said of you, 'how beautiful Evelyn would be, if it were not for that unfortunate scar.' Often too, they say how much you resemble your father, and he was a man of very noble presence, and very sensitive, too, like yourself. So don't be so very, very sensitive, for it has been the cause of very great unhappiness already in this family."

"Where is my father, Milly?" said I, suddenly.

"At New Orleans. He supports the family, but will not probably return. Your mother has long ago retracted what she said, but it seems that he cannot get over it. She has thought of sending Maria out to him. She will not tell me if she wants her to go in order to be reconciled to him or not, but I have no doubt that that is her sole reason."

Milly's evident sympathy cheered me under what I called my terrible trial. She grew eloquent under the story she was relating to me. Milly had not always been a servant, but sorrow and affliction had come early upon her, and she was glad to accept the situation my mother had offered her. At least, I had thought always that my mother offered it, but now that she had begun to talk of my father, she told me that he had asked her to stay in his house, and watch over his family as long as she lived.

I knew then that there was love in my father's heart, that no earthly power could drive out, and I put my childish wits to work at once. I determined, if possible, to make my mother substitute me for Maria. Maria was two years older than I, but not half so brave and courageous. I had acquired strength and self-dependence by my strolls in the forest path, and on the tops of high mountains. My loneliness had taught me courage, and my personal misfortunes had brought me fortitude, notwithstanding my occasional murmurings. I had also become acquainted with a child a year or two older than myself, whose father went on repeated voyages to New Orleans; and only the night before she had told me that she was going with him on his next voyage, and her mother also. What an opportunity this would be. Nobody would miss me, for my rambling, out-of-doors life, prescribed by the physicians, precluded me from much indoor conversation with the family, and Maria was far too lady-like to share what she called my wandering and vagrant habits.

My course was soon taken. I went to our good family attendant, Dr. Blair, and laid the case before him—told him my whole soul, my weariness of life, my disappointments already experienced, so sad for a child to feel—and then begged his intercession with my mother to allow me to accompany Capt. Freeland. From an infant Doctor Blair had shown me a consideration which no one else had ever done. He remembered my early misfortune, and had always told Maria, that she was not nearly equal to me in understanding and intellect, and under all circumstances, had stood my fast friend. The plan which I unfolded, tickled his fancy wonderfully, and after making me detail all that I had thought of doing, he promised to use his influence with my mother.

The result was, that I was got ready by Milly's active hands, and my mother had drilled me thoroughly into an understanding of what I must do, when I arrived at New Orleans. Mrs. Freeland was taken into confidence as well as the captain, and as to Maria, she was only too glad to get rid of the responsibility which was about to have been thrown upon her.

And now I was upon the ocean, and the large ship bearing me towards a father, whom, only three weeks before I had not known existed. It was a bright experience for me; for now, for the first time in my life, I began to find myself appreciated. I felt myself actually beloved by the kind friends who had taken me in charge, and a new world was opened to me in the respectful admiration which the mates and the whole crew exhibited at my courage and daring, while the caresses and love of Sophia Freeland made me feel that I was worthy to be loved for myself. I had not known my power until now. My mother had always neglected me, and Milly had made only a baby of me. I was a young lady voyaging now, and quite adequate to meet any emergency likely to occur on the voyage!

As we neared New Orleans, I did not tremble, nor grow faint for a moment, when I thought of meeting my father. Indeed, I enjoyed the thought of being with him, and anticipated a great deal of satisfaction in discharging my commission to him from my mother.

"How well you look this morning," said Sophia, as I put on my bonnet to go on shore. I looked in the glass, and appropriated her compliment without any remorse whatever. I was looking better than ever before. The slight brown which the salt water had bestowed upon me, was more than compensated by the accession of bright, rosy color, and the happiness I had enjoyed had given brightness to my eyes. I had the unspeakable satisfaction of knowing that I was no longer repulsive to myself nor my friends. How it gladdened my heart! I felt that Milly would have rejoiced to see me looking so well and happy. Captain Freeland was waiting for me, or my thoughts would have run into a long train of probabilities for the future. A carriage conveyed us to the street in which my father's business was located. Over the door of the immense warehouse before which it stopped, was a large sign, bearing my father's name—Theodore Van Horn. A moment after, we were making our way through bales and boxes to the door of the counting-room, where sat a gentleman whom I was afraid to think was my father. Captain Freeland led me up to him, however, and said simply:

"Mr. Van Horn, I have the pleasure of presenting your daughter."

I looked earnestly into his face for a few seconds, and he held me at arm's length, as if to examine me closely. Then he drew me to his bosom, and I saw tears in the mild blue eyes. I could not speak, for I feared he did not like me; but as to me, my heart went out to him instantly. It seemed as if here, at last, I should find the love which had been denied me at home.

It was my father, then! I, who had so longed, so yearned for a father's love, had now come to the full measure of my hopes, and was beloved by him! That I could see at once. This handsome, noble, intelligent looking man, whose dark locks had but the slightest sprinkling of snow, and whose soul looked out in the fulness of all generous emotions from the blue eyes, was my father! How I blessed Maria's indolent and unadventurous spirit for giving me this unspeakable pleasure. Captain Freeland had generously left us together, and we talked long and earnestly. I found that my father still loved his wife devotedly, notwithstanding the breach between them. Young as I was, I promised to my own soul, that I would yet reconcile my parents, and that ours should no longer be a divided family. I told him of the severely secluded life which my mother had always led—of the pain with which she shrank from any questioning of her former life on which my childish curiosity had ever ventured, and of my finally only obtaining the scanty information that Milly had given me.

"And on these grounds you—a slight little girl of fourteen, braved all this to find me?"

I looked laughingly in his face, and said: "Indeed, papa, you are quite worth the trouble."

It was the happiest day I had ever known, and my happiness extended into days and weeks. My father's love shone upon my hitherto desolate heart like a great flood of sunshine, warming it into happiness, and reflecting a light almost beautiful upon my face. The cold winds of the North had always made my scars of a bluish tinge, which showed frightfully conspicuous, as I thought. Here, the warm air had equalized the current of blood, and they showed but little in comparison.

"Captain Freeland sails to-morrow, Evelyn? Have you any commands for home?" said my father, as we walked out early one morning.

"Commands for home! Why, am I not going home with him? I thought I was to bear the news of your forgiveness and love to my poor mother! Indeed, sir, you must, you will send her that consolation."

"I will, child, but not by you. You shall remain, and I will send for the family. You have done your mission well, and henceforth, I will be a husband and a father, while all that is past shall be buried in oblivion."

I clasped my hands in silent thankfulness. Once more then, our roof-tree should echo sounds of gladness, which the long, weary term of separation had never heard. How glad I was.

My father wrote immediately. Captain Freeland was to bring them all, when he came again; and meantime, my father busied himself in preparing an elegant and luxurious home, of which I was to be the mistress until my mother's arrival. It was so strange to me, to have my taste consulted, and my opinions asked—I who had never been allowed at home the privilege of a single thought—I now sat at my father's table, and entertained company with a grace that pleased him, and drew forth praises all the sweeter because hitherto unknown by me.

I amused myself by thinking what Maria would say to see me thus—Maria, whose opinion of her sister was founded entirely on the principle that I was not fit to be seen. How grateful I was to my father for thus giving me a sort of faith and confidence in myself. I was no longer shy, awkward and embarrassed. I became dignified and self-possessed with strangers, and what was more and better, playful and cheerful at home.

"Milly must come, father."

"Certainly. These servants must never know, however, that she has served us. Milly shall be a lady in our home. I owe her much for her steady good will towards me, at a time when the nearest and dearest turned against me."

So Milly's room was prepared, and as carefully decked as any other in the house; and I begged for the adjoining one. Maria's was on the other side of the house, and all of them evinced my father's taste and wealth. My own room was a large, square one with white and gilt furniture, straw matting of an excellent quality, white hangings, and with a dressing-room attached, in which was everything requisite to a complete toilet. I was in raptures with all. We had been ready for more than a week, and waiting anxiously for my mother to arrive, when one bright, glad morning, my father knocked loudly at my door, and bade me rise to receive her, as the ship had already been telegraphed. I rose, dressed myself very carefully in one of the many dresses which my father had bought for me, had my hair arranged so as to hide my disfigured cheek, and sat down in our coolest room to await her. My father went out, and was gone several hours. When he came in, she from whom he had been absent so many years was hanging on his arm, and Maria followed them with Milly. The joy of that meeting was chastened and subdued by the remembrance of the weary years that had gone by since they met before; but it was very pleasant to see the confiding smile which my mother turned towards her husband, whom notwithstanding her causeless jealousy, she had never ceased to love. It was pleasant to see how fondly he regarded her, and how little he noticed the ravages which age was making in her pale face.

"We will have that pale face looking brighter, Evelyn," he said to me, as I stopped before my mother, a little proud I think, to show her what I had become, since I left her.

"Can this be Evelyn?" said she, "so improved—so handsome, even?"

Did I ever expect my mother to utter words like that?

"Yes," said my father, "Evelyn is called very beautiful. My little Maria, too—pretty, very pretty, but not at all comparable to Evelyn."

I could hardly believe what he said, and should have thought it irony, had my father ever talked ironically. He did not.

We settled into a quiet family, Milly bearing rule and sway as of old. I saw my mother's cheek brighten daily into light and beauty, until she recovered her good looks entirely. Discord never again entered our household. Seeing me such a favorite with my father, and adopting, as the whole family did, his opinions, they came to think of me as truly lovable; and after a regular course of visiting the house, as performed by young Carlos Hazlewood, they were all content to think that it was not Maria, but poor, homely Evelyn herself, that he waited for so patiently to grow old enough to wed.

That Maria, too, has had her conquests, is sufficiently substantiated by the fact that there is an elderly man, not quite so handsome, and a very little older than my father, who is very apt to call her wife in speaking of her; and that his two sons, fine, manly, interesting youths, are ways addressing her as mother.

Truly life is strange. One would have thought three years ago that Carlos would be just the right match for a delicate creature like Maria—while it would hardly have been deemed possible that I could have hoped for a husband even so old and homely as Maria's Mr. Heathfield.

There is an inexpressible satisfaction to me in the re-union of my parents. One would never suppose that they had been separated for a moment. If my mother's heart ever swells with the remembrance of the past, my father's beautiful devotion to her overcomes her regrets.

She sometimes looks at me with a sad, remorseful look, but I gaily turn the other side of my face towards her, and bid her to look at my perfections instead of my deformities. Long ago Milly told her that I knew all, and that she was forgiven.

Strange to say, I have suddenly risen to be the most important person in the family. Who would have thought it—that poor, plain little Evelyn would have grown into such estimation?

Carlos has just come in, and with a high-headed insolence very unbecoming in him, is actually looking over my pages, and smiling ironically at my self-praise. I am explaining to him, that as my childhood did not receive its meed of approbation, I must do what I can to remedy the deficiency. If my experience will teach those who have children who are unusually susceptible to neglect or carelessness from those who are with them, and peculiarly sensitive from any personal defect or misfortune, to grow tender and patient, and loving to them all the more, I shall not regret having written it out.

MAY.

BY MARTHA T. MENDON.

Bright May is here, her lap brimful of treasures,
 And half-made wreaths are strewn upon the ground;
 Sweet, merry children revel in her pleasures,
 And dimpled arms e'en now are bare and brown;
 Health bids defiance to the cooling zephyr,
 That lifts the sleeve above the shoulder fair;
 And nimble feet fly lightly o'er the heather;
 O, laughing childhood! ever bright and fair.

Is there one heart so careworn and so weary,
 That cannot feel the witching smiles of May?
 Is there one hearth so desolate and dreary,
 That her soft sunbeams dare not round it play?
 If so, 'twere vain to picture forth her beauties,
 And write of birds, and flowers, and pleasant things;
 O, let us pause amid our daily duties,
 And feel the freshness May's sweet presence brings.

Bright month of beauties! modest, graceful May,
 Sweeter and fairer than thy sister June;
 Dear, favorite month, O couldst thou longer stay!
 Thou'rt forced to yield thy charms, alas, too soon!
 Thy prouder sister in her rich attire
 Will soon be here to take the place of spring;
 Although June's blushing beauties all admire,
 To the sweet freshness of May's charms I'll cling.

What is it makes me hold sweet May the dearest—
 The best of months—the rival and the belle?
 What is it makes me feel to heaven the nearest,
 When the blue violets open in the dell?
 Is it because fond, tender recollections
 Cling round the lovely May-time of my life?
 Ere the young flower-buds of my heart's affection
 Had withered 'neath the hand of care and strife?

O, there are faces pleasant to remember,
 Bright, love-lit eyes, now closed in death's long sleep;
 In May the memories of the past seem tender,
 So tender that I sometimes sit and weep.
 How oft I see young children with May-baskets, Filled with sweet flowers they've gathered o'er the heather;
 O, there is room in memory's jewelled casket
 To hold the flower-gems that I shrine forever.

THE OLD MAN'S SECRET.

BY MRS. C. F. GERRY.

It was a wild sky that bent over the Highlands of the Hudson, but wilder yet was the face of old Richard Duncroft, as he paced to and fro in front of his great, rambling, half-ruined farmhouse. His pale, thin cheek burned as if with a plague-spot, his features worked convulsively, his keen, gray eyes flashed with a strange fire.

"Grandfather, grandfather, do come in out of the storm," murmured a sweet, low voice, and a young and matchlessly beautiful girl moved to his side, and tossing back a wealth of rich curls, looked beseechingly up at his troubled countenance.

"No, no," growled the restless old man; "I can't sit moping over the fire the whole evening. Get into the house, I say! and, Jessie Gray, don't disturb me again!"

Thus repulsed, the girl stole silently back to the dwelling, and Duncroft resumed his hasty walk.

"Richard, my husband," said his wife, brokenly, "don't leave me alone in my old age. I know not what evil genius has taken possession of you, but I must beg you to go no more on these strange errands! O, Richard, if you have any pleasant memories of the old times, you will not break my poor heart," and the hand which had been given him at the altar, trembled on his arm. But he shook it off with a rude gesture, muttering between his teeth:

"What meddlers women are! Rachel, not another word of this nonsense! I'll not have my footsteps dogged like a school-boy's—I'll have you understand that I shall come and go as my will dictates!"

The injured wife shrank sobbing away, and scarcely had the door closed after her, ere a triumphant laugh rang out on the fierce blast, and a third female figure confronted the old man.

"Richard, Richard Duncroft," she said hoarsely, and her long, bony fingers tightened around his like bird's claws; "you have had your day—my hour has come now!"

"Meg Marston!" were the only words that dropped from Duncroft's lips.

"Yes, Meg Marston—Meg Reed once! Old man, when you and I were young, I loved you—ay, madly loved! For a time you seemed to like me, but by-and-by you turned from what you used to call my gipsyish beauty, to that pale, blue-eyed woman whom you have just sent from you in a passion of tears. I wrestled with my disappointment—I grew sullen at first, then reckless; I have hated both you and your wife, for years and years! Is it strange, that every grief of hers now is sweet to me?"

She paused, and with a mocking smile, Duncroft retorted:

"But what is that to me, since you are powerless to avenge yourself?"

"Powerless! We shall see, Richard Duncroft." And as she spoke, she drew up her slight figure, and stood erect before him—her thin lips rigid with determination, her dark, basilisk eyes burning with a fiercer light, her tangled gray hair floating about a face stormy with conflicting passions. With bitter emphasis she went on:

"Men say a fearful shadow has fallen on Dick Duncroft's life, and even they of his own house—hold have learned to tremble at his approach. Night after night he goes on a mysterious mission; that mission is the cause of the change which has come over him—Duncroft, I know the old man's secret." And bending down she whispered a few words in his ear.

Richard Duncroft started, as if a pen of fire had written out before him, as the mystic hand wrote on Belshazzar's palace-walls—"Thou art weighed in the balance, and found wanting." His frame shook from head to foot, every trace of color left his face, and though his white lips parted nervously, he could not speak.

"This blow strikes home, does it?" continued the woman, tauntingly, "you didn't dream that anybody knew; you thought yourself secure. But you are in the power of one whose tender mercies are cruelties; in the course of two hours, the whole of the town authorities shall be made acquainted with your guilt."

She gathered her red cloak around her, drew on her close hood, and was turning away, when Duncroft sprang forward.

"Stay, stay, Meg Marston, stay!" he gasped; "if you leave me in this mood, I am a lost man."

The woman stopped, but her sole answer was a savage laugh.

"Can nothing be done to induce you to keep my secret? I have gold enough—name your price, and I will pay it, even to the uttermost farthing."

Meg Marston shook her head.

"Price?" she echoed. "It is hard to set a price on such knowledge as mine. Besides, I am rich—the wealthiest woman in the county. Do you think you can offer me anything that will bribe me to hold my tongue?"

Duncroft looked at her hard face, and a long shudder crept over him, while Meg again made a movement to go.

"Stop!" he cried; "before you and I part, we must come to terms. Detection—trial—imprisonment—I can't meet them. Speak out, Meg Marston. What shall I give you to consent to silence?"

The woman hesitated; then, as if a sudden thought had struck her, she rejoined:

"You have a granddaughter, an inmate of your household. She's young, and beautiful, and romantic, and don't fancy my son, but, Richard Duncroft, if you would conciliate me, give Jessie Gray to him."

"What! to Paul Marston, the pest of the Highlands?"

"The same," was the cool reply.

"He's old enough to be her father; she de-spises him, and so does everybody else. O, Meg, I am not totally lost to a sense of justice—I can't bid my fair, pure Jessie marry your villainous son."

"Very well. It matters not to me. Good-night; we shall not meet again, till I stand up in court to accuse you."

A bitter groan broke from the old man's lips.

"Is there no other door to your heart, Meg?" He faltered.

"None;" and now a grim smile flickered over her features; "they were all shut to you forty years ago."

"But I love the girl. She is an orphan, my dead Marion's only child, her last legacy to me—she would rise from the grave to haunt me, if I should do such a wrong."

"I cannot help it—I am inexorable. The bride for my son, or the revelation of the old man's secret—what say you?"

"Meg Marston, you almost drive me mad," cried Duncroft, wildly smiting his forehead; "I cannot think clearly in your presence. Give me some time to reflect."

"Be it as you wish. At eleven o'clock you usually leave the farm house for the valley below. Meet me by the stump of the blasted chestnut, as you go to your task."

"I will."

The strange woman glided away, and again Richard Duncroft was alone with his own thoughts. The storm still raged; the rain beat down in torrents, the wind swept up in fitful gusts from the turbulent waters of the Hudson, and heavy clouds surged across the sky, like the billows of an unknown sea, drifting on, on, on to the "night's Plutonian shore." For a while Duncroft did not seem to heed the tempest, but at length, when a great hickory close by came crashing to the earth, he started, gazed half-bewildered around him, and then moved into the house.

There had been a time when the family sitting-room at Duncroft Farm was a cheerful place, but now it was very dismal there. The shadow which had settled on the old man's heart, had fallen on his home. The fire burned low on the hearth-stone, and two silent figures sat rocking to and fro in the pale light—one was his wife, the other his grandchild. Both looked wistfully at him, as he sank into his high-backed chair, but neither dared speak. By-and-by, however, the girl rose to stir the dying embers, and stealing towards him, crept to her old place at his feet. Ah! what an hour was that for Richard Duncroft. He marked the faultless contour of her face and figure, the rich ripples of her shining, golden hair, the graceful bend of her white neck, the flexible sweetness of the small, delicately-chiselled mouth, the mournful, yet tender light of the soft, blue eyes, through which the eyes of the dead Marion seemed gazing at him in stern reproach; and the conflict between good and evil grew strong within him. Should he doom that girl in the dew of her youth, with all the generous impulses of her nature—should he doom her to marry Paul Marston, the terror of the neighborhood? While Duncroft sat thus, absorbed in his painful reverie, a quick, firm step sounded on the gravel walk outside, and then came a knock at the hall door. Jessie hurried to open it, and her grandfather heard her say in a tone of sweet surprise:

"Why, Arthur! What can have brought you here in this pouring rain?"

"I will tell you," replied the new-comer, in a deep, musical voice; "I could not sleep till I had seen you. I watched you at church yesterday, and it seemed to me as if you had grown thin and pale, since our last meeting. Are you ill, Jessie?"

"No," murmured the girl.

"But you are unhappy—am I in any way connected with your sorrow?"

"O, no, no, no, Arthur! You are all that is good, and noble, and true."

"Thank God, that you think so! I would rather die, than give your young heart a single pang." There was a moment's silence, ere Arthur Minot added: "If you have a new grief, Jessie, I am sure you will not hesitate to speak of it to me."

"I have not."

"Then it must be you are still anxious about your grandfather—"

"Hush!" interposed the girl; "he is in the sitting-room now."

The old man heard no more, and soon afterward the door was closed, and Jessie came back with a soft flush on her cheek, and the smile with which she had listened to Arthur Minot's parting words yet hovering about her lips. But her presence, and that of his wretched wife, only made the warfare in his soul more terrible, and with a gruff command, he sent them away.

Time wore wearily on, and at last Richard Duncroft was aroused from his troubled musings by the striking of the old-fashioned clock. It was eleven—a decisive hour in his destiny. Meg Marston was awaiting him at the trysting-place—what would his answer be? A skilful physiognomist would have told from the resolute expression of his face, as he buttoned his coat, and went hastily out. While he had been in the house, the thick clouds had parted here and there, and through their rifts the moon shed a ghastly glimmer over the well-trodden path to the valley. In a few moments, he had reached the blackened stump of the old chestnut. Meg stood beneath it stern as ever, and as repulsive as those weird women whom Macbeth met on the lonesome heath.

"So, you've come;" croaked she, as he drew near, "well, what will you do?"

"I have loved Jessie fondly," replied Duncroft; "but I have begun a dangerous game—I must play it out, though a legion of fiends stand at my heels. I can never consent to have this hoarded secret blazoned to the world. Your Paul, villain as he is, shall be my son-in-law."

"Agreed—there's my hand on it," said Meg, and her hard, brown hand fastened upon his in a vice-like grasp.

"You promise solemnly not to betray me," added Duncroft.

"I promise. I'll be as dumb as a stone with regard to your secret. And you will let Jessie Gray know at once for whom she is destined."

"Most assuredly."

Thus they parted—Meg Marston to seek her home, and Richard Duncroft to re-commence his mysterious work. It was in the dull, gray dawn that he reached his house, but early as it was, Jessie was up, and making his coffee by the kitchen fire. It was evident that she had not slept at all, for her face looked haggard in the morning light, and her eyes were red and heavy. But his purpose did not falter.

"Jessie," said he, sternly, "Arthur Minot was here last night—why does he come to see you so often?"

The rich blood mounted even to the girl's pale brow, but she was silent.

"He professes to love you, don't he?" continued her grandfather.

"He does, sir."

"And you—you fancy you love him, I suppose from your blushes."

"I love him with all my heart," was the straight-forward reply.

"And perhaps you have hoped some day to be his wife," added the old man.

"Yes, grandfather, we are already betrothed, and Arthur will be over to-night to beg your sanction."

"Girl, hear me," rejoined Richard Duncroft, bringing his clenched fist down on the deal table to enforce his words; "you shall never marry that young Minot—never, never. I have another match for you. There is one who has long loved you, and sought to win you—Jessie Gray, you shall be his wife before you are three months older."

"And who is he?" faltered the girl.

"A man who need not depend on his daily toil to keep you from starving—Paul Marston!"

Poor Jessie lifted her blue eyes to his with a gaze that would have melted a heart that had not grown hard in sin.

"God help me!" she gasped, and staggering back, she leaned against the dark oaken wainscot trembling in every limb. "Paul Marston," she went on, "an Ishmaelite in the earth—a villain, who would have been in the penitentiary ere this time, if by his craft he had not eluded the eye of the law. O, grandfather, you will not bind me to him for life! You will not doom me to a living death!"

"My resolution is taken. It will do no good to whimper and fret; submission is the only way for you. Prepare to receive Paul Marston as your accepted lover."

For a time there was profound silence within the low kitchen, but outside the wind broke into a sob, and the old pear-tree which swept over the quaint, diamond-shaped panes, writhed as if a tortured human heart were throbbing at its roots. Then the girl flung herself at Richard Duncroft's feet, and poured forth a wild appeal, which would have deeply moved him in his better days, but through it all he stood there, unbending as a statue. The Rubicon of his fate had been crossed when he met Meg Marston in the valley, and now he was strong in his evil resolves.

"Jessie, you would make a good actress," he said in a tone of cutting irony, when she paused in her passionate plea; "such a scene as that just enacted would win you fame and fortune on the stage, but it is quite lost on me. Again I say you shall be Paul Marston's wife, and that too, at any time he may set."

With these words he left her, slamming the door after him in his rage, and a half hour later, when Jessie's grandmother came in, she found her sitting on the rough tiles of the hearth, like one turned into stone. But Dame Duncroft's soft touch on her forehead, together with her gentle voice, awakened her from her strange lethargy, and bursting into tears, she sobbed out the story of her last trial.

That night, just as the candles were lighted in the lonesome sitting-room at Duncroft Farm, there was a loud rap at the front door. The old man answered the summons, and the next moment ushered in Paul Marston. He was a short, thick-set man, with a bold, black eye, a sinister and thickly-bearded lip, and a swaggering air. Villain was stamped as plainly on every feature as though it had been written there with the point of a diamond, and it was no wonder that Jessie Gray shrank into a window-recess as he approached.

"'Tis Jessie I've come to see," he began, with a knowing look at Duncroft; "Jessie, you know—not you, nor her grandmother."

"She was in the room when I went to the door," replied his host; "I will call her."

"O, there she is!" cried Marston, whose keen glance, after roving around, had espied the slight figure which had crept into the shadows; and he sauntered to her side.

"Good evening, Jessie," he said familiarly; "I suppose I need not trouble myself to put on the Miss now, as things have gone so far. No doubt you know why I've come here to night."

"Yes," replied Jessie, "and I have told my grandfather how utterly repulsive the idea of such a marriage is to me. He knows my whole being rebels, but he is odurate; so I must try an appeal to you. Mr. Marston, would you drag to the altar a bride, who went there like a victim to a sacrifice?"

Paul Marston burst into a coarse laugh.

"I'll tell ye what, Jessie Gray," he resumed, "all these fine speeches are wasted on a man of my make; they'd do better for a learned collegian, like Arthur Minot. But one thing is certain, I shall not give up my promised wife—no, no, no!" and by the expression of his countenance, poor Jessie knew that he cared not to win a willing bride—that he deemed it more of a triumph to carry off, in spite of herself, a lady who had thrice refused him.

"You needn't look so grim about it," he continued; "you won't have a bad bargain after all. I am going to fit up my old mansion in a style that will make the Highlanders stare. You can ride in your carriage, and be a lady in every respect. And now for the wedding-day; it is customary for the bride to set that, so I leave it to you. Name it, and put a man out of suspense;" and the rich boor imprisoned the fingers which were drumming hard against the casement.

"Never!" said Jessie, with a firmness which for a moment astonished him. Then he laughed again, and replied:

"Aha! I like your spirit, little girl. Well, as you won't fix the day, I will. Let me see—how long will it take to get ready? If we make haste, we can crowd the preparations into six weeks. Yes, that will do—six weeks from to-night then, Miss Jessie Gray shall be transformed into Mrs. Paul Marston."

Jessie made no answer, and after several attempts to arouse her to some alight degree of animation, he left her.

Hours afterward, when she had gone to her own little chamber, the only man-servant at Duncroft Farm brought her a note which ran thus :

"DEAREST JESSIE :—A terrible rumor has reached me, but I cannot believe it, until I have the confirmation from your own lips. Come out to the stile, where we have sometimes met—there I shall wait for you in the wild hope that you can set my heart at rest. ARTHUR."

Tears sprang to Jessie's blue eyes as she read this, and hurrying on her shawl and gipsy hat, she stole down the back stair-case, and glided through a door, which had been carelessly left half open. She had crossed the garden, when a heavy hand fell upon her shoulder, and her grandfather cried sneeringly :

"Going to meet that young Minot, weren't ye? Well, well, I've outwitted ye both. I saw him lurking about, and kept watch. Jessie Gray, your interviews with him are at an end."

Rudely he hurried her back to the house, and thrusting her into her own chamber, locked the door upon her, while Arthur Minot, after looking long and vainly for Jessie, rode homeward with a heavy heart.

Six weeks had gone by, since the events which have just been narrated, yet they had brought little but gloom to the old house at Duncroft Farm. Richard Duncroft was yet wrapt in the mystery which had enshrouded him for the last three months ; every night he went out on his strange mission, every passing day found him paler, and thinner, and fiercer in his mood. It was apparent enough that the old man's secret, like the vulture of the Caucasus, was eating away at the heart's core. His poor wife looked wan and wasted, and Jessie, once the light and joy of the household, came and went, pale and listless. A strict watch was kept upon her movements, and so she had not seen Arthur Minot ; but once he had managed to convey to her a brief note, which shed some balm on her wounded spirit.

"Jessie," he wrote, "I waited for you till midnight, by the stile that leads to the rye-field, and for the first time since you learned to love me, waited in vain. I do not believe you stood aloof from your own choice—I no more doubt you, than I should an angel in heaven. The thought of seeing you the wife of Paul Marston is madness. I must save you from such a fate. Take courage, dearest—a brighter day will yet dawn for us. Meanwhile, Arthur Minot will be on the alert."

This assurance threw a transient gleam of light across the poor girl's path, but the next news with regard to her gallant lover, sent a chill through every vein—he had been shot at by some unknown foe, while riding through a lonely forest, and been carried to a woodman's hut by a traveller who chanced to be near ; there he still lay in a high fever and delirious. When Jessie heard that, her last hope fled, and she moved about like an automaton.

It was on a sultry, September day, that she was riding along one of the most romantic of the Highland roads. Fleecy clouds sailed like white swans over the sky ; some of the trees were already beginning to grow gay with autumnal tints ; the wayside was all aflame with golden and scarlet blossoms, and the merry songs of the laborers, who were gathering in the rich harvest, rang out on every hand. But scenes which had once charmed the young girl, now brought no lustre to her eye, no bloom to her cheek. It mattered not to her that she was seated in a carriage fit for a duchess, and drawn by a pair of superb blood-horses. Beside her sat Paul Marston, and she was returning from a visit she had been compelled to make—a visit to the home destined for her. Marston Hall had long been a stately structure, but now the rooms once so bare, were gorgeous with tall mirrors, splendid carpets, rich drapery and glittering bijouerie. And yet, to her it was only a prison-house, and more and more deeply she loathed it, and the idea of a life there with Paul Marston. Twilight was coming on, ere she reached Duncroft Farm.

"To-morrow night, Jessie," said her betrothed husband, as he lifted her from the carriage, "I shall take you for better or worse. Only twenty-four hours more, and the bride I have so long coveted, will be mine," and bending down, he kissed her in his rough, boorish fashion.

Jessie shrank from the touch of his lips, and with a hasty "good evening," hurried to her room. Just as she entered it, she heard Marston's carriage wheels rumbling down the steep road to the valley. Her bridal dress, rich as costly satin and gossamer lace could make it, lay on a chair, but to her excited fancy it seemed to take the shape of a shroud. She flung herself down on the bed, and buried her face in the soft pillow, to shut out the hated paraphernalia, but she could not sleep. Hour after hour dragged by, and still she lay wakeful and anxious. It was midnight when she heard a hurried tap at her door. She flew to open it. A man stood there, a neighbor, and it needed only one glance at his haggard face to tell that he had some startling disclosure to make.

"Miss Jessie," said he, "I dared not speak to the old lady first—"

"My grandfather—has anything happened to him?" gasped the girl.

"Yes. Come down into the valley as quick as you can."

It was the work of one moment for Jessie to fold a shawl around her, and descend the stairs; the next, she was in the open air, following the neighbor as fast as her feet could carry her.

"Prepare yourself for the worst," said her companion, as they hurried down the path; "there has been dreadful work in the valley."

In less than a half-hour they had reached the blasted chestnut, under which Meg Marston and Duncroft had met weeks before. To the latest day of her life Jessie Gray never forgot that scene. A dark lantern cast a flickering light over a broken spade, and a small excavation in the earth, and an iron casket. Close by lay Richard Duncroft, the blood welling in a crimson torrent from a gash in his forehead. For an instant Jessie's sight grew dim, and she seemed sinking to the ground, but then she rallied her almost exhausted energies.

"Take him home," she faltered; and while her companion and a friend he had called to the spot before leaving it, made preparations to bear him back to the place he had so darkened of late with his stern presence, Jessie hurried on to break the tidings to her grandmother. Two hours later, Richard Duncroft lay bolstered up in bed, in his own chamber. His aged wife sat near him, and Jessie bent over her grandfather with tenderest ministrations, while physicians and other attendants gathered around. Then—then the old man's secret was revealed.

"Rachel and Jessie," he said with solemn earnestness; "I've been a curse to you for three months past. Listen, and I'll tell you why. You remember the eccentric little man, who has lived in the valley for two or three years. He was a returned Australian, but none would have dreamed that he was rich. I however gained the knowledge. One dark night, as I was crossing his lands, I saw him bury a heavy iron casket, and heard him say, with a short laugh: 'Here my gold is safe—this bank won't break.' The next day he left for Europe, and then a temptation arose within me to make myself possessor of his treasure. I yielded, and from that hour was a miserable man. Every night I went out to dig, and when I had disinterred the casket, I dug a new grave for it. Meg Marston became aware of my secret, and to bribe her to silence, I consented to give my poor Jessie to her villainous son. Last evening, when he came to bring you home, Jessie, I was not here, but I met him in the valley. He grew exacting, and declared that I should give him half of the gold I had found, or have my secret made known; and at length he challenged me to mortal combat. In darkness we met and fought; he left me fearfully wounded, and fled. There now—forgive me for the wrong I have done you both—God forgive me, too. My strength fails—Rachel, my wife, pray for the dying man." His breath came in short and sudden gasps, the blood-shot eyes closed—poor, old Richard Duncroft was dead. Paul Marston never dared return to the Highlands, and his vile mother followed him to his hiding-place. But after Arthur Minot had recovered from his illness, he and Jessie were married in the rustic church, and when a year later the Australian came back to the neighborhood, Jessie restored the iron casket, and tearfully told him THE OLD MAN'S SECRET.

HAPPY MAN.

The happiest man in the city of Boston has an apple and candy stand on North Market Street, and has one wooden leg. He has a smile and a pleasant word for everybody that passes through the archway, and never has upon his countenance the slightest indication of care or anxiety. All the apples and oranges on his stand might decay and run away, to his utter loss, without disturbing the complacency of his features. In summer or winter, snow or rain, he is always the same, whistling or humming some old, bygone tune, never appearing to realize the fact of his wooden leg.—Bunker Hill Aurora.

A PRAYER.

But should my destiny be quest of wealth,
Kind Heaven, O, keep my tempted soul in health!
And shouldst thou bless my toil with ample store,
Keep back the madness that would seek for more!

MABEL'S EYES.

BY MRS. E. T. KILDREDGE.

Mabel's eyes are brighter far
Than the brightest evening star;
Mirrored in their depths of blue,
Love-thoughts glisten warm and true;
Brighter far are Mabel's eyes
Than the brightest noonday skies.

When she was a bonnie child,
Laughing, sporting, free and wild,
Bending down her golden head,
Till it touched the violet's bed,
Then, I ween, her eyes of blue
Caught the violet's azure hue.

Beauteous gems are Mabel's eyes,
Bluer than the fair blue skies;
Bluer than the deep blue sea;
And it always seems to me,
That they must have caught their hue
From the tender violet blue.

Like two sea-shells pure and white,
Mabel's lids will look at night;
They are beautiful to view,
Though they screen her eyes of blue;
All the more at morn we prize
Mabel's tender, violet eyes.

THE PRIDE OF VERSAILLES.*

BY DAVID A. HARRISON.

GABRIELLE DE COURCY was the most beautiful maiden in the whole city of Versailles. To say that her hair was a dark, rich brown, long and wavy, her eyes a deep blue, shaded by long dark eyelashes, a complexion displaying the lily and the rose, and a figure tall and graceful, is not to give any idea of her wondrous beauty—a beauty which consisted not in regularity of features and sparkling eyes, but in the expression which varied with every thought and feeling. Gabrielle was as good as she was beautiful. Some time previous to the opening of our story, she had plighted her faith to one Bertrand Montmorency, a young man, son of a neighbor, poor, but proud and of good family. Their faith had been plighted upon the eve of Bertrand's departure for the army—the army which left for Austerlitz.

Gabrielle was the only child of the immensely wealthy widow Madame Celeste de Courcy, a proud, ambitious, heartless woman. Few characters are found so weak, as that of Madame de Courcy. Unlike her daughter, she was not even good looking; and her daughter's beauty was a constant source of annoyance and jealousy to her, save when she thought of it as a means of connecting herself with some grand family—a duke, count, or even prince. To her, the betrothal of her daughter to her neighbor Montmorency's son was a secret. She had suspected that the young people had an attachment for each other, and had immediately resorted to such measures as she thought had put an end to any such foolish nonsense.

* Under Napoleon, the prefects had to make reports of the rich heiresses of their department, in order to afford an opportunity to the favorites to address them. Le-graverend has disclosed a number of abuses, by which the prefects invaded private property and the domestic relations of the citizens.

Madame de Courcy had a formidable rival, an opposite neighbor, Madame St. Leon, a very beautiful widow, with two handsome daughters, Elinor and Isabel. True, the daughters were not to be compared, in beauty and accomplishments, with Gabrielle; but the mother, herself, was beautiful and very agreeable. The two lady mothers were outwardly very friendly; but each hated the other in her heart. Madame St. Leon hated her neighbor because, although not laying any claims to beauty, she was very wealthy. Thus the two women lived, each a spy upon the other.

Madame St. Leon was calling upon her "dear friend Celeste," as she called her when she was feeling particularly ill-natured: At last, after an hour spent in small talk, Annette St. Leon exclaimed:

"I nearly forgot, my dear Celeste, to tell you that I heard, from good authority, that Prefect Lacune visits the different houses in Versailles to-morrow, to make a list of the beautiful girls, which he gives to the emperor on the return of his army from Austerlitz."

"Aha! I am glad to hear that."

"You will of course place yourself upon the list," maliciously said Madame St. Leon, smiling and showing her beautiful pearly teeth; "you are so handsome!"

Madame de Courcy colored with vexation, though she answered coldly, while she arranged a superb diamond bracelet on her long, thin arm:

"You can do that, Annette—you are so wealthy!"

Both ladies looked at each other with an angry light in their eyes. But Madame St. Leon was not wealthy enough to be willing to quarrel with her more fortunate neighbor; so she hastened to say, in her most winning tones:

"No, no, Celeste; we are equals. The advantages are well divided between us, though you have the most available ~~list~~. I really envy you. We must not look now, so late in life, to grace the lists we did in youth; but I really envy you, for you are richer than I, and have only one daughter to leave it to, while I, with less wealth, have more daughters."

"The beauty and wit of the mother increases each dowry by a thousand francs."

"You are a wicked flatterer!" exclaimed Annette St. Leon, laughing gaily and shaking her beautiful curls. "But I must away. Au revoir!"

And she tripped down stairs, glancing at herself in the superb mirror in the hall with a half pleased, half spiteful expression.

"Old crocodile! What a fright she is! I should think she'd shut her eyes, when she passed this mirror; I am sure I would, if I were so ugly. No I wouldn't either, when hateful as the reflection is, it sparkled with diamonds as her's does."

Thus soliloquizing, Madame St. Leon sought her own plainer, but still elegant home, where her two pretty daughters sat waiting to hear what had passed.

After Madame St. Leon left, Gabrielle was summoned into her mother's presence. With great triumph, Madame de Courcy told her daughter of the prefect's expected visit, and commanded her to make herself as elegant as possible.

"Put on your richest dresses, Gabrielle, and I am sure your name will head the list."

Instead of looking delighted, Gabrielle turned deadly pale, and her beautiful head sank despairingly upon her bosom. Madame de Courcy looked astonished and very angry, when at last her daughter ventured to say:

"Mother, I cannot see the prefect. I will not have my name on the list."

"Such language to me, child! You strangely forget yourself. You will be ready to see the prefect, when he comes."

Gabrielle said nothing, but bent her head upon her hands—thinking deeply. Suddenly she raised her head, and spoke.

"I will see Monsieur Lacune on one condition."

"What is that?"

"That I shall be wholly alone—that I shall enter the room and speak with him alone, and when I have spoken with him, he shall be asked no questions concerning me."

"You will, I suppose, implore—will bribe him, perhaps, not to place your name upon the list?"

"No, my name shall be on his list. Before I see him, you must speak to him, and inform him what shall be my dowry."

Madame de Courcy reflected awhile, then consented to the strange request of her daughter.

About three o'clock, the next afternoon, Prefect Lacune made his appearance—a pompous, consequential, and rather bold man. He rubbed his hands in glee, when he saw the elegant saloon, with mirrors to the floor, marble busts, exquisite paintings, and costly ornaments; but he slightly frowned as Madame de Courcy, dressed in her most elegant robes, and blazing with diamonds, glided into the room. A long conversation passed between the two, and the prefect's eyes danced, as Madame de Courcy named the princely dowry of her daughter; for he knew by reputation that the daughter, unlike the mother, was beautiful.

"I must see your daughter, madame; and with my own eyes, be able to judge of the beauty which turns the heads of all the young men in the city."

In a few minutes the door opened, and Gabrielle de Courcy entered the room. She was dressed in a robe of rich dark blue silk, and her hair was bratted elegantly and twisted round her head, like a crown. But great Heaven! what is the matter? The figure and step is that of Gabrielle; and so are the delicate, rounded arms and tiny white hands. But the face—that is not Gabrielle's!

The prefect raised his eyes, and beheld before him a young girl of a tall, elegant figure, but plain face! The complexion was dark, lips rather pale, heavy dark eyebrows meeting on the nose, and dark circles round the eyes. Can this be the beauty of Versailles? He thought there must be some mistake; so he questioned the lady.

"I wished to see Mademoiselle Gabrielle de Courcy?"

"I am that person."

"Your pardon; I thought she was the most beautiful maiden in Versailles," bluntly replied the prefect.

"I have heard that term addressed to me. As proof of it, I will show you a collection of sonnets, madrigals and letters, I have received."

"It is unnecessary, mademoiselle. I must take a lady's word and my own eyes as sufficient proof. Don jour." And with a polite bow, Monsieur Lacune left the room.

At the foot of the stairs, contrary to her promise, stood Madame de Courcy, who eagerly questioned the prefect concerning her daughter's beauty. Anxious to get away, he replied:

"I think the inhabitants of this good city have gone crazy; and I, who have seen so many beauties, am filled with wonder."

The politic answer filled the heart of Madame de Courcy with joy. As she walked up the broad, marble staircase, she built princely castles in the air.

A number of young officers were lounging idly in an anteroom of the palace. They were talking of the war through which they had passed; and upon the breasts of several flashed the cross of the Legion of Honor.

"Room—room, there!" cried the seneschal. "The emperor!"

The young men doffed their caps and stood awaiting the coming of Napoleon in respectful attitude.

"Aha! all here, I see. That is well. I have in my hands a paper containing a list of all the handsome young heiresses in Versailles. I knew not there were so many dowried beauties in the city. I will read the names; if any of you have a preference for any of them, you may choose—in turn. Bertrand, you are first, because you were the first citizen of Versailles to whom I gave the cross. Elinor and Isabel St. Leon—small dowries, but beautiful girls; Leonide Lacour—the same dowry; Maria Descartes—very beautiful; Eulalie Lassalle—very beautiful, and very wealthy; Gabrielle de Courcy—good looking, and an immense dowry."

At the last name, Bertrand turned pale, and the others exclaimed:

"How, sire? Mademoiselle de Courcy there named as only good looking? She is the most beautiful girl in all Versailles?"

"That is strange. The Prefect Lacune is a judge of beauty. Be that as it is, you are to choose. Bertrand, whom choose you?"

"Mademoiselle de Courcy."

"Aha! the splendid dowry catches you—does it?"

"Your pardon, sire. The dowry is little to me, when I possess this," laying his hand on the cross of the Legion of Honor. "But I was betrothed to Mademoiselle de Courcy before I left with the army."

"Take her, then, Bertrand; and to-morrow you shall return to her."

To each of the other young men, he awarded some honor; for they were the five bravest officers in the army—young, faithful and brave. With a courteous bow, Napoleon returned the grateful acknowledgments of his young officers, then turned and left the saloon. On his return to Josephine, he found her quite perplexed.

"Ah, sire, you are just in time to aid me with your clear judgment and generous heart?"

"What puzzles you, Josephine?"

"While you were gone, a lady, Madame de Courcy, craved permission to speak to me. I granted the request, and received a strange visitor—a woman nearly beside herself with rage, because the Prefect Lacune had traduced her daughter's beauty. She had seen the list of beautiful young heiresses destined for your majesty, and was incensed because her daughter, Gabrielle de Courcy, headed not that list—indeed, worse than that, was described as simply good looking. I promised to bring her complaint before you, sire; but I must add, of my own free will, that if the daughter resembles her mother, she can't lay claims to being even good looking—much less, beautiful."

"'Tis strange!" exclaimed Napoleon, rubbing his chin. "Even when I read the list to my officers, a general exclamation arose because Mademoiselle de Courcy was not styled the most beautiful of all! I must look into this matter."

Ringling a small hand-bell, an usher appeared, whom Napoleon commanded to summon to his presence the prefect, Monsieur Lacune. Meanwhile, he paced restlessly up and down the saloon, stroking his chin with one hand, while the other he held behind him. A short space, and in great trepidation Monsieur Lacune was shown into the august presence. He stood the very picture of fawning solicitude, patiently waiting to be addressed. His patience was not long tried; for in a quick, abrupt tone, Napoleon said:

"Monsieur Lacune, I wish to have a matter explained. You gave me a list containing the names of the heiresses of Versailles, and there I behold the name of Mademoiselle Gabrielle de Courcy, the wealthiest maiden in the city, but simply good looking; how is that?"

Monsieur Lacune, mistaking the cause of the emperor's question, hastened to reply.

"Your pardon, sire. I know I should not have placed her name upon the list, as she had no claim to beauty; but I thought her immense wealth would overbalance all else. So I added her name; and, if you were pleased to notice, it was the last on the list."

"Yes, yes; I know that. You did right; but I wish to know what spell was upon your eyes, that Mademoiselle de Courcy appeared so different to you? All the young men of Versailles swear she is the most beautiful maiden in all the empire; and a short space ago, her mother pleaded with the empress that her daughter's beauty should have justice done it. How can you account for the difference?"

"It is beyond my wit. If you will pardon my presumption, I would suggest that the maiden be brought before you, that you may judge for yourself of her charms."

"Sage advice, monsieur, which shall be acted upon. Do you remain here till she arrive."

Madame de Courcy had hardly reached her home, after having sought and obtained an interview with the empress, when the royal carriage drew up to the door.

"The emperor wishes the company of Madame and Mademoiselle de Courcy. His carriage waits."

Madame de Courcy donned plumed hat and velvet mantle, her heart swelling with pride; but Gabrielle, her heart beating with despair, only threw over her head and shoulders a richly wrought lace mantle, which so fell as to conceal her features, and with faltering steps, followed her mother down stairs to the carriage. As Madame de Courcy stepped, with a haughty tread, into the imperial carriage, she could not refrain from glancing up to the house of her hated rival. Good! half shaded by the drapery, Madame St. Leon stood curiously gazing forth. A proud, exultant wave of the hand, and the carriage rolled away from the door.

Closely following the seneschal, Madame and Mademoiselle de Courcy entered the presence of their emperor. Napoleon smiled, as they approached, and said in his most gracious manner:

"The empress has reported to us your complaint. The prefect and citizens are at variance, and we decided to judge for ourselves of the famed beauty of Mademoiselle de Courcy. Be not ashamed, mademoiselle, that the eyes of your emperor and empress rest for once critically upon your face. Be pleased to draw aside your veil."

Gabrielle tremblingly stepped forward; then suddenly, as if in despair, pulled aside the veil. Neither Napoleon nor Josephine could repress an exclamation of surprise and admiration as their eyes rested upon the beautiful, pale face of Gabrielle, half shaded as it was by the rich veil. A moment only they looked, while the girl blushed deeply at being the object of such scrutiny. Napoleon turned to the trembling prefect.

"How is this, Monsieur Lacune? I behold before me the loveliest maiden mine eyes ever looked upon in any land. I can consider you as no longer competent to fill your office."

"Sire!"—and Gabrielle knelt at his feet—"Monsieur Prefect is blameless. On my head, alone, let your anger fall. I disguised myself—painted myself to look as plainly as possible. He judged rightly; for he knew not the sallow complexion and straggling eyebrows were false."

"What were your reasons for thus transfiguring yourself?"

Gabrielle blushed vividly, and lowered her beautiful eyes till the long lashes rested upon the glowing cheek, while she made answer in a perfectly steady, though low voice:

"I was betrothed to one, poor but of good family; and I thought if no personal inducements were offered, if I was ranked as plain, among a long list of beauties, I should remain unchosen—all would choose beauty and wealth!"

Napoleon smiled; then whispered some order to the seneschal, who left the hall. While he was gone, Napoleon spoke to the kneeling girl.

"I blame you for but one thing—that is, want of confidence in your emperor. I am not used to break hearts; it pleases me more to unite loved ones. I am sorry to say, mademoiselle, your scheme failed. Though called plain, there was one among my officers who overlooked that."

He paused a moment, and Gabrielle's head sank, while a deadly pallor spread over her delicate features.

"Yes, one young, handsome and gifted, chooses you. Here he comes!"

Raising his voice slightly, Napoleon said to the new comer:

"Lieutenant Bertrand Montmorency, behold the bride you have chosen! Kneel, to receive her."

A dead weight fell on the heart of the poor girl, as Napoleon announced the presence of her future husband, and she did not raise her eyes till he pronounced the name "Bertrand Montmorency!" With a cry of joy, Gabrielle raised her head; then with parted lips and sparkling eyes, she waited Napoleon's words, while Madame de Courcy stood by, grinding her teeth with rage. "Only a lieutenant!"

"Receive your bride from our hands, Bertrand! and may neither of you forget that Napoleon loves to witness the happiness of others. Rise up, General Montmorency; your new commission shall be made out to-morrow."

The assemblage broke up. Bertrand and his lovely bride returned to the house of Madame de Courcy, upon whom the new title, "General," worked a charm. As the lovely Gabrielle passed out of the saloon, Josephine looked after her, smiling:

"Mademoiselle entered the room beautiful, truly; but she leaves it perfectly bewildering, in her young loveliness. So much has happiness done!"

"Yes," replied Napoleon, looking back also. "Truly, rightfully, has she been called THE PRIDE OF VERSAILLES."

THE SCHOOLMASTER OF BRAINTREE.

BY ALICE C. BENTON.

In the ancient burial place of the quaint old town of Braintree, or Brantry, as it was once spelled, there is a small, dark headstone, over which the sunshine and dews have fallen for a century and a half; and round which the long grass and the wild brier folded as lovingly as now, when our great grandfathers were treading that consecrated ground, and their fathers had not yet descended to their final resting place. We can scarcely realize, while our feet are wandering among the ancient graves, that the beings who lie there, were once living, sentient actors, like ourselves, in the great drama which is not yet finished;—that they had the same hopes, wishes, joys and sorrows as ourselves; that they played with the same baubles of love, fame, ambition, that we do, and that they, like ourselves, saw bark after bark go down to the great deep, freighted deeply with the experiences of a human soul.

But to the headstone. On its dull, slate-stone face are inscribed, with much of the tedious prolixity of that day, the virtues, and a considerable portion of the histories of Reuben Morton and his wife. An Englishman, born and bred, he held the office of schoolmaster, with such patience, moderation and zeal for knowledge, that it would seem that the youth of Massachusetts—those at least whose means would permit, were all students with good and learned Master Morton.

Not only so, but that wise and prudent gentlewoman, Mistress Bella Morton, "hath her memorial" here also, as being the accomplished instructress of a large number of "young gentlewomen, especially many from Boston." Whether her spirit still walks abroad, in the persons of the innumerable multitude who walk Washington Street each day at high noon, is a problem which only our psychologic friends, who are posted up in such abstruse mysteries, can answer. Let us hope that gentle Mistress Morton has really transmitted some of her valuable qualities down even to this generation, more lastingly than the tent and satin stitch which accompanied them.

Reuben Morton was the younger son of a noble English family, and was, of course, destined for that convenient anchorage of all those little boats—younger sons—the church. Seriously inclined from his childhood, he made no especial objection, and the thing was already decided on; Lord John Bellingham, his father's early friend, promising him a living in the gift of the Bellingham family.

There was a richer gift in the noble lord's possession, which Reuben Morton saw and coveted, on the single occasion of his admission into Bellingham House; a gift which had been designed for his own elder brother, Lord George; and this was the only daughter of that ancient house.

As soon would the noble owner have seen the ancient structure fall to the ground, a miserable, worthless ruin, without a single stone standing upon another, as to see the daughter of his heart throw herself away upon a younger son. He had planned her marriage with Lord George, a coarse, stag-hunting, disagreeable young man, who considered his portion sufficient without learning, and was almost as ignorant as one of his own horses, but possessed of a vast fortune—the grand desideratum with Lord John Bellingham.

The Lady Arabella thought differently from her noble father. She too, in that single interview, marked distinctly the odds between the two brothers, and when Reuben Morton—feeling that such a marriage as was projected for her was a desecration—modestly, yet nobly pressed his own suit, the lady listened with unreluctant ear. There were reproaches, and rage, and vindictiveness in store for him who had thus rashly brought down two houses upon his devoted head. But Arabella was firm, and that was all that was wanting to make him happy.

The small portion which descended to him from his grandmother, was hastily demanded, and paid promptly; and at a respectable country town, not six miles from Bellingham House, the wedding was privately performed by a young clergyman—his dearest friend. The next hour the newly married pair were on board a ship, bidding a tender, and as it proved, a last farewell to the white cliffs of Albion, on their way to the refuge of discontented or persecuted Englishmen—the American colonies.

Arriving in Boston, the pair set seriously to thinking to what practical purpose they could turn the slender income, and the rich and varied talents they possessed, to meet the exigencies of their life in the ungenial clime to which they had flown. Titles disappeared here, in the comparative wilderness they were now to inhabit; and plain Master Morton and Mistress Bella Morton were the only names by which they were known. Both agreed that nothing was so suited to their acquirements as teaching, and as many families wished to send their children away from Boston, already the resort of low roysterers, and the scum of English society, they decided to settle in the pleasant town of Braintree, and receive pupils from a distance into their own house.

A modest house, differing but slightly from an English cottage, with a broad wing attached, was built from their small finances, and furnished with such plain and unostentatious arrangements as they could afford. It was situated on the brow of a hill, commanding a rich and extensive prospect: wide-spread forests, waving corn-fields, and the broad bosom of the ocean, across which lay the land of their birth. If sometimes a sigh floated towards it, the circumstances under which they must have remained rose before them, and the remembrance of what might have been stifled all expression of regret. Around them soon gathered a band of smiling youth, eager for instruction; and in the cares and pleasure of their new occupation, they forgot there were such things as lords and ladies. Sometimes the happy husband would address his wife as Lady Arabella, but she chided him for the unwelcome sound, and declared that no title could ever please her half so well as that of the schoolmaster's wife.

Once only, for a few brief months, a baby with fair, English complexion, soft blue eyes and golden hair, lay upon her bosom—a son, who in the event of one death, would be presumptive heir to the Morton estates; but, as if to stifle the wish before it was formed, the gift was recalled.

"But God gives patience—love learns strength,
And faith remembers promise,
And hope itself can smile at length,
On other hopes gone from us."

Once, too, they were surprised and shocked by a visit from one, between whom and them they had supposed that the waves of the Atlantic would forever intervene. With characteristic indecorum and indelicacy, Lord George, in wandering about the world to kill time, chanced to visit the English colonies in the New World. Chance led him to inquire, as he had done elsewhere, for his brother; and this time the inquiry was rewarded by finding one who knew his situation, and offered to conduct him to his home in Braintree.

It was a lovely summer evening, when the schoolmaster of Braintree and his wife, freed from the duties of a long day, wandered forth to catch the fresh ocean breeze, and talk of England. True, they did not often revert to that theme, but on that night the waves of memory rolled backward, and they conversed in a cheerful and happy mood, of all the events that had chanced to them in parting from their native soil. Before them lay the broad sea which they had crossed together; at the left, Boston was beginning to rear its palaces; around, on every side, new towns and villages were slowly springing up, not with the railroad speed of our own times, but with a steady progress that denoted stability of purpose, and augured well for the future state of the colonies. At their feet, on the lowest slope of the hill, lay the burial ground where the dust of their child reposed. They grew sadder and more solemn, as the sun withdrew its last fading light, and descended the hill to watch for the remainder of the twilight beside the little grassy mound.

As they passed into the enclosure, a man accosted them with the inquiry, as to where he could find one Reuben Morton. Though nearly dusk, both knew the face that presented itself to their sight. Both too, recognized the voice, harsh and rudely speaking; and the roystering, swaggering air, which, if disagreeable and repulsive in the broad parks of Morton Hall, were perfectly insufferable amidst the peaceful quietude of this sequestered place. Unmistakably this man was none other than Lord George Morton himself.

Instinctively, Reuben and Bella moved away from the little turn stile which formed the entrance to the place of the dead, before the question could be answered; Bella holding fast by her husband's arm, as if already she feared the shadow which had fallen across their path.

"I am here, George," said the schoolmaster, not unkindly; "I cannot be so deceptive, as to say I am glad to see you, but if you will return home with us, I will show you such hospitality as I can."

"Faith! a cool reception, Reuben! Lady Arabella, have you no warmer welcome to give one who should have been your husband, instead of this meek, chicken-hearted parson? Where do you preach, most reverend sir? Methinks that old church yonder would hold fewer than my kennel at home would accommodate."

"Call me not by that name, George Morton," said Bella, coldly. "The proudest name I ever coveted, was that of the wife of Reuben Morton, the schoolmaster. He is no parson, either, but his life is such, that all good men respect him."

"Now, by the Lord, do you tell me that one of our family has stooped to be a common pedagogue? Are you fooling me, Lady Arabella?"

"She speaks truth," said Reuben, "and believe me, I am prouder far to be that, than I should to be Lord George Morton himself. Don't trouble yourself to pity or despise us. We are well enough as we are. But let us go to the house. We would not seem inhospitable."

When lights were brought, they saw with shame how plainly the effects of a reckless and dissipated life had worn upon their guest. With little, or no appetite, he sat at the bountiful table, covered with good and wholesome fare until the wine appeared. He drank potation after potation, without any apparent effect, except a sleepiness, which he attributed, as he said, to the diabolical roads he had travelled over, since he landed in these cursed colonies; and he was soon desirous of being shown to his bedroom, where his servant to whom he had not revealed his connection with the host, was profuse in lamentations at the scantiness of his accommodations. The next day, Lord George departed in utter disgust at the situation and prospects of his brother, and scarcely envying him the wife which he had taxed him with stealing from himself. This was the only glimpse of their past life that crossed their quiet pathway; and they were thankful that it was not repeated—thankful, when they heard that there was no reason to fear a repetition.

One by one, as the English newspapers came at intervals to their hands, they knew of the dropping away of old friends and relatives, until all were gone, save Lord George himself, and he was now an old man, with only the dregs of that life, from which he had long since wasted the sparkle.

At last, when years had whitened the locks of the venerable schoolmaster, and faded the roses on his Bella's cheeks—when they were fast passing away to the better land, amidst the love and respect of the good and virtuous, whose opening years they had trained, there came one day to the Braintree post-office, a huge letter, bearing the English post-mark, and addressed to Lord Reuben Morton. There was much speculation in the coterie that assembled round the fire of the little grocery store, in one corner of which—smelling marvellously of salt fish, hams, pepper and coffee—the letters were weekly deposited, and as often called out by the little wrinkled postmaster, who, with spectacled nose, presided over that department.

"Bless us all! Have we a real lord among us?" was the cry from the loiterers, while each was eager to be the bearer, in order to gratify his individual curiosity, and retail the news, if there should be any, to the rest of the curious group.

"I shall trust it to nobody," said the little postmaster, swelling with conscious importance. "I think—nay, I know that Master Morton will wish to consult me in regard to this letter. Zeb-dee Stiles, come within here, and attend to delivering the letters," he continued, addressing a tall, gawky lad, whom he kept as his assistant.

In a moment, he was walking up the hill, bearing the important despatch, which announced that the last barrier between Reuben and the title was broken down. Lord George Morton slept with his fathers.

If the aged schoolmaster had ever desired to succeed to the Morton title and estates, it was too late for him to feel a single pulse accelerated by the announcement. When the postmaster entered, he was lying upon the couch, with that patient and serene smile which marks the good man's approach to the better land, while the Bella of his youthful love, still beautiful in her calm old age, sat beside him, holding one thin hand in hers.

"We shall not long be separated, love," he whispered. His eye glanced at the large packet.

"Read it," he said faintly, to his wife. She did so, and as he listened to her tremulous voice, he closed his eyes, as if weary of hearing what was now of no interest to that parting hour.

When she had finished, she quietly laid aside the letter, as if it were but a common thing, and turned to the figure on the couch. Reuben Morton had passed away to that land where lords and kings are known no more.

Kind hands placed the stone beside the little child, who, had he lived, would have inherited these honors; and kind hearts dictated the quaint inscription, which speaks so truthfully of the aged pair, who were, indeed, not long separated. Opposite the old burial place, and beneath the pillars of the venerable stone church, the dust of the Adamases—father and son—reposes. Meet neighborhood for the revered Schoolmaster of Braintree.

SELF-RIGHTEOUSNESS.

It is no uncommon thing for men to flatter themselves that God cannot be displeased with them because they have omitted to do a great many bad deeds, which they would have done, had they not been restrained by the fear of the law or of public opinion. The soundness of such morality is very well exhibited in Lessing's parable of "The Wolf on his Death-bed." A wolf lay at his last gasp, and was reviewing his past life. "It is true," said he, "that I am a sinner, but I hope not one of the greatest. I have done evil, but I have also done much good. Once I remember a bleating lamb that had strayed from its flock, came so near me that I might easily have throttled it, but I did it no harm." "I can testify to all that," said his friend, the fox, who was helping him to prepare for death; "I remember perfectly, all the circumstances. It was just at that time when you were so dreadfully choked with that bone in your throat."—The Moralist.

Curious Matters.

Singular Story of a Shark.

In an article on the curiosities contained in the Museum of the United Service Institution in London, the Times says:—The most singular objects perhaps, are the jaws of a large shark, placed side by side with a glass case of printed Spanish memoranda, between which, at first sight, no connexion seems possible. Their history, however, is briefly this: Her Majesty's ship, Abergavenny, chased off St. Domingo the Nancy, suspected slaver, which contrived to escape, though in the excitement of the chase, she threw overboard her real papers, which were swallowed at a gulp by a large shark. That same shark, soon recovering its appetite after this light diet, was caught by some of the crew of the Abergavenny. The papers, which he had not troubled himself to masticate, were found in this case intact; the Nancy was followed to her real destination, and overtaken, seized and condemned on the evidence of the pictures thus Jonah-like recovered.

A novel Monomania.

A cottage at the head of Newton, Scotland, occupied by two young ladies, has for several days past been besieged by a green linnet, who, the moment one of the inmates leaves the house, attacks her, and does everything in its power to annoy her, such as darting in her face, and striking her with its wings, all the while chirruping in its most enraged key. Although several times stunned by diving at the windows and doors, it has always got away from every attempt to capture it, and keeps its watch day and night on a tree at the rear of the house, whence its sallies are made at every opportunity. No cause can be assigned for this antipathy on the part of the little warbler, as no injury has been done to it, so far as is known, by any of those it seems to consider its enemies.

Strange Discovery.

A party lately made a partial exploration of Spring Cave, near Point Pleasant, Ky., on Green River. An entrance to the Cave was effected through a narrow passage, about thirty feet long, which opened into an egg-shaped room, thirty feet long, and fifteen high. The exploring party visited, through various passages, five other rooms, in one of which was a small set-off as if made by man, and on it were three books and several letters, none of which the gentlemen could make out. They also found in this room silvery looking metal that had been run into lumps. In another room they found human bones. It is the intention of the gentlemen engaged in this exploration, to make a more thorough examination of this cave.

Effect of sudden Grief.

Among others whose acquaintance Montaigne made in the bath-room, was the Seigneur d'Andelot, formerly in the service of Charles the Fifth, and Governor for him of St. Quentin. One side of his beard and one eyebrow were white; and he related that this change came to him in an instant one day as he was sitting at home, with his head leaning on his hand, in profound grief at the loss of a brother, executed by the Duke of Alba, as an accomplice of Counts Egmont and Horn. When he looked up, and uncovered the part which he had clutched in his agony, the people present thought that flour had been sprinkled over him.

To cut Glass with a Piece of Iron.

Draw with a pencil on paper any pattern to which you would have the glass conform; place the pattern under the glass, holding both together in the left hand (for the glass must not rest on any plain surface), then take a common spike, or some similar piece of iron, heat the point of it to redness and apply it to the edge of the glass; draw the iron slowly forward, and the edge of the glass will immediately crack; continue moving the iron slowly over the glass, tracing the pattern, and the clink in the glass will follow at the distance of about half an inch in every direction, according to the motion of the iron. It may sometimes be found requisite, however, especially in forming corners, to apply a wet finger to the opposite side of the glass. Tumblers and other glasses may be cut or divided very fancifully by similar means. The iron must be re-heated as often as the crevice in the glass ceases to flow.

A Novel Invention.

An invention for signalling on railway trains is described, the apparatus consisting of a gutta percha tube, extending through the whole length of the train. It is formed in sections—a joint for each car—and these are fastened together when in use. This tube is connected with an air-pump in the front and at the end of the train. By a stroke of this pump, the air is forced through the tube to the opposite end of the train, and produces a very loud and shrill whistle at the mouth-piece attached to the tube in each guard's van, and to a mouth-piece which extends also close to the engineer. Printed instructions are placed in the hands of each individual officially connected with the train, which states that one whistle means "look out," two whistles signify "caution," and three whistles denote "danger."

A Queer Bet.

A new work has recently been published in England, entitled "One Hundred Years Ago," which, by the following extract, shows that at least one person was even then sound on the goose question: "My lords of Rockingham and Orford made a match against each other for five hundred guineas, as to whether five turkeys or five geese would in the shortest time perform the journey from Norwich to London. The result vindicated Lord Orford's sagacity, for, though at first the turkeys had it all their own way, the geese waddled past them at night, while they were lazily roosting upon the trees beside the hedge row."

Remarkable Sight.

While the New York and Worcester train was passing Natick recently, a ball of lightning as large as the two fists of a man, descended, ran along the telegraph wire, and exploded with a report as loud as a cannon. The wire was consumed, and the posts within a space of half a mile were shivered from top to bottom. The passengers on the train were greatly alarmed, as the ball of fire was all the time in sight, and the explosion seemed as if beneath the cars.

Vaccination with a Magnetised Needle.

Professor Roek states that since 1856, hundreds of children have been thus vaccinated, with scarcely any failures occurring. The point of the needle is well saturated with the magnetic fluid before practising the vaccinations, which are then performed in the usual manner, a single magnetization serving for many vaccinations. It is quite surprising to observe the rapidity with which the vaccine virus is absorbed when the needle is thus prepared.

Costly Handkerchiefs.

The young Countess Marie Dorethee de Casteline has just been united to Prince Frederick de Radzivil, a Prussian officer. Portions of the lady's wedding equipment have been exposed in Paris. In this collection there were a number of costly handkerchiefs; so beautiful are they that one would think they had escaped from the slender weavings of fairies, and not from the mortal hands of sewing women. I counted in the window where they were displayed no less than sixty handkerchiefs, costing from two to three hundred dollars each. On some of them the embroidering of the arms of the houses Casteline and Radzivil were interwoven and surmounted by the crown of the prince; all this was in pure gold. The threads were metallic, malleable, pure, and so arranged as not to dim in washing. There were seven cashmere shawls, of seven different colors, one was of white, embroidered with gold and turquoise.

Recipe for Renewing the Skin.

There is a certain bean which grows in the East Indies, the outer pod of which has a quality very much prized by the women of those countries. On the lessening of their beauty of complexion, by sunburn or by the eruption of any disease, they gather this nut, take the rind or pod, and rub it well upon the face. The juice is first very corrosive, and the flesh swells and inflames under it, and then turns black. The patient is at this time a horrible object, and the universal custom is a most studious concealment till the process is past. In about two weeks, however, the old skin peels off, and the renewed one makes its appearance—as rosy, as delicate, and as fair as that of an infant. At the cost of five days of suffering and fifteen days of secret concealment from all mortal sight, the precious boon of a “bran new skin” can thus be secured to fading beauty.

Ancient Turquoise Mine in New Mexico.

A late number of the American Journal of Science contains an account by William P. Blake of an ancient excavation in New Mexico, made by the aborigines in search of a stone which they call “Chalchihuitl.” This excavation is about 800 feet wide, and 200 deep, and is 20 miles from Santa Fe. It is shown to be very ancient by a thick growth of pine trees in the bottom of the pit, and by numerous fragments of Indian pottery. The stone is green and bluish green, and is identical with turquoise in its composition. The Indians still set the most extravagant value upon beads and trinkets made of it, and obtain small quantities from thin seams in the vicinity of the great pit. The first present sent by Montezuma to Cortez, for the Spanish sovereign, consisted of four chalchihuitl stones, they being more highly prized than gold.

Action of the Sea.

In Clew Bay, on the western coast of Ireland, there was formerly an island, called Miniah, the surface of which, in the reign of Charles I., was twelve acres in extent, as is proved by several public documents of that period. On being measured in the year 1814, it was found to be only 420 feet long, and 30 broad. In 1816, it entirely disappeared. The island of Clare, in the immediate neighborhood, furnishes another example of the destructive action of the sea on those coasts. Bounded everywhere by cliffs of immense height, it is continually corroded by the ocean, which has worn deep caverns, into which, when agitated, it throws immense blocks of stone, detached from the cliffs, with an appalling noise.

A Bengal Prince.

A correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser says he has lately returned from a visit to the palaces and grounds of the Rajah of Bushwan. The estate of this petty prince, a fine-looking fellow, thirty-eight years old, gives an annual income of about $4,000,000—over $4 50 an hour. His residence is on an estate of seventy-five acres of gardens and parks, which is interspersed with a large number of tanks, one of them being a full mile around its four sides, with many stone stairways leading down to the water. The stud of the Rajah contains eight hundred of the best horses that can be procured in India, and he has, besides, about thirty fine elephants in his stables. He owns, in addition to his immense country estate, bazaars and considerable property in Calcutta. Twelve thousand men are employed on all his lands—four thousand in the immediate vicinity of his palaces. The monthly expenditures for the support of all this is only about $4000—and the native labor is the cheapest part of it.

Geological Phenomenon.

The Ohio River is gradually destroying the soil on which Portsmouth, Ohio, is situated. It first worked off several acres of bottom land up to a steep bank. It has now commenced wearing off the bank and encroaching upon the streets of the city. A writer says, “six blocks containing twelve city lots, that originally fronted on Fifth Street, are now washed by the river, which is taking them off at the rate of a foot per day. It is a common thing to see a dozen square yards drop off at once.” One street, Fifth, is annihilated, and the river is advancing towards Fourth Street. Some large manufactories and the depot buildings are in danger of being swept off in a few months. At the present rate of progress in four months the channel of the river will be where the depot buildings now stand.

A Pleasant Surprise.

Two gentlemen took the cars at Portland for Boston, the other day, and entered into conversation on the route. When they reached the depot at Boston, they found they were both going to the same street in Charlestown. It proved, finally, that they were destined to the same house, and when they arrived there, they were introduced to each other as brothers, by the gentleman of the house, also a brother. Neither of the three had met the others for twenty-four years. They were Scotchmen. The one at Charlestown had been in this country nineteen years; one of the others had just arrived from Egypt, where he had been in the service of the pacha for twenty-two years; and the other had spent sixteen years in the East Indies.

Singular Arithmetical Fact.

Any number of figures you may wish to multiply by 5 will give the same result if divided by 2, a much quicker operation: but you must remember to annex a cipher to the answer when there is no remainder, and when there is a remainder, whatever it may be, annex a 5 to the answer. Multiply 464 by 5, and the answer will be 2320; divide the same number by 2, and you have 232, and as there is no remainder, you add a cipher. Now, take 357, and multiply by 5, the answer is 1785. On dividing this by 2, there is 178 and a remainder; you, therefore, place a 5 at the end of the line, and the result is again 1785.

The Florist.

O, the flowers look upward in every place,
Through this beautiful world of ours,
And, dear as a smile on an old friend's face,
Is the smile of the bright, bright flowers!

Growing the Camellia by Cuttings.

The Camellia may be grown from cuttings, the single red and middlemist being the easiest to strike, and the double white and myrtle-leaved the most difficult; but the plants procured in this manner are much more beautiful in their shape, and prolific in their blossoms. The cuttings may be put in at any season of the year, when the plants are not in a growing state, but the best time is when the young wood is becoming ripe; and should be performed in the following manner: Cut them smoothly across at the joint, between the old and new wood, and plant them firmly in pots, well drained, of pure river sand, covering them with bell glasses, keeping them moderately moist, and placing them in the shade. In from four to six months, they usually commence taking root, at which time they will be materially assisted in their growth by being placed in a mild hot-bed. When it is considered that they have sufficient root, which will probably be in about one year, they may be repotted singly, into small pots, giving them the compost used for established plants.

Pergularia.

This flower has perhaps the sweetest fragrance of any other plant. The blossoms are green and of no peculiar beauty, but they are valuable for their delightful fragrance, which is chiefly perceptible at night. The Pergularia is a stove climber, which should be grown in a large pot with holes in the sides, which should be plunged into the centre pit of the stove and kept moist. It should be kept back every year when it is done flowering; and it will shoot out vigorously in spring. This plant fully repays any trouble expended upon it by the rich fragrance.

Ledum.

The Labrador Tea. American low shrubs with pretty white flowers. It is a compact growing little plant, with box-like leaves and clusters of white flowers, which have a pink tinge on the back of the petals. It is very suitable for beds in a geometric flower garden, or rock-work; but it requires a slight protection during severe frosts.

Ononis.

The Rest Harrow. Little herbaceous and shrubby plants, some of which are natives of Britain, and which generally have yellow or pink flowers. Most kinds should be grown in peat, or very sandy loam. Most of the kinds live in the open air, with a very slight protection during hard frosts.

Mignonette, Sweet.

This is especially mentioned as easily cultivated by drills in a garden, and is one of the finest and richest flowers in the world from which the honey-bee can extract its food.

Jacobaea Lily.

A splendid bulbous-rooted plant, formerly called by botanists Amaryllis formosissima, but the name is now changed to Sprekelia.

Sherardia.

Very pretty British weeds, which may be introduced with good effect on rockwork. Perfectly hardy.

Rockwork.

Rockwork may be divided into two kinds; that which is intended to imitate natural rocks, and that which is merely intended as a nidus for rock-plants. Imitations of nature should be formed of large blocks of stone, and should for the most part be disposed in imitation of some stratification. Rockwork, as a mere nidus for plants, should never be attempted on a large scale, without the introduction of large blocks of stone to prevent sinking. A mixture of brick, flint, granite and freestone, together with bits of marble and shells, form a pretty mass. These bits of stone are piled up in a picturesque manner, then fine, rich earth sifted among them.

Summer flowering Bulbs.

Now is the time to set out all summer flowering bulbs, such as Ixias and Gladolius. The ground in which the bulbs are to be planted, should be made very fine and rich, and not allowed at any time to become hardened. Lobelias, Verbenias, Salvias and Petunias, and other half-hardy annuals that are in pots, may be planted out. The hardy annuals sown in March or April, should be thinned out and transplanted, and the stems of the Phloxes and other coarse growing herbaceous plants may be cut, taking away about a third part.

Dahlia.

These beautiful, showy flowers can be produced the first season from the seed. It is only necessary to sow them in a hot-bed early in the season. The best soil for Dahlias is a compost of equal parts sand and loam, which may be enriched with part of an old hot-bed, or decayed leaves. The plants should always be tied to a stout stake.

Grevillea.

Australian plants with very curious flowers, which should be grown in a mixture of equal parts of sand, loam and peat. They are increased by seeds which ripen freely, or by cuttings of the old wood, struck in sand under a bell-glass.

Blitum.

Annuals of the easiest culture, of no beauty with respect to the flowers, but remarkable for the showy appearance of their spikes of succulent scarlet fruit. The common names for the species are Strawberry and Spinach Blite.

Chilidonium.

The common Celandine or Swallow-wort, is a hardy perennial, with yellow flowers, common on the seacoast and in churchyards in many parts of England. It grows in any common garden soil, and is readily increased by division of the roots.

Echites.

Two new species of this plant have been discovered. One of these new species has flowers of a beautiful rose color, and the other has dark crimson flowers.

Adesmia.

Herbaceous plants and shrubs, with yellow pea-like flowers, growing freely in the open air in any common garden soil. The blossoms have a slight fragrance.

Knautia.

One species is a very pretty flower, and requiring only the usual treatment of annuals, and will grow in common garden soil.

Flower Garden.

This the wife and daughters will superintend. How charming and delightful for us who entertain our country cousins in winter, to return their visits in summer, and enjoy with them the charming plants and flowers which their skill, industry and good taste have provided. Now is the time to get the ground in readiness to receive the seeds of the annuals, soon to be planted. Secure as good a variety and as choice a selection as possible. This mode of occupying your time will not only please yourself and gratify your friends, but will also improve your hearts and minds.

Crysanthemums.

On account of early frosts, chrysanthemum plants are frequently destroyed just as they show their blossom-buds, thus preventing a display of their flowers. They should, therefore, be planted in pots, and be transferred in the season of their flowering, to the parlor or greenhouse. Their splendid appearance in these situations during the winter months, is not surpassed by any other herbaceous flower—viewing in richness and magnificence with the tulip and dahlia.

Dahlias.

The variegated sort of dahlias should be grown in fine sandy loam or peat, nearly or wholly destitute of manure, according to their specific natures, or they will be liable to run too much, and exhibit self-colored flowers; and in the event of any such appearing, they should be taken off the plant as soon as ascertained. Three or four feet space each way should be allowed between the plants, by which their health and strength will be much improved.

Snake Gourd.

A very curious plant, with white flowers, every petal of which appears surrounded with long knotted fringes. The leaves and tendrils resemble those of the common cucumber; but the fruit is long, and curiously striped, so as to resemble a snake. It is of no use, only worth cultivating as an object of curiosity. The fruit grows twisted and curled like numerous snakes, and to one fearing them the sight would be startling.

Annuals.

Under favorable circumstances, annuals will produce their flower-buds within two months of the period of sowing the seed; some species, soon after exhibiting their brilliant blossoms and ripening their seed, disappear, while others afford a succession of flowers for two or three months. Annual plants will grow from one to four feet in height, in one uniform soil and situation.

Chrysocoma.

Goldy-Locks. Low, soft-wooded shrubs from the cape, with yellow flowers. They thrive well in a mixture of loam and peat, and are readily increased by cuttings. The herbaceous plants formerly included in this genus, are now removed to the genera Loriosyris Euthamia and Bigelovia.

Zygopetalum.

Showy, orchideous plants, which in their native state are found growing on branches of trees, and which should be grown on wood in a stove. They are very difficult of culture, but the beauty of the blossoms fully repays the florist for all time spent.

Care of Flowers.

Tender annual flower seeds may now be sown in hot-beds; use light rich soil, and cover the seeds very lightly; those sown last month should now be potted off into small pots. Dahlias may be plunged in the hot-bed to forward them, and afterwards potted in large pots, and placed in the green-house. Hyacinths narcissus, and other bulbs in glasses, should have the water changed every week, soft rain-water being the best; and if the points of the roots have any dirt attached to them, they should be taken out of the glass, and brushed very gently with a feather—the glasses, also, should be thoroughly washed every two or three weeks. Those who wish to flower tuberoes and tiger-flowers very early, should, about the middle of this month, plant them in small pots, and place them in a hot-bed. Calceolarias in small pots should be potted into a larger size, filled with a compost of rotten bones and light loam.

Culture of Tulips.

The beauty of the tulip flower draws the attention of even the most indifferent observer, and, as it were, makes itself familiarly known at once, because it is a kind of flower which, when taken notice of, is rarely or never forgotten. The Dutch have long been famed for their splendid collections of this plant, and some of their private ones have been valued at some thousands of pounds sterling. Those who are desirous of obtaining a good collection of tulips should regard it as the most important point at the commencement, to make a reliable selection; and having done this, they should be planted in a compost of mellow light earth, or leaf soil and well rotted stable manure.

The Damask Rose.

The damask rose, a native of the Levant, is powerfully and agreeably fragrant, and is the kind most used for making the attar, or essential oil of roses. The varieties are numerous, and exceedingly beautiful. In Turkey, the rose is regarded as a sacred flower, and millions of them are cultivated in some of the gardens of the Mussulmans; so sacred, indeed, do they hold this flower, from a belief that it first sprung from the perspiration of Mahomet, that they will not permit a leaf to lie upon the ground, or to be soiled by the tread of the foot. Upon the tombs of all ladies that die unmarried, is sculptured one of these fair flowers.

Weeping Roses.

Weeping roses, which are vigorous growing varieties, worked five to seven feet high, merely require the gross, unripe shoots and those which are over crowded, to be taken out, and the others left unpruned. These, for the first year or two, should be trained round a small iron hoop, placed underneath the head of the plant; in a short time, they will form most beautiful pendulous trees, requiring little or no pruning.

Answer to Miss C. D., Dorchester.—The language of the Sweet Pea, is departure. The Variegated Pea signifies refusal. Sage is intended to imply domestic virtue, and Spiderwort expresses esteem, not love. The Moss rosebud is a confession of love all the world over.

Acynos.

A perennial plant, somewhat resembling Thyme. It is pretty and fragrant, growing not above six inches high, easy of culture in any common garden soil.

The Housewife.

Apples in Syrup for immediate Use.

Pare and core some hard round apples, and throw them into a basin of water; as they are done, clarify as much loaf sugar as will cover them; put the apples in along with the juice and rind of a lemon, and let them simmer till they are quite clear; great care must be taken not to break them. Place them on the dish they are to appear upon at table, and pour the syrup over.

Rice Pancakes.

Boil half a pound of rice in a small quantity of water, until quite a jelly; as soon as it is cold, mix it with a pint of cream, eight eggs, a little salt and nutmeg; make eight ounces of butter just warm, and stir in with the rest, adding to the whole as much butter as will make the batter thick enough. They must be fried in as small a quantity of lard as possible.

Tincture of Roses.

Put into a bottle the petals of the common rose, and pour upon them spirits of wine; cork the bottle, and let it stand two or three months. It will then yield a perfume little inferior to otto of roses. Common vinegar is much improved by a very small quantity of this mixture being added to it.

To preserve Steel Pens.

Metalline pens may be preserved from rusting by throwing into the bottle containing the ink a few nails, or broken pieces of steel pens, if not varnished. The corrosive action of the acid which the ink contains is expended on the iron so introduced, and will not therefore affect the pen.

To make Yeast.

Take twelve common sized potatoes; boil them; mash them while hot; pour in one pint of boiling water; add one pint of cold water; put it in a colander; get all through you can; then add one teacupful of sugar, one tablespoonful of salt; a teacupful of yeast, and set it to rise in a warm place.

Macaroni dressed sweet.

Boil two ounces of macaroni in a pint of milk, with a bit of lemon peel, and a good bit of cinnamon, till the pipes are swelled to their utmost size without breaking. Lay them on a custard-dish, and pour a custard over them hot. Serve cold.

For cleaning Floor Boards.

Scrubbing them with a mixture made by dissolving unslaked lime in boiling water will have the desired effect. The proportions are, two table-spoonfuls to a quart of water. No soap need be used.

To prevent the smoking of a Lamp.

Soak the wick in strong vinegar, and dry it well before you use it; it will then burn both sweet and pleasant, and give much satisfaction for the trifling trouble taken in preparing it.

To keep Lettuce.

If the tops of lettuce be cut off when it is becoming too old for use, it will grow up again fresh and tender, and may thus be kept good through the summer.

Moss Jelly.

Soak Carragua, or Irish moss, in cold water a few minutes, to extract the bitter taste; then drain off the water, and to half an ounce of moss put a quart of fresh water and a stick of cinnamon. Boil till it becomes a thick jelly; then strain it, and season it to the taste with white wine and white sugar. This is very nourishing, and recommended highly for consumptive complaints.

To preserve Eggs.

Take eggs fresh from the nest, place them in a tub, or pan, and pour boiling water over them; let them remain in it five seconds, take them out, and when perfectly dry pack them in boxes of bran; they will keep for months, and be perfectly fresh. They must all be perfectly fresh at first, for one stale egg will spoil a whole box.

Eau D'Ange.

Pound in a mortar fifteen cloves and one pound of cinnamon; put the whole into a quart of water, with four grains of anise-seed; let it stand over a charcoal fire twenty-four hours; then strain off the liquor and bottle it. The perfume is excellent, and will be useful for the hands, face and hair.

To purify Lemon Juice.

Add one ounce of pulverized, well burnt charcoal to a quart of lemon juice; after standing twelve hours, filter the juice through white blotting-paper; it will keep good several years in a cellar, in a bottle, well corked; a thick crust will form beneath the cork, and the mucilage will fall to the bottom.

Dried Apple Pie.

Stew the apples soft; turn them into a pan and mash them fine; add half the peel of a lemon cut fine, a little grated nutmeg, a sprinkle of salt, molasses or sugar, to make them quite sweet. Bake them in a rich paste, a little over half an hour. This will be quite as good as fresh fruit.

Simple Disinfectant.

Cut two or three good sized onions in halves, and place them on a plate on the floor; they absorb noxious effluvia, etc., in the sick-room, in an incredibly short space of time, and are greatly to be preferred to perfumery for the same purpose. They should be changed every six hours.

Ague.

M. Von Holsbeek draws attention to a mode of treatment he has found useful. Infuse an ounce of well roasted coffee in three ounces of boiling water, and having strained the fluid, acidulate it with lemon juice. The whole is given at one time, five hours before the paroxysm.

To cook Yams.

Place the yam in cold water, and boil till it is tender; then peel off the skin, and put it into the oven till it is baked a nice brown. When going to serve, cut it open, and, pressing the inside gently, butter it quite hot.

To prevent Mites in Cheese.

It is said that a cheese painted over with melted suet, so as to form a thin coat over the outside, never has mites.

To make superior Honey Soap.

Cut into thin shavings two pounds of common yellow or white soap; put it on the fire with just water enough to keep it from burning; when quite melted, add a quarter of a pound of honey, stirring it till it boils; then take it off, and add a few drops of any agreeable perfume: pour it into a deep dish to cool, and then cut it into squares. It improves by keeping. It will soften and whiten the skin.

Scalds and Burns.

A correspondent has sent us the following remedy: Mix milk of sulphur and common oil (seal oil is best) to the consistency of cream; then with a feather apply it to the affected parts as often as possible, until the pain is gone. The mixture will form a crust, and must not be washed or touched, but allowed to remain until it peels off, which it will do without leaving any scar.

Lord Olive's Curry.

Slice six onions, one green apple, and a clove of garlic; stew them in a little good stock until they will pulp, then add a teaspoonful of curry-powder, a few table-spoonfuls of stock, a little salt, and a little cayenne pepper, half a salt-spoonful of each; stew in this gravy any kind of meat cut into small pieces, adding a piece of butter, the size of a walnut, rolled in flour.

To make prime Vinegar.

A correspondent of the Ohio Cultivator vouches for the merit of the following receipt for making vinegar: Take and mix one quart of molasses, three gallons of (rain-) water, and one pint of yeast. Let it ferment and stand for four weeks, and you will have the best of vinegar.

Cure for Swellings.

Take a proper quantity of vinegar, and add saleratus to it, so long as it continues to foam. Apply this wash or solution to a swelled limb of a horse, or to a swelled bag of a cow; and in ordinary cases, two or three applications daily made, will remove the swelling.

Tincture of Allspice.

Bruised allspice one ounce and a half; brandy a pint. Steep a fortnight, occasionally shaking, then pour off the clear liquor. Excellent for many of the uses of allspice, for making a bishop, mulling wine, flavoring gravies, potted meats, etc.

To render Linen, etc., incombustible.

All linen, cotton, muslins, etc., when dipped in a solution of the pure vegetable alkali at a gravity of 124 to 130 (taking water at the gravity of 100), become incombustible.

Common Cup Cake.

One cup of butter, two cups of sugar, three cups of flour, and four eggs, well beaten together, and baked in pans or cups. Bake twenty minutes.

Charcoal Powder.

This will be found a very good thing to give knives a first-rate polish.

To cleanse Gold.

Wash the article in warm suds made of delicate soap and water, with ten or fifteen drops of sal-volatile.

Ginger Beer.

To three gallons of water take three pounds of sugar, one ounce and a quarter of cream of tartar, two and a quarter ounces of ginger, and three gills of sots. Mix the ingredients—except the sots—in one gallon and a half of boiling water; then thin the sots, add it in, and stir the whole well together. After this pour in the remaining one gallon and a half of water. Let it stand twelve hours, then pour it into a keg, and in the course of twenty-four hours it will be ready for use.

Cleansing the Hair.

Nothing but good can be derived from a due attention to cleansing the hair. Of course, an immoderate use of water is not beneficial. Once a week is perhaps desirable, but this will depend upon the individual; persons with light, thin, and dry hair will require it less than those with thick, strong hair, or who perspire very freely. Nothing is better than soap and water. The soap should be mild, and well and plentifully rubbed in the hair.

Blanco-Mange.

Weigh one ounce of isinglass to a quart of cream, one pint of new milk sweetened to your taste, the isinglass having been dissolved over night in boiling water; add to it your cream and milk; put all on the fire, and boil it fifteen or twenty minutes, stirring it all the time; take it off, and strain it through a cloth until it is nearly cold; season it with orange-flower water, or peach water, or any you may choose; then pour it into moulds.

To make green Pickles.

Put your pickles in a pot, and cover them with boiling salt and water; put a lid on the top of the pot and let it stand until the following morning; then pour off the water—boil it again, and cover the pickles as before. Do this until your pickles are a good green; then put them in plain cold vinegar, with some tumeric in it. At the end of a fortnight the pickles will be ready for use.

Dandelion Coffee.

Gather, and wash the roots, but do not scrape them; cut them up small, and roast them like coffee; pour hot water over a portion, and let it boil a few minutes. The roots are better gathered in the fall. They may be dried and kept for years.

To remove Mildew.

Take two ounces of chloride of lime, pour on it a quart of boiling water, then add three quarts of cold water; steep the linen twelve hours, when every spot will be extracted. This will be found to quite surpass the buttermilk and chalk receipt.

To make Perry.

Perry is made in the same way as cider, only from pears, which must be kept dry. The best pears for this purpose are those least fitted for eating. The redder they are, the better.

Rancid Butter.

This may be restored by melting it in a water bath, with some coarsely powdered animal charcoal (which has been thoroughly sifted from dust), and strained through flannel.

A Hint.

In making coffee, observe that the broader the bottom and the smaller the top of the vessel, the better it will be.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

BEGINNING OF THE VOLUME.

With the present number of BALLOU'S DOLLAR MAGAZINE, we begin the eighth volume of the work. This offers a good opportunity for any one to subscribe anew. We can still supply the work complete from the commencement of the year, and persons sending in their subscriptions should mention at what date they desire to have the Magazine commence. We have steadily labored to improve BALLOU'S DOLLAR MAGAZINE each month, until we have reached a degree of excellence that leads one and all to ask how can so much excellent and original matter be furnished for one dollar a year? We have still further improvements in view, and shall keep pace with the vast popularity and daily increasing circulation of our Magazine. Tens of thousands are now bound up in durable form each six months, and a valuable and wonderfully cheap work is thus obtained and preserved. Show it to your friends, and let them see what a fund of enjoyment and instruction can be laid before their family circle for one dollar a year! We charge but thirty-eight cents per volume for binding the work in gilt illuminated covers, neat, uniform and strong. Send in the past volume, to our office, and have it put in handsome and durable form, and returned in one week.

AN IRISH TOAST.—An Irishman in France was drinking with some company who proposed the toast, "The land we live in." "Ay, with all my soul, me dear," said he; "here's poor ould Ireland!"

PAINTED FACES.—No woman should paint, except she who has lost the power of blushing. "O," said a French woman, "that I could learn to blush, if it cost me a hundred francs a lesson."

A CUTE ANSWER.—"Aint you a disciple of Fourier's?" "Not exactly; but father has a tenant who goes on the Owen (owing) system."

THE CITY OF MEXICO.

This grand monument of Spanish power upon the American continent, built of massive stone, stands as firm and enduring to-day as though it were the work of the present age. Fortunate was it for posterity that the absence of timber in the Mexican valley compelled the builders to resort to stone, and thus insured the preservation of their work from century to century. There is little in the present city that is changed from ancient times, and that little is not for the better; for the present race of Mexicans have few of the qualities which distinguished their stern, persevering, and indefatigable predecessors. Modern art can do little for the Aztec city in the way of building; but Yankee ingenuity has recently been invoked to light its squares and streets with gas, and a railroad has been built between the city and the neighboring town of Tacubaya, by the same agency. The track terminates in the street beside the ancient cathedral, upon the famous altar-spot of the Aztec war-god; and the echoes that once resounded with the yell of immolated victims, and the tramp of an hundred thousand worshippers, are now awakened by the scream of the locomotive, and the thunder of the train.

SOVEREIGN REMEDIES.—For the gout, toast and water; whooping cough, ipecacuanha; bile, exercise; corns, easy shoes; blue devils, employment; rheumatism, new flannel and patience; tooth-ache, pluck it out; debts, retrenchment; love, matrimony.

TIT FOR TAT.—"Do you see how that fellow is cheating you?" said a spectator to a gamester. "Hush!" replied the latter; "don't concern yourself about the matter. I intend to pick his pocket as he goes home."

TO MERCHANTS.—Where would you consign a cargo of tortoise shell cats? To Cape Horn. Where would they be found, if overboard, in a storm? On the comb of a wave.

WONT DO FOR UTAH.—Lame men—for when they're ordered to march, they'll be sure to halt.

MINNESOTA.

This new State of our Union, destined to be the thirty-second on the catalogue, has recently been admitted as one of the glorious confederacy by the Congress of the United States. Minnesota is situated upon the upper waters of the Mississippi River, west of Wisconsin, and north of Iowa. The population there is mostly of New England, or other northern origin, and has increased by emigration with a rapidity almost unexampled even in the magic history of the Great West. The climate is most favorable for settlers from this part of the Union, it being somewhat milder than upon the Atlantic seaboard at the same latitude, and much less variable. The soil is of unsurpassed fertility for the growth of wheat, the supply of valuable timber is very abundant, and the water power for milling purposes is unsurpassed by that of any other State in the Union. These facts are of sufficient significance to account for the very rapid emigration which flows towards that new State, and to justify the prediction that Minnesota is destined to be one of the most wealthy and flourishing of all the Western States.

Our information from there pictures the natural advantages of Minnesota in the most glowing terms, and induces the belief that it is one of the best portions of the whole West for industrious emigrants to settle in. The face of the country is diversified with hills and valleys, and the scenery is represented to surpass anything which we have in the Atlantic States, for picturesque beauty. A striking feature is the great number of beautiful lakes with which the State abounds. There are hundreds of these lakes, varying in size from three to thirty miles in diameter, the greater portion of which are surrounded with well-wooded and beautiful hills; and the water of all that have been explored, is of great depth, pure and sweet. The shores of these lovely lakes will ere many years be crowned with beautiful residences and fertile fields and gardens, and the fame of Minnesota will be world-wide as the Paradise of the United States. Nor, judging by the rapid growth of the West, which has thus far taken place, is it a wild prediction to say that our children will yet journey from the Atlantic to the lakes of Minnesota, to visit the beautiful villas of their friends and relatives in that enchanting region.

THE ECLIPSE.—"What was the use of the eclipse?" asked a young lady. "O, it gave the sun time for reflection," replied a wag.

EDUCATIONAL.—Seven hundred thousand children attend school in the New England States.

WHISTLING SPIRITS.

In a letter from New York, published in a recent number of a Boston spiritual paper, it is stated that some remarkable manifestations "have recently occurred at the spiritual soirees of Mrs. Brown. There, it appears, during the past winter, spirits have manifested themselves in visible form. Not only have they exhibited the hand, and made themselves sensible to the touch, but they have stood out in proper bodily shape, so as to be obvious to all present, and recognized by their friends. But this is not all. They have spoken in audible voice, it is said, and have condescended, on some occasions, even to whistle a tune. Another of the remarkable phenomena which have occurred through Mrs. Brown's mediumship, is stated to be the production of phosphorus by the spirits. This, it is claimed, has been concentrated on the hands and arms of the medium, until it dripped from her fingers, and was capable of being gathered in a roll." Those of our readers who are mediums, and are disposed to embark in this cheap manufacture of phosphorus, should bear in mind that it is a very dangerous article, and will explode spontaneously after being dried in atmospheric air. Apothecaries keep it submerged in water. The phosphorus, therefore, on being stripped from the medium's arms, should be immediately dropped into a vessel of Cochinata.

TO YOUNG LADIES.—Beware how you accept an invitation from an industrious widow or an indefatigable old maid "to spend the day," especially if she should add, "Come early, love, and bring your work." Be assured very soon after you arrive, a heap of linen-drapery will be piled on the table, and you will be asked "just to run up a seam or two," and then to "fit on the boddice like a dear." When that is done, she will apologize for not having anything to amuse you.

CHINESE MORALITY.—Every man in China must pay up his debts at the beginning of the year, and also at the time of a religious festival, about the middle of the year. If unable to settle at these times, his business stops until his debts are paid.

TASTEFUL.—Red hair was once fashionable; not more than sixty years ago a red powder was used to give the hair the admired color.

A MINOR MISERY.—Toasting cheese, and when it is half done, letting it fall into the ashes.

THE COAL WE BURN.

There is imported into the port of Boston about half a million tons of coal per year, for the consumption of dwelling-houses, stores and manufactories. Of this quantity about six-sevenths is anthracite or hard coal, from Pennsylvania, and the balance is bituminous coal, chiefly from Nova Scotia. For the purpose of heating apartments the anthracite is used almost exclusively, on account of its greater cleanliness and economy; and where proper means are used to prevent the noxious gas from mingling with the air of the room, and a due supply of moisture ensured by artificial means, the anthracite furnishes a very agreeable and wholesome heat. Of the prominent varieties of this coal, known as red ash and white ash, the former is considered the best adapted for open combustion, it being softer and more inflammable, and the latter for burning in close furnaces, where a steady and powerful draft is practicable, and an intense heat is desirable. The white ash does not melt and run together, forming clinkers, and choking the draft, so readily as the other variety. As to the economy of expense, the red is held to be preferable to the white. Very carefully conducted experiments of burning the two kinds in open grates, show that the red is one sixth more productive of heat than the white, or in other words, that thirty pounds of the former will produce as much heat as thirty-six pounds of the latter. Consequently red ash is about as cheap at six dollars per ton as white ash is at five dollars.

All coal, whether hard or soft, anthracite or bituminous, is held by mineralogists and geologists to have a common vegetable origin, and to present the different appearances which we notice, in consequence of having been subjected to greater or less subterranean pressure and heat. The opinion also now obtains that the vegetable deposits of which coal has been formed, have been changed into coal in the localities where they grew, and have not been previously washed by floods into vast hollows; contrary to the opinions formerly held by naturalists, who hesitated to admit the possibility of such an almost infinite vegetable growth as the former hypothesis would imply. The enormous eras of time which must have been occupied in the growth and decay of the measureless mass of vegetable matter necessary to form the coal deposits of the globe, can scarcely be conceived by man, and the very attempt is appalling to the human mind. Is the atheist, in view of such revelations of endless creative power, still prepared to deny the Supreme Intelligence, and resort to the impious doctrine of an infinite chance?

Coal is a comparatively recent discovery in the United States, while it has been in use in England ever since the beginning of the thirteenth century. The first anthracite was brought to Philadelphia from Pottsville, Pa., in the year 1812, but merely for the purpose of experiment. The use of this coal as fuel does not date back more than thirty-five years. The existence of bituminous coal on this continent was known to the French missionaries, Father Henepin and others, who explored the western country in the seventeenth century. The coal of Nova Scotia has been an article of commerce for only about sixty years. Very many of our readers can remember when anthracite was first introduced among us as an article of fuel, some thirty years ago, and people looked with incredulity upon the apparently preposterous attempt to burn the black, shiny rocks of Lehigh which were dumped down before the doors of adventurous purchasers. It was no uncommon thing in those days to see heaps of the half-burned coal thrown out in waste places, in token that the "women folks" could do nothing with the stuff, and had rejected the new fuel in despair. All that is now changed. The improvements in stoves, grates, ranges, and furnaces, have been such that the anthracite is burned up all too fast, and our good housewives would as soon think of casting away a bushel of Shenango potatoes because they could not boil them, as to throw aside a hod of coal because it would not burn.

The principal known anthracite coal fields of the country are in Pennsylvania, on the eastern slope of the Alleghany mountain range, and with the exception of three or four detached basins or patches of very limited extent, the Keystone State is the exclusive depository of anthracite upon this continent. This region of the State comprises an area of about four hundred square miles, or over half a million of acres. It is penetrated in every direction by navigable rivers, canals and railroads, and the amount of capital invested in mining works and means of transportation, exceeds fifty millions of dollars. The present annual production of this coal region is about seven millions of tons, and it is increasing at about the rate of fifteen per cent. every year. Since the first working of the mines, it is estimated that the aggregate product has been upwards of seventy millions of tons. The ratio of increase in annual production that it has obtained for the last few years, would give for the year 1870, the startling product of forty-five millions of tons, worth one hundred and eighty millions of dollars. The question naturally arises whether the supply would be equal to such a demand, and the answer is, that it would be ample for that, or even one ten times as great. The quantity of coal in the anthracite coal fields of Pennsylvania is sufficient for all human demands for twenty-five hundred years to come. In short, it is inexhaustible.

Immense as the anthracite deposit may appear, it sinks into absolute insignificance when contrasted with the bituminous coal fields of our country. These extend over a greatly larger area, even in the State of Pennsylvania, than the anthracite regions; covering there a workable area of some ten thousand square miles. The great bituminous coal fields of the United States traverse thirteen of the principal States of the Union, from Georgia on the southeast, to Iowa on the northwest, and cover a workable area of at least a hundred thousand square miles in the aggregate. This field is already worked to a great extent in several of the Middle and Western States, but can never be exhausted to the end of time. Our readers may therefore dismiss all apprehensions of the country's running short of fuel while the sun shines or water runs.

COOLNESS.—Nothing is more distinctive of the gentleman, than coolness under awkward circumstances at table. A fair hostess the other day dropped a piece of broiled venison, she was handing, so that it fell against the new Cashmere vest of one of her guests. The gentleman quickly restored the crockery to the table, and repeated the first two lines of the song:

"Come, rest in this bosom, My own stricken deer," adding that he was happy to acknowledge the present from a lady of a breast plate!

SMART LAD.—A negro boy being sent by his master to borrow a pound of lard from his neighbor, thus delivered his message: "Missus Thompson, massa sen' me over to borrow or beg a pound of hog tallow; he say he got de old sow up in de pen, fatten 'em, he gwine to kill her day before yesterday, and he come over week 'fore last, and pay all you owe us."

WONDERFUL FACT.—If all the bricks, stones, and masonry of Great Britain were gathered together, they would not be able to furnish materials enough for the great wall of China.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?—The New York Picayune is published by Gun & Co. Of course it can't help going off.

MUSICAL.—It is estimated that 9000 pianos are made every year in the United States.

CARRIER PIGEONS.

The employment of pigeons as couriers is of very ancient date. Ovid, some nineteen hundred years ago, mentions their use; and Hurtius and Brutus corresponded by means of them B. C. 43. The ancients took these pigeons with them upon long journeys, to supply the deficiency of posts, if they wanted to send news home with uncommon expedition. When they thought proper to write to their friends, they released one of these birds, with letters fastened to its neck; and the bird would never cease its flight until it arrived at its nest and young ones. The courier pigeons between Aleppo and Bagdad were very celebrated. In the year 1819, thirty-two pigeons from Antwerp, in Holland, were liberated at London; two of them arrived in the former city in five hours, and the remainder on the day following—performing a distance of about two hundred and fifty miles. They were formerly employed by stock-jobbers and speculators in this country, to convey intelligence promptly. Of late years, however, the magnetic telegraph has made these innocent and faithful couriers entirely useless between the great centres of intelligence. They might, however, be employed to advantage in sending us early news from our army in Utah, and we wonder the government has not ere this employed carrier pigeons to obtain news from the western expedition, instead of waiting for the comparatively slow expresses from Utah, which consume some two or three weeks in getting to a telegraph point.

A DISAPPOINTMENT.—A young gentleman having made some progress in acquiring a knowledge of Italian, addressed a few words to an organ-grinder in his purest accent. He was astonished at receiving the following response—"I no speak Inglis." Some folks think any jaw-breaking gibberish will pass for Tusk-an.

THE TEMPERANCE TEST.—The young ladies in Vermont, it is said, still continue to kiss the lips of young temperance men, so as to be convinced that they have not been tampering with toddy.

A PAIR OF PERILS.—A pretty girl and a wild horse are liable to do much mischief; for the one runs away with a fellow's body, and the other runs away with his heart.

THE LATEST ATROCITY.—Why is a gardener like a proud farmer? Because he is a haughty culturist.

THE CLOTHES WE WEAR.

From the days of Adam and Eve to the present time, no subject has more engrossed the attention of mankind than the subject of clothes. Dress is the universal accompaniment, though not the distinctive mark, of civilization. We know of many nations which wear clothing in abundance, the people of which are yet uncivilized; but we know not of one where civilization prevails, and the people go in a state of nakedness. The legend of Adam and Eve, who be-took themselves to garments of fig leaves upon coming to a knowledge of good and evil, is typical of the motive which induces man to assume a covering for his nakedness. This feeling of native modesty is re-enforced by the necessity of protection from the climate in some cases, and by the natural desire for decoration in all. Dress affords a greater scope for ornament than nakedness does, and as a matter of course has superseded the tattooing and body-painting in which our barbarous European progenitors, both Gothic and Celtic, indulged in former times, as much as the South Sea islanders do now.

The primary use of dress is as a covering for the body; and in all considerations pertaining to it, this purpose must be kept in view. Combined with this idea of usefulness, is that of comfort to the wearer and beauty of appearance. These three, usefulness, comfort and beauty, make up the requisites for clothing. When these qualities are attained, the perfection of dress is the result; and the most gorgeous mantle of royal state, as well as the modest blouse of the humble artisan, must satisfy these tests or meet with condemnation. Good taste in dress is the due combination of these qualities in the selection and arrangement of apparel. But with mankind generally, and especially with the female sex, beauty of appearance is the governing motive in the selection of dress, and sometimes to the disregard of utility and comfort. When this is the case, extravagant display is the result, and our sense of fitness and propriety is shocked by that which was foolishly designed to please. Hence it is that there are so many people loaded with costly materials, who yet appear vulgarly dressed. Their money is squandered in preposterous attempts to outshine the jackdaw and the peacock, and the only result thereof is to make themselves an eyesore to people of taste, and a laughing-stock to the rude and unthinking.

Beauty of appearance, in subordination to usefulness and comfort, should ever be properly regarded; for it contributes to the happiness of others, and gives to those who study it a favorable access to the consideration of all with whom they come in contact. This love of the beautiful is implanted within the nature of man; it finds its answering manifestations in everything of nature, from the lowly violets beneath our feet to the starry heavens above us. It should also find its kindred manifestation in the appearance of man. His Maker has created him noble, upright, with graceful form and kindling eye, and open brow, and face that speaks the soul—the highest personification of beauty. Nor should this beautiful effect be marred by uncouth and discordant vesture. Rather should it be developed and heightened by such judicious adaptation of form and color in apparel, as the sense of the beautiful in man can suggest, and his wisdom execute. In the selection of colors for clothing, we should study the effects of harmony and judicious contrast, as seen in nature. Violent and glaring colors should be avoided; for though they may please the eye for a moment by the excitement they produce, yet they soon weary the sense of sight, and become odious by familiarity. We should reflect that a garment is not to flash upon the eye for a moment, and then pass away; but to be a daily object of familiar observation, and to become to the beholder an index of the wearer, if not a part of him in the beholder's mind.

Beauty of effect is produced by certain contrasts of color, and ugliness by others. There is a law of harmony in our natures as perfect in sight as in sound, and this law must be observed and followed, would we so combine colors in dress as to gratify the eye. The observation of nature will guide us aright in the adoption of pleasing contrasts, if we are careful to make the complexion itself one of the elements to be considered in the combination. A mere adoption of the combined hues found together in nature, without regard to his own complexion, would make a man look like a harlequin. Nor, merely because a single color by itself is pleasing, should it be adopted without regard to complexion. A pale green, for instance, is one of the most attractive colors to the eye, but let a lady of dark complexion array herself in this color, and she becomes a perfect fright, so sickly, cadaverous and sallow does she appear by contrast. While on the topic of color, a single word may be said as to dyeing the hair and beard. Nature colors the hair with reference to the skin, and it will be found by observation that the color of the former is but a deepening of that of the latter. The result is a pleasing harmony between the two, producing a beautiful effect. Now the hair-dyer entirely disregards this trait; and hence his counterfeit of nature's handiwork is awkward and easily detected. There is a contradiction between the artificial color which he gives to the hair, and the person's natural complexion, which produces an unpleasant effect upon the beholder, similar to that experienced in looking into the face of one who squints.

The form of garments is second only to color in its influence upon a beautiful appearance. Fashion governs this characteristic more than it should do, and not often for its good. Certain things as to form should be considered as indispensable, and beyond the sway of imperious fashion; such for instance as graceful and wavy outlines, and the absence of all sharp angles. In the countries where the rule of despotic fashion, with its capricious and whimsical changes, is least regarded, the forms of garments are more beautiful than where the empire of fashion is supreme. Contrast in this respect the graceful garb of the Spaniard with the sharp cut dress of the Englishman. The vesture should be shaped to the body without compression, and follow its lines in the looser or extending parts. All artificial protuberances, like the human horse-collar, the padded breast of the military coat, the ladies' bustle, or the pyramidal skirts, should be avoided, as disguising the fair proportions and graceful lines of nature, and destructive to ease, comfort and convenience. With due attention to correctness of color and shape of garments, all can dress well; for costly materials are not necessary to produce a good appearance. To look well dressed, a person should dress with propriety and neatness, rather than richly, and he will then feel at ease in his attire, and produce the impression upon those he meets, that he is in harmony with "the eternal fitness of things." Dressed thus, the ease which he experiences will go very far towards making him look well, and thus contribute towards that pleasing appearance which is a leading object in the selection and adaptation of apparel.

BACK NUMBERS.—We can still supply Balou's Dollar Monthly from the commencement of the present year. We bind the magazine handsomely, with an illuminated cover, for thirty-eight cents per volume! Two volumes to the year.

A GOOD LAW.—The ancient Romans had a law, kept inviolate, that no man should make a public feast except that he had sent food to all the poor in his neighborhood.

A TRUTH.—As a general rule, the more schoolhouses there are, the fewer prisons there will be.

COTTON IN AFRICA.

The English nation have, for a very long time, cherished the idea of encouraging the growth of cotton in some other country than this, with a view to relieving themselves from dependence upon the United States for the supplies requisite to keep their factories in operation. The East India acquisitions have been pushed more with reference to this idea, than any other. But, thus far, they have met with little success in procuring long staple cotton from Asia, and have been obliged, year after year, in times past, as they probably will be in time to come, to draw their supplies of this great staple from the Southern States of our Union. More recently, British enterprise has been directed towards Africa, to see what can be done there in the way of cotton raising. A Mr. Clegg, of Manchester, England, has distinguished himself in this undertaking. Having ascertained that the plant could be grown in Africa, he imported several natives into England for the purpose of instructing them how to raise it and prepare it for market, and then sent them back to Africa with a supply of seeds and articles necessary for the culture.

The result of Mr. Clegg's enterprise has just been exhibited in Liverpool, in the importation of seventy-two bales of cotton from Lagos, in Africa, the production of his instructed natives. We do not find in the Liverpool papers any description of the cotton, whether it be of the same quality as the American or not. Very likely it may prove to be like the Asiatic variety, after all; but whether it is or not, we think our Southern planters will be able to market their cotton in England for a long time to come. Cotton plantations in the wilds of Africa cannot be built up in a day, nor established without an immense expenditure of capital; and in the meantime, manufacturers will increase fast enough, here and at the South, to make it a question of very little importance whether England buys cotton of this country or not. While she is nursing her African bantling, our own manufacturers will be supplying England's customers, throughout the world, with cotton fabrics.

A BASE TEMPER.—It is a base temper in mankind, that they will not take the smallest slight at the hands of those who have done them the greatest kindness.

INDUSTRY AND GOOD HUMOR.—An hour's industry will do more to beget cheerfulness, suppress evil humor, and retrieve your affairs, than a whole month of warning.

HANDS AND FEET, AND THEIR EXPRESSION.

DEAR reader, give us your hand! Nay, start not, fair sir; be not coy, sweet maiden. We are no fortune-teller—no chiromancer—no believer in the exploded science of palmistry. We leave that to gipsy fortune-tellers—swarthy sultanas, who promise you a fortune and deprive you of your purse in the same breath. We leave to them the tracing of the “line of life,” and all other juggleries connected with that wild delusion which supposed that the human palm was a map of the future, only requiring the art of an uses, the hand is master of a comprehensive language—one, too, understood by all the nations. The open hand renders words of welcome and friendliness superfluous; the clenched hand breathes the unmistakable spirit of defiance. A wave of a distant hand may save from deadly peril; a warning finger may deter from crime. How accurately we describe a penurious person, by calling him a close-fisted hunk; and a generous man, by saying he is open-handed! Brutus stung his friend to madness by accusing him of having an “itching palm.” We always speak of the finger of Fate. How much meaning there was in the long, extended fore-finger of John Randolph! How well the beautiful hand of Napoleon harmonized with the classical beauty of his face. The wonders of the hand formed the theme of a philosophical discourse by the learned surgeon, Sir Charles Bell, filling a volume of the “Bridgewater Treatises.” “Nothing is more remarkable,” says Sir Charles, “as forming a part of the prospective design to prepare an instrument fitted for the various uses of the human hand, than the manner in which the delicate and moving apparatus of the palm and fingers is guarded. The power with which the hand grasps, as when a sailor lays hold of the rope to raise his body in the rigging, would be too great for the texture of mere tendons, nerves and vessels; they would be cracked were not every part that bears the pressure defended with a cushion of fat, as elastic as that which is in the foot of the horse and the camel. To add to this purely passive defence, there is a muscle which runs across the palm, and more especially supports the cushion on its inner edge; it is this muscle which, raising the edge of the palm, adapts it to lave water, forming the cup of Diogenes. In conclusion, what says Ray? ‘Some animals have horns, some have hoofs, some teeth, some talons, some claws, some spurs and beaks; man hath none of all these, but is weak and feeble, and sent unarmed into the world—why, a hand, with reason to use it, supplies the use of all these!’” The hand and its appurtenances figure largely in history. A glove cast at the feet of an adept to read its hieroglyphics. And so, dear reader, when we asked you to give us your hand, it was only in token of cordiality—that cordiality which is expressed in our first engraving. We are about to discourse of hands and their expression—for they certainly have an individuality and a meaning. In nothing did Copley show himself more the great artist than in his careful drawing of the hands of his sitters, for he very well knew that the hands had their expression as well as the eyes. Apart from its intrinsic character, and from its more obvious enemy was the gage of battle—a defiance to mortal combat. The champion of England, in olden time, at the coronation of a sovereign, rode into Westminster Abbey armed from head to heel, his charger's hoofs clattering on the flagging of the aisle, and there, drawing his mailed gauntlet from his right hand, flung it down, and dared to combat any one who should gainsay the right of the sovereign to the throne. His lady's glove was a token dearly prized in the days of chivalry. The favored knight wore it in his helmet, and, thinking all the while of the fair hand that bestowed it, and which was to be the reward of his valor, plunged into the melee, and did his devoir like a gentleman and soldier. By the old laws of England a traitor's hand was struck off by the executioner before his head fell upon the block. Once upon a time, in the chivalric age of France, when the royalty and nobility, loveliness and valor, were assembled to witness a combat of wild beasts, and when a fierce Numidian lion was raging, lord of the arena, a fair lady, to test the courage of her knight, drew her silken glove from her hand (white kids were not invented then), and flung it into the fatal ring. Instantly the knight sprang down into the bloody dust of the circle, reclaimed the glove, and restored it to the owner. Of course, after that his wooing sped thrivingly, and the hand which had flung the perilous gage was the reward of the reckless valor which obeyed the challenge. Let us thank our stars that we live in days when fair hands are won more easily, and ladies' hearts are not quite so cruel.—Our second pair of hands illustrates labor. How steadily and forcibly they grasp the plane! how eloquently they speak of a life of honorable manual toil, not necessarily excluding mental culture. The world is awakening, after a long dream, to a realization of the dignity of labor, and the artisan is no longer looked down upon by his less hard-worked brethren. Next we have idleness—a painful contrast to the preceding. The soft contours, the fleshiness of the members, the indentation of the knuckles, the long nails, incompatible with any serviceable use of the hands, bespeak a life of luxurious ease, independently of the rich dressing-gown, with its cord and tassel. The owner of these hands is evidently formed of the “porcelain clay o’ the earth;” can’t do a turn to help himself; can neither draw a rein nor grasp a sword, and accomplishes, at the utmost, a billet-doux on perfumed paper. Hotspur’s fop may have had such hands. Pass on to the fourth sketch, which tells quite a story. Here we have manhood and youth—indignant manhood, independent juvenility; irate foggydom, insolent Young America. The warning finger is threatening indeed; but those saucy little hands, united by two digits, and raised towards an unseen nose, breathe the defiance of blackguardism, recognized the world over. Where this signal originated we cannot tell; what nation—what city—gave birth to this silent sign of “chaffing” is yet unwritten. But we dare say such telegraphic signals were exchanged between the outposts of Sebastopol; the gamins of Paris employ them to influence the Pipelets of the porters’ lodges; the little London cockney thus flaunts his fingers “howdaciously” in the face of the police. It is generally executed when the young tormentor is at a sufficient distance from his insulted elder to give the former a fair start when the latter is goaded to distraction and plunges into a fruitless pursuit. The next sketch illustrates awkwardness. The owner of these hands is most unmistakably a clumsy person. The contents of that cup of coffee are destined to affect his own knees with an unpleasant sensation of excessive warmth, or to ruin the lady's dress who sits next to him. From these intractable digits, how often must knife and fork and buttered toast fall upon the floor! How utterly impossible for them to convey a Prince's Bay oyster to the owner's lips! Just fancy them undertaking to carve a tough goose; imagine the horror of their manipulations on the drum-sticks, or the impossible joints of the sinewy wings. We can fancy those hands passing through a lifetime of gaucherie. We would not trust them to commit suicide—somebody else would have the benefit of their random action. Fancy hair-triggers in such a pair of paws in a crammed shooting-gallery! The idea is excruciating, and we pass on to the next subject—misapplied dexterity. Here we have the dexterous fingers of a "fogle-hunter," the designation, in classic "Romany," of a gentleman who relieves another gentleman of the care of his pocket-handkerchief. These fingers have been trained from infancy to that employment. "Of a hempen widow the kid forlorn," in his tender years the young "cly-faker" was taught by elder thieves in the classic purlieus of St. Giles, to take handkerchiefs and watches from an artificial figure, without disturbing one of the straws of which it was composed. When his education was completed, he was launched into the streets of London, to levy contributions on the luckless passengers through its crowded thoroughfares. The hulks and Botany Bay, if not the gallows, close the agreeable perspective of our light-fingered gentleman. The next sketch shows a pair of hands with the "mufflers" on, ready for a knock down argument. It feelingly reminds us of illustrious John Bull, the parent and patron of boxing. How Dr Watts could have existed in the laud of the prize-ring, we cannot conceive. But though the good doctor tells us that "hands were never made to scratch each other's eyes," he does not in express terms condemn those who "hit straight out from the shoulder." One of the most eloquent chapters of Hazlitt's Essays is devoted to an enthusiastic description of the fight between Hicks the gasman and Bill Neate. Byron was proud of his pugilistic prowess under the tuition of Jackson. Hazlitt's enthusiasm in behalf of what has been apologetically termed the "noble science of self-defence" is a curious instance of his perversity. A single passage from the "Fight" will illustrate this:—"The wonder was the half-minute time. If there had been a minute or more allowed between each round, it would have been intelligible how they should by degrees recover strength and resolution; but to see two men smashed to the ground, smeared with gore, stunned, senseless, the breath beaten out of their bodies, and then, before you recover from the shock, to see them rise up with new strength and courage, stand ready to receive or inflict mortal offence, and rush upon each other 'like two clouds over the Caspian;' this is the most astonishing of all—this is the high and heroic state of man!" We should rather call it the low and bestial state of brutes. But let us pass on to our next sketch, which illustrates rapacity. They may be the hands of a usurer raking in his cent. per cent., or the gambler clutching at the golden fortune that lies upon the green cloth—the sentiment is the same in either case. You see the rapacious soul in the very tips of the fingers. Fingers, quotha? Nay, they are claws—the talons of the vulture—the human vulture, fiercer and more inexorable than the bird of prey. The kite only seizes what his appetite demands and his stomach can digest; but the miser grasps what cannot enrich him, though it impoverishes the world. What tenacity there is in those claws!—what a habit of contraction is displayed in those muscles! You see that their relaxation is impossible. Those tenacious fingers can never open wide; they are tentaculæ, fit only for gripping. If that table were strewn with gold dust, not a particle would escape the demoniac raking of those claws. The owner is laying down the law, enumerating his arguments, or marking his points by the several digits. Or we may suppose him Mr. Mahoney, reckoning up the numbers of that "illigant" party the night before: "There was five of us; the two Mulligans was one, O'Brady was two, Conolly was three, and myself was four. No, that's not it! There's myself was one, Conolly was two, O'Brady was three, and the two Mulligans was four. Upon my sowl, there was only four, after all, and me thinking there was five!"

And now let us relate, as apposite to our theme, an anecdote which we may style the STORY OF A HAND.

Soon after the French army, during the days of Napoleon I., had entered Madrid, the Grand Duke de Berg invited the most distinguished people of the city to a French fete given by the army in the newly-conquered capital. Notwithstanding the splendor of the gala, the Spaniards were by no means gay; their ladies danced but little, and most of the guests confined themselves to the card-tables. The gardens of the palace were so splendidly illuminated that the ladies could walk there with as much security as in broad daylight. The festival was imperially gorgeous, and no expense was spared in order to give the Spaniards a lofty idea of the emperor, if they would only judge him by his lieutenants.

In a grove near the palace, between one and two o'clock in the morning, several French officers were discussing the chances of the war, and the discouraging auguries of the future to be drawn from the cold and menacing attitude of the Spaniards who were present at this splendid festival.

"I tell you what, gentlemen," said a Frenchman, whose dress indicated the surgeon-in-chief of some column of the army, "yesterday I formally requested my recall from Prince Murat. Without being exactly afraid of leaving my bones in the peninsula, I prefer to go and dress the wounds made by our good neighbors the Germans—their weapons do not go so deep into the torso as the Castilian poignards. Then the fear of Spain is a sort of superstition with me. In my boyhood, I read in Spanish books a heap of sombre adventures, and a thousand stories of this country, which prejudiced me strongly against it. Well, since our entrance into Madrid, though I am no hero of romance, I have been involved in an adventure which might serve as the basis of such a romance as Mrs. Radcliffe writes. I feel impelled to listen to my presentiments, and to-morrow I strike my tent and decamp. Murat will certainly not refuse me my congé, for, thanks to the services we surgeons render, we can always command favor."

"By Jove, you've excited my curiosity, my boy," said an old republican colonel, with a pull at his heavy mustaches, "and now you're bound in honor to satisfy it! Let's hear your story—anything to enliven us!"

"My story is not calculated to enliven your spirits," answered the surgeon, gloomily.

"Well, whether it's sad or merry, let's hear it."

The surgeon seemed to hesitate.

"Is there a lady in the case?" asked a young hussar.

"There is."

"Then, my dear fellow, it must be interesting."

"Out with it," cried the old colonel, "without more ado!"

The surgeon looked cautiously about him, as if to scan the faces of those who surrounded him, and, having assured himself that there was no

Spaniard in the vicinity, said:

"Well, since then we are all Frenchmen, comrades, I'll tell you what happened to me. About ten days ago I attended a masquerade ball given by some of our wild fellows, who did not understand or comprehend the danger of such a sort of entertainment among a people where assassination is more popular than duelling, and where the mask and domino would be more likely to screen a deadly foe than to hide the form of a friendly reveller. If the commander-in-chief had been apprized of this affair beforehand, he would have suppressed it instantly; but he only knew of it after it was all over, and as no tragic occurrence had arisen from it, he contented himself with reprimanding the getters-up of the masquerade, and forbidding such entertainments in future.

MISAPPLIED DEXTERITY.

"Well, I went to this ball, and for a while had a very dull time—masquerades always seemed to me the stupidest affairs in the world. I felt dispirited, and a presentiment of evil weighed upon my heart like lead; so I stood apart from the noisy revellers, leaning with folded arms against a pillar, and philosophizing on the recklessness of our countrymen, who would dance on the surface of a mine, even if they knew that the last gallopade would end in explosion and ruin. I cannot say how long I was plunged in this reverie—the moving figures of the crowd passing before my eyes like the changes of a kaleidoscope—when a light hand was laid upon my shoulder.

"The hand that was laid upon my shoulder was an exquisitely delicate one, and the only imperfection I perceived—a small mole that stained its satin surface—could scarcely be found fault with, as like a beauty-spot upon a fair complexion, it enhanced the exquisite and Parisian purity of the skin. From the hand I glanced to the figure; but that, as well as the face, was concealed from view. The foot and ankle, however, that were perhaps coquettishly exposed, were so exquisitely modelled that they would have delighted the eye of a sculptor, and to the connoisseur of female charm, afforded proof that the mysterious lady must be exceedingly beautiful, since such exquisite hands and feet are usually in harmonious keeping with the whole person.

"Well, gentlemen, that little hand, laid so lightly on my arm, but so thrilling my whole frame by its gentle pressure, trembled excessively, as if the fair incognita were the prey to the most violent emotion; and, indeed, there was a nervous tremulousness in my voice when she accosted me by my name. I expressed my surprise at her knowing me; but, instead of replying in the usual badinage of a woman who seeks to intriguer a gentleman on one of these occasions, she begged me earnestly to escort her out of the press, and to take her into one of the side rooms, where she could be entirely alone and unobserved. I need not say that I hastened to comply with her wishes. She asked me many questions about Paris, using the Spanish language, so that I found difficulty in framing my replies, for I was not much of a Spanish scholar.

"Cannot madame speak French?" I asked.

"Indifferently well," was the reply, in an accent that would have done honor to the Faubourg St. Germain.

"She then went on to talk in that language, her spirits seeming to revive, until her conversation rivalled in gayety that of the merriest masker on the floor.

"Pardon, madame," I said, in one of the pauses of the conversation, 'but your accent, and your acquaintance with localities and nice shades of French character and manners, convince me that I am addressing a countrywoman.'

"You are not mistaken in your supposition," replied the unknown.

"And I presume you are of the family of one of our officers?"

"Alas, no!"

"At least you will follow the army, if it returns to Paris. A Frenchwoman can hardly like this triste country."

"I abhor it—yet I shall end my days here."

"That is very strange."

"I could tell you strange things, but my lips are sealed. I am only here to-night at the peril of my life, but I cannot explain to you the position in which I am placed. The pleasure of once more mingling with my dear countrymen, and hearing tidings of la belle France, has compelled me to do what marching up to an enemy's battery is mere child's play.'

"There was an earnestness in her manner that assured me she was not merely seeking to mystify me. She paused, and I hastened to say:

"If I can be of any service to madame, I pray that she will command me in any manner, and at all times.'

"I thank you a thousand times. From what I have heard of you before, and from you to-night,' she was pleased to say, 'I trust you entirely. Do you observe this ring upon my finger?'

"She placed that little white hand I had so admired confidently in mine, and I raised it respectfully so that the light of a lustre might fall full upon it. The ring she alluded to was a cameo, and on it a figure of Venus rising from the sea was exquisitely engraved.

"Should you know this ring again?' she asked.

"Wherever I saw it.'

"But in the dark?'

"That was a singular question, and puzzled me.

"Stay,' said the unknown. 'Close your eyes until I bid you open them. Now press your finger on the figure, and try to remember the impression, so that by feeling you could recognize the ring even in the dark, as the blind distinguish objects.'

"I did as she requested.

"Well,' said she, in a merry, laughing tone, 'do you think you can dispense with your eyes upon emergency?'

"I think so—at any rate, I should recognize the hand, for it is a peerless one.'

"I was not angling for compliments, sir,' she answered, in a tone between jest and earnest. 'It is not a question of the hand, but of the ring. Do you think you could recognize the latter?'

"I think I could.'

"Enough—I must perforce remain satisfied with that doubtful assurance.'

"May I open my eyes now?'

"Count twenty deliberately, and then you may.'

"I obeyed her in this, as in all her capricious directions, but when I looked again, the enchantress was gone. After that the ball was doubly dreary to me, and I hastened home to my quarters, but my head was filled with the singular passages I have related to you, and my brain racked with conjectures as to the identity of the bewitching incognita. The next day I walked about as one in a dream. My professional duties disgusted me—the crash of arms and the roll of drums maddened me. I stole away into such solitude as I could find, and there indulged in dreams of the unknown beauty of the masquerade.

"Six days ago I was returning quietly to my lodgings about eleven o'clock at night, after having left General Latour, whose hotel is but a few steps from mine. Suddenly, at the corner of a little street, two unknown persons, or rather two demons, threw themselves upon me, and wrapped my head and arms in a cloak. Of course I shouted at the top of my lungs, but the cloth stifled my cries, and I was thrust into a carriage with the most rapid dexterity. The carriage was then driven off at a rapid rate. I made an effort to free myself from the cloak that shrouded me, and succeeded, finding myself seated with only one companion, and that a female. I was prepared to cry out for help, when a soft hand was placed upon my lips, and a soft voice whispered in my ear:

"Beware! no harm is intended you. And now, sir, since I have you in my power, please to place your finger on the ring.'

"I did so, and thought I recognized that worn by the fair incognita at the masquerade.

"What!' I exclaimed, 'are you the beauteous being I met at the masquerade, and who taught me this test?'

"I am that lady's waiting-maid,' replied the girl, 'and I am about to conduct you to my mistress.'

"A thousand thanks.'

COMPLICATED NARRATIVE.

"Do not be so ready with your thanks. You can only see my lady at the risk of your life. If you decline the hazard, say so frankly, and I am ordered to permit you to return to your quarters.'

"I would risk a thousand lives to see her once more!" I exclaimed.

"It is well," replied the soubrette. 'My mistress expected no less of your gallantry. But are you armed? If not, here is a two-edged poignard you can take. If any one challenges you in the place whither we are going, strike home—strike deep, as the Spaniard strikes.'

"I thank you," I replied, though slightly shuddering at the fierceness of my companion, 'but I have my sabre and pistols.'

"Are you sure that the blade plays free in the scabbard?'

"Quite sure.'

"Are the priming and loading fresh in your pistols?'

"I loaded and primed them before I left my quarters this evening.'

"Good again. One thing more you must do. You must consent to wear this mask. Nay, it is for your own protection.'

"I put on a black velvet mask which she handed me.

"One thing more.'

"Speak.'

"See that your sabre does not rattle when I bid you follow me. And now be prudent as well as brave.'

"At last the carriage stopped, and we got out. It was pitch dark. I heard the noise of a key inserted in the lock of a gate. The chamber-maid soon led me through the gravelled alleys of a large garden up to a certain place, where we stopped. I could now distinguish the dark mass of a large building looming up directly before us.

"Silence, now," she whispered in my ear, 'and keep a strict watch over yourself. Don't lose a single one of my signals; I cannot speak without danger to both of us, and your life is now at stake. My lady is in a room on the ground floor; but to reach her apartment, we must pass through the room, and beside the bed, of a sleeping man, who has armed men at his disposal, and who would not hesitate to kill us like dogs. Walk lightly, and follow me closely, for fear of stumbling against any of the furniture, or setting foot outside the carpet which I have arranged to muffle our steps.'

"This was an adventure, comrades; but I was resolved to follow it through, if it cost me my life. A door was opened, and I found myself in a large and lofty room, dimly lighted by a smoking lamp. The window was open, but it was secured by heavy bars of iron. On a bed lay an old man plunged into a profound sleep. Thence we passed into another room, where sat a young woman, lovelier than the most beautiful creations of art, though seen to disadvantage from the terrible emotion to which she was a prey. She welcomed me with a sad smile, and begged me to sit down beside her.

"You see," she whispered, 'how much confidence I place in you—and alas, to how much peril my selfishness is willing to expose you!'

"Speak not of that," I replied, 'but tell me how I can serve you honorably.'

"She blushed at the emphasis I placed on the last word, and said:

"Sir, I am a prisoner here!'

"Then the person, through whose chamber I passed—

"Has no legal right to control my actions," she replied. 'He is not my husband, though I am his affianced bride—and never will I be his wife, unless I am dragged by force to the altar. Yet even of that he is capable. I am surrounded here by his mercenaries; and I am an orphan—alone in the world!'

"She interrupted her story to dry the tears that dimmed her beautiful star-like eyes, and to recover her composure. After a time she went on in a calmer voice, and informed me that she was the daughter of a Frenchwoman, settled in Madrid, who had—from what I gathered, though she hinted at this very delicately—treated her with great severity, and who had commanded her to marry a rich old man to cancel certain pecuniary obligations, the payment of which in money would ruin her. The mother died in the house in which we then were. Immediately the young French girl bade the creditor take her property, and release her from the hated contract. This he refused, and had ever since kept her a strict prisoner, threatening every moment to order a servile priest to celebrate the marriage.

"Now," said she, 'I have no male friend in Madrid only you, whose acquaintance I formed by chance. Will you aid me to fly to-night?'

"Will I? The moment that I place you in security, will be the proudest, the happiest of my life! I knelt at her feet, and covered the beautiful white hand, which she abandoned freely to me, with passionate kisses. When I rose to my feet, I felt as if I could cut my way through a legion.

"But how are we to manage your flight?" I asked.

"Two horses are even now waiting saddled at the garden-gate," she replied. 'They are fleet Andalusians, and will bear us whither you will. The man who assumes to control my destiny has taken a sleeping-draught, and will not awake till I am in safety.'

"These words were no sooner out of her mouth, than she turned deadly pale, and uttered a stifled scream.

"Perjured woman, thou liest!" cried a stern voice; and turning, I beheld at the door of the next chamber, the master of the house, attired in a dressing-gown, with a drawn sword in his hand. 'And you,' he added, addressing me, 'unmask, and show your traitor-face!'

"Not for your life!" replied the unknown lady, recovering. 'It is my command. Fly, I conjure you! He dare not injure me, but you he will sacrifice to his rage.'

"I saw, indeed, that I could not profit the dear lady by remaining; and, moreover, at a shrill whistle from the old Spaniard, I heard footsteps hastening to the room, and half a dozen armed ruffians soon appeared to support their master. With my drawn sabre in one hand, and a pistol in the other, I rushed upon them, and cutting right and left, forced my way out, but closely pursued. At the garden gate I threw myself on one of the horses, thinking to ride to the nearest post, summon assistance, and return to the house. But the animal was unmanageable, and ran away with me. When I attempted to rein him in, the reins parted in my hand; they had been cut, as I since ascertained. Whither the frantic horse carried me I know not; but at last, in making a desperate bound, he slipped on the flagging, and fell, and it was some time before I recovered from the stunning effects of my own fall. When I did so, finally, after wandering for hours, I found my way home; but I have since vainly sought for the place I visited that night. The beautiful lady is lost to me forever, and I fear is ere this the bride of the old ruffian."

LOVE FOR LIFE.

At this moment the surgeon turned pale; all eyes were fixed on his, and followed their direction. The Frenchmen then saw a Spaniard wrapped in a cloak, whose eyes were blazing in a tuft of orange trees. The officers had hardly turned their eyes on him, when the man, though old, disappeared with the lightness of a sylph. A captain sprang in pursuit of him.

"Ah, my friends," cried the surgeon, "that basilisk glance has frozen me. I hear my death-knell. Receive my adieux, and bury me here."

"Are you mad?" said the colonel. "Falcon has gone on his track, and will soon overhaul the spy."

"Well," cried the officers, as they saw the captain returning, breathless.

"I don't know what to make of it," replied Falcon. "He must have vanished through the walls. As I don't think he is a conjurer, he must be intimately acquainted with the passages and turnings of the house, and so escaped readily."

"I am lost!" said the surgeon, in a gloomy tone.

"Keep calm," replied the officers. "We will watch with you till your departure, and pass this evening with you, to begin with."

In fact, three young officers, who had lost their money at play, escorted the surgeon to his lodgings, and offered to remain with him. The second day after the surgeon had obtained his leave to return to France, and made all his preparations for starting with a lady, to whom Murat gave a strong escort. He was just finishing dinner in company with his friends, when his servant came to inform him that a young woman wished to speak with him. The surgeon and the three officers immediately went down stairs in company, fearing some snare. It was the chambermaid, who had been his companion in the carriage on that memorable night. She had only time to say to the surgeon, "Take care!" and then fell dead. Having discovered that she had been poisoned, this girl had hoped to arrive in time to save the surgeon.

"By heavens!" cried Captain Falcon; "only a Spanish girl could trot through the streets after a dose of prussic acid."

The surgeon was very sad. To drive away the singular presentiments which disturbed him, he resumed his seat at the table, and drank im-moderately, as did his companions. All of them, half intoxicated, went to bed early.

In the middle of the night the surgeon was awakened by a sharp noise caused by the curtain-rings of his bed being violently drawn back on the brass rod that sustained them. He sat up, a prey to that mechanical trepidation which seizes us at the moment of such an awakening. He saw standing before him an old Spaniard, who cast the same burning look on him he had done when they first met. The surgeon cried, "Help, friends, help!"

To this cry of distress, the Spaniard answered by a bitter smile. "Opium grows for everybody," said he.

Having said this, he drew from his cloak the recently amputated hand of a woman, and showed it to the surgeon, pointing out the mark which he had so imprudently described to his friends.

"Is it the same?" he asked, hoarsely. By the light of a lantern resting on the bed, the surgeon recognized the beautiful hand, and was overwhelmed by the agony of his grief.

The stranger required no other reply, but, satisfied with the identity of his victim, plunged his dagger into his heart, and fled.

Many years afterwards a widow lady with a Spanish name, exceedingly beautiful, but pale, and bearing in her face traces of deep suffering, attributed to the loss of her husband, came to reside at Touraine, in France. It was soon discovered that her right hand was useless, and that in fact she had lost her natural hand, and its place had been supplied by an artificial one.

One evening at a party, a gentleman, who had formed her acquaintance, ventured to ask her in a casual manner how she had lost her hand.

"In the Spanish war of independence," she replied, coldly. And that was all that could ever be elicited from the lips of the nameless heroine of our narrative.

So much for hands, and their expression—the remaining pictures in this number show how much there may be in feet, the basis of our human superstructure. The base of a column is quite as important as the capital, and the feet, as our sketches show, are not without expression. The first sketch, representing several light fantastic toes, as Richard Sniveller would say, returning from a ball, illustrates one of the chances to which human life is subject—penance after pleasure—disappointment after joy. It is rainy, slushy and muddy; the last cab has disappeared, and the dainty satins and varnished leathers that have lately tripped over the polished floor, must now tread the muddy streets in their forced pilgrimage. The second pair is also narrative in its demonstration. The spurred heel betrays the soldier, the attitude, an offer of heart and hand, and "love for life," while the smaller feet that twinkle in the picture express coyness, that will soon be overcome by ardor. The next sketch affords a striking contrast—wealth and poverty, aristocratic luxury and plebeian misery, varnished and grained leather, the elegant boot and the fragmentary brogan. The next picture shows life and animation. It is a chase. Old shoes against official boots! Of course the owner of those shoes has "took what isn't his'n." The avenging law, in the shape of those Bombastes boots, pursues them. Who can doubt the result of the pursuit? Gildersleeve himself could not run in such gear. Vainly up one street and down another that pair will shuffle, while the hulloa of "stop thief!" from the officer is taken up by every ragged boy, many of them not immaculate, multiplied and reverberated by the echoes, and falling on the ear of the fugitive with an appalling weight. Vainly may he shuffle, double and wind. He cannot shake off his grim pursuer. The next drawing shows his fate. Compulsory repose clogs the activity of those graceful soles. A ball and chain fast anchor some mercurial fugitive. Justice is satisfied. The next presents us with a problem, which it is not, however, difficult to solve. The owner of those Uriah Heep-like feet in the right-hand corner is shrinking from some cause or other. What cause is it?

FORCED REPOSE.

There is a large foot on the left, but where is its fellow foot? Engaged, of course, in applying sundry visitations of shoe leather to the person of the owner of the shrinking feet. Kicking is a very expensive luxury, when directed to a human being and not an inanimate foot-ball. Its cost varies, but it may be safely said that a poor man cannot indulge in it. Yet even ladies have been known to affect this extravagance. While on the subject of feet, we may remind our readers of what Diedrich Knickerbocker said of the watchmen's feet in the good old days of Manhattan:—"A brisk trade for furs," says that veracious historian, "was soon opened. The Dutch traders were scrupulously honest in all their dealings, and purchased by weight, establishing as an inviolable rule of avoirdupois, that the hand of a Dutchman weighed one pound, and his foot two pounds. It is true, the simple Indians were often puzzled by the great disproportion between bulk and weight, for let them place a bundle of furs, never so large, in one scale, and a Dutchman put his hand or foot in the other, the bundle was sure to kick the beam; never was a package of furs known to weigh more than two pounds in the market of Communipaw! This is a singular fact, but I have it direct from my great grandfather, who had risen to considerable importance in the colony, being promoted to the office of weigh-master, on account of the uncommon heaviness of his foot." The staff and swathed feet of the next engraving show the owner to be a conscientious pilgrim, not like Pindar's, who, when ordered to do penance with peas in his shoes, "took the liberty to have them boiled." The next pair of feet belongs evidently to a son of the Emerald Isle. He is giving vent to the exuberance of his spirits by capering on the sod. What causes his delight we can only conjecture; somebody may have trod on his coat and given him the prospect of a shindy—or some other piece of good luck may have suddenly befallen him. "Last scene of all," the march to battle. Four pairs of brogans are travelling the path that "leads to glory or the grave," the elevation of their soles indicating the excitement of their spirits. "March on, march on, ye brave!" You are taking steps to acquire fame. In double-quick time you will arrive at the goal. Alas, some of those brogans will never retrace their steps! Peace to their soles! When the account is footed up, they will only be units in the sum total of glory.

PILGRIMAGE.

THE WHIPPOORWILL.

While enjoying a comfortable chair upon the piazza last night, and reflecting upon the events of the day, our thoughts were disturbed by the far off strain of a whippoorwill. It was the first we had heard this season, and its sad music awakened a train of reflections. While the air of spring is filled with the songs of a thousand warblers by day, by night is heard the mournful chant of the whippoorwill. Buried deep in the groves of a southern land, and nestling quietly beneath a tropical sun, this lover of warmth and comfort chases away the long winter months; and when the meridian sun again breaks the ice and dissolves the snow, when the green grass once more shoots up, and the trees leave in their usual order, away, away he flies, and the old haunts of his birdish love know him once again. The bright glare of day seems to have no charm for him; unlike other feathered songsters, he prefers to sing at night. When all is silent, save the low chirps of the katydid, and an occasional hoot of the owl, the little melancholy bird of the night comes forth from his hidden nook, and seating himself upon a bough, rocked by the evening wind, he begins his plaintive chant, "Whippoorwill." This is soon caught up and echoed back by another of his tribe, and another will take up the strain, and thus it will be carried from throat to throat, until the forest air vibrates with the melancholy song. This serenade continues long after all other winged and creeping things are asleep; and not until the first streaks of sunlight tint the tree-tops, do they cease their night wail, and retire to their hidden and leafy recesses. There they rest in security and quiet until the twilight chirp of the katydid calls them forth again.

DELIGHT.

The whippoorwill is about the size of a robin; has a long tail, and its color is a lighuish brown—rather a pretty bird than otherwise. It is sometimes called "bird of the night," from its peculiar habit of being hidden all day, when other birds are out, and coming forth at night.

Many years ago we remember visiting the ruins of an old churchyard; the graves were mostly flattened by time, and the few grave-stones it boasted were mouldered with age. It was just after twilight, and all was still and serene in that old burial-place, save a plaintive note from a whippoorwill. Following the direction of the sound, it brought us to a little grave, with a small stone at the head; it bore this simple inscription, "Our Willie." Retreating again to a little distance, and waiting for a sound from the little songster, we were presently gratified by seeing a little bird perched upon a low limb of an oak, which grew immediately at the boy's head, open his throat, and emit the slow, mournful notes which had just attracted our attention. The summer wind played in the long grass, and stirred the leaves of the oak, and, while the twilight shaded more and more into night, the loving little whippoorwill sung louder and more loud over the little lonely boy; and we thought, as we turned homeward, we had never heard a more touching or solemn requiem.—Wilmington (N. C.) Herald.

Some have wondered that disputes about opinions should so often end in personalities; but the fact is, that such disputes begin with personalities, for our opinions are a part of ourselves.

GLORY.

THE CHICKENVILLE GHOST:

—OR,—

WHICH IS THE WITCH.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

THERE never had been such excitement in Chickenville, since Chickenville obtained the distinguished honors of a local habitation, and a name on the county map. The "oldest inhabitant" had never known anything like it. Nothing else was talked of. If a crowd of three persons gathered in the one street of Chickenville, it was sure to be the sole topic of conversation. Old women lifted up their eyes and hands in wonderment and horror, when it was alluded to; and if children chanced to hear it spoken of, they would run shrieking to their mothers, and hide their faces in their laps. And the cause of all this was—?—A GHOST, AND A WITCH!

"Bless my heart!" the fair reader may possibly exclaim, "do you really mean to assert, that in this enlightened age, these days of daguerreotypes, submarine cables and railroads, people are foolish enough to believe in such things? Pho! sir, you must be joking."

Not a bit of it, madame, as you yourself will admit, when you have heard my story, which is in every respect a true one.

After service on Sunday morning, the Reverend Selah Context had given notice that the Chickenville sewing circle would be held on the following Thursday evening, at the house of Mrs. Coosypeg, the wife of the village doctor; and accordingly, at the hour appointed, some dozen ladies assembled in the parlor of that respected matron. The only gentleman present was the doctor, who in virtue of his position as host, was permitted to join the circle. He had another claim to the privilege, for he was quite an old school practitioner, and had attended in his professional capacity, most of the individuals present, and, to tell the honest truth, was very much of an "old woman" himself.

The tea-things having been removed, the work-baskets were set on the table; and now the clatter of cups and saucers and the jingling of teaspoons gave way to talk, an accomplishment in which, I have observed, ladies who frequent sewing circles are thoroughly posted up.

"It's very remarkable," said Mrs. Pipchin, the attorney's lady, "extremely remarkable; I can't at all make it out."

"Deeply mysterious," chimed in Miss Rawker, a tall, ancient maiden lady of fifty, with eyes like boiled gooseberries, a flaxen "false front," and a sour facial expression, as though she always washed her face in vinegar, and lived perpetually on pickles.

"O, it's so romantic! How I should like to see a real ghost," simpered little Miss Milkit, a young lady of the sentimental school, who wrote sweet verses for the Chickenville Banner, and adored Tupper.

"That's a very presumptuous wish, my dear," said Mrs. Coosypeg, kindly, and she added, "it's quite certain there is something beyond common in this affair. What do you think, Coosypeg, my love?"

The gentleman thus addressed was a pompous little man, with florid cheeks, a red nose, little blue eyes, a bald head and double chin, which latter was half buried in an abyss of white neckcloth. He wore a blue coat with brass buttons, a buff vest, a la Daniel Webster, and his queer little legs were encased in glossy black pants. On hearing his wife's question, he immediately and involuntarily assumed a professional dignity, gave a great, significant "hem," and said:

"What do I think, Mrs. Coosypeg? Why, (he was a great admirer of Shakspeare, and always quoted, or rather mis-quoted from his works, whenever possible), why, I consider that there are more things in heaven and earth, Mrs. Coosypeg and ladies, than we know anything at all about. That's my simple opinion, madam," and with another prodigious "hem," he sank back in his chair.

At this moment, Mr. Pipchin the attorney entered the room, it being the custom at such times for the husbands, brothers, and "lovers so gay" of the ladies, to join them after tea. The opinion of this gentleman was at once asked, but before recording his answer, it will perhaps be as well to give the reader some idea of the remarkable circumstances to which the ladies have just alluded, and which had caused such intense excitement in the village of Chickenville.

Just at the entrance to the village, in a small but neat cottage, resided Mrs. Ramsay, a widow, who, at the death of her husband, was left in very straitened circumstances. She had but one child—a daughter, now some eighteen years of age. Chylena Ramsay was beautiful as heroines (for she is my heroine, reader,) generally are, excepting those of Charlotte Bronte; but her health was extremely delicate, and all the medicaments of Doctor Coosypeg had failed to relieve her. Every one predicted consumption, and indeed her pale brow and hectic cheek might well have favored such a supposition. To ake out her mother's scanty income, Chylena made water-color drawings, which she sold in the neighboring town, did plain work, and occasionally gave lessons in music; but all these means of procuring money were too precarious. So, one day she travelled to Boston, sought for employment, obtained some which she thought would serve at least to keep the wolf from the door, and returned home with a heart much relieved. But it was noticed soon after this, that her health became still more delicate, her cheek yet paler; and on Sunday as she went to church, it was evident that her step was less elastic. Thus matters for some time went on. Now, it is not at all to be wondered at, that so pretty and amiable a girl as Chylena Ramsay should have had a lover—indeed, it would have been strange if she had not. It happened then, that a young man named Ralph Burney, had fallen deeply and desperately in love with the widow's daughter, and his love was warmly reciprocated, but in the present precarious state of her daughter's health, Mrs. Ramsay peremptorily refused her consent to their marriage.

"You see," she would say, "Chylena is growing weaker and weaker every day, and it would be the height of folly under such circumstances to unite your fortunes in matrimony. If anything happened to her, the pang of parting would be only the greater were you married. No, no—wait a little while longer, and then, if Chylena improves in health, be assured I will interpose no further objection."

This was reasonable enough; but when did ever an ardent lover listen to reason? Ralph had no faith in the opinion of old Coosypeg, that Chylena's case was hopeless, and he determined to seek other means than his physic, to aid in her restoration to health. He was a sharp-sighted young man, and fancied that he had discovered what her ailment was. He therefore laid his plans accordingly.

Ralph and Chylena, after enjoying an hour of each other's society, parted, Ralph declaring his intention of going to Boston in search of some remedy for Chylena—who, on her part, promised to adopt any measures he might recommend.

Of course, Chickenville boasted its store—a place where every article was kept, excepting the particular one required; and, of course also, this store which was kept by a big, burly fellow, named Barnabas W. Badgit, was the loafing-point of the village. In its centre was a huge, dirty stove, around which, some seated on casks, some on benches, some on the counter, and others leaning against the iron pillars that supported the roof, were to be seen from morning to night—chewing—smoking or whittling, a number of those who either had nothing to do, or wouldn't do anything. In the evenings a few of the industrious neighbors would lounge in, after their day's work was done, and then the affairs of the nation were canvassed, and gossip and scandal ruled the hour. One evening, when a knot of idlers were assembled, the conversation took the following turn:

"You don't believe in ghosts and witches, Hiram?" (It was the village shoemaker who spoke). "Why, then, you don't believe in scriptur—that's all."

"How do you make that out?" inquired Hiram Sparkles, the blacksmith, who was the party addressed.

"Why, look a' here; warn't there the witch of Endor, and the ghost of Samuel?" Answer me that."

"I didn't say there wasn't. But you don't mean to say that Widow Ramsay's daughter is a witch, do you?"

"Wal, I dunno as to that—if there was witches in scriptur' times, and witches in Salem ever so long since, why shouldn't there be now? Didn't witches in the old days do things as nobuddy could, and don't Chyl' Ramsay beat every other woman and gal in the village at work, as all the village knows—and she out of health, too? And hadn't the Salem witches what they called their familiar spirits—in other words, imps of the devil, in the shape of black cats or dogs, or summat o' that sort? And didn't I listen," he added triumphantly, "to the most onchristian sounds as ever was heerd, as I went by Widow Ramsay's cottage the other night after eleven o'clock, and Chylena Ramsay singing in some diabolical language, and every now and then laughing and talking? What d'ye say to that?"

"But did you see a ghost or anything like one?" asked Barnabas W. Badgit, the store-keeper.

"Yes, and felt it too."

At this idea of feeling a ghost, a general guffaw expanded the jaws of every one present. The shoemaker, however, was nothing daunted by this explosion.

"Darned if that aint a good un," squeaked out little Twistem, the tailor of Chickenville; "now I always thort that ghosts was mere shadders, so tu speak—fellers as could whisk through key-holes, or go through the eye of one of my needles, for the matter of that. I've read of some of 'em that you could see through and through, as if they were made of glass; but you're the first I ever heerd of, that felt a ghost—ha—ha—ha!"

"Ho—ho—ho!" was the response of the crowd.

"Yes, felt," reiterated the man of leather.

"No doubt," remarked Sam Sly, the wag of the village. "Ghosts are spirits, and spirits are souls, aint they?"

A general assent to this proposition was given by the company.

"Well, then," continued Sam, "there's nothing very extraordinary in a shoemaker's feeling a ghost that I am aware of—doesn't he handle soles every day?"

At this surprising stroke of wit, the loafers round the store went incontinently into roars of laughter, and Mr. Samuel Sly, highly gratified with the hit he had made, reposed on his laurels, in other words, he lighted a fresh "long nine."

"Wal, you may snigger if you choose," observed the shoemaker, doggedly, "but it was a real ghost that I felt, and I'll tell you how 'twas."

All ears, and eyes, and mouths were now opened to their fullest extent, and the shoemaker proceeded:

"You see I was going home from the tavern a few nights since, about eleven o'clock, or may be, a little arter, when, as I passed Widow Ramsey's house, I noticed a light in the sitting-room. The blind was down, so I couldn't see inside, but I heerd the all firedest noise that ever was. I knew 'twarn't karydids nor crickets—for thar aint none about now—and the only thing I could compare it to, was forty thousand death-watches, all ticking at once."

Here the speaker paused, and looked round to see what effect was produced on his audience.

"Go on," said the storekeeper, whose huge form was bent over the counter, and whose face exhibited a decidedly incredulous grin.

"Wal," continued the shoemaker—"Wal, says I to myself, thar's suthin' mysterious here, and no two ways about it. So I crept softly towards the window, but just before I reached it I saw a great, black figure on the blind, which appeared only for a minute, and then vanished. After waiting a few minutes longer, I went under the window-sill and listened; but I hadn't been there two minutes before something gave me a blow on the side of my head that made me see stars, and in an instant after, I was sent like a football, bang into the middle of the road. When I recovered myself, and looked at the parlor window again, all was dark as pitch, and there was I, as lonely as Jonah when he lay in the whale's stummick."

At the conclusion of this exciting narrative, sundry and divers attempts at explanation were made by the various parties present—some asserting that the shoemaker must have taken rather too much toddy at the tavern—an accusation which he most indignantly denied; and others treating the matter as a mere fabrication. At length, the time for closing the store arrived, and one by one the recent loungers departed to ponder over the strange story of the man of leather.

We must now return to the dwelling of Mrs. Coosypeg, which, it will be remembered, we left just as Mr. Pipchin, the attorney of Chickenville, was about to give his opinion on the strange occurrences which were shaking the village to its centre. Mr. Pipchin was a tall, thin, hard-featured personage. He had a high, narrow forehead, ploughed deeply with transverse lines, sallow cheeks, an aquiline nose, over the bridge of which the skin stretched so tightly, it much resembled old parchment; this nose was flanked by two whiskers of the mutton-chop formation, and his head was covered with short, stubby, iron gray hair, that appeared more like bristles than anything else. He had a cautious way of speaking, always taking care never to commit himself, but when he had made up his mind, and did speak decidedly, he was remarkably dictatorial; and the way in which his small gray eyes flashed beneath their shaggy and beetling brows was absolutely fearful to behold!

"Ladies," said Mr. Pipchin, in reply to the request for his opinion; "ladies, in view of being consulted on this singular subject, I have thought it well to refer to the best authorities—I have—I may say—diligently perused all the text-books on the subject. The singular noises which have been heard in a certain part of this village claimed my first consideration. I have read with great attention the case of Scratching Fanny—"

"Who?" exclaimed half a dozen ladies at once.

"Scratching Fanny—ladies—her case is a great precedent. She was the heroine of the celebrated 'Cock Lane Ghost,' which puzzled all London some ninety years ago.. Even Doctor Samuel Johnson himself believed in the ghost, and went into the vaults of Cripplegate church to exorcise it—but after all, it turned out that a young girl, named Fanny, who was confined to her bed, produced the mysterious scratching noises with her toe-nails on a board concealed in the couch. And a very good thing Scratching Fanny made of it, until the trick was discovered."

"O, the deceitful little hussy!" said Miss Rawker.

"How romantic," observed Miss Milkitt.

"It's extremely remarkable," muttered Mrs. Pipchin.

"Well, ladies," Mr. Pipchin went on to say—"I perused with great care Sir Walter Scott's work on "Demonology and Witchcraft." I read David Brewster's "Natural Magic," Professor Hare's works, Judge Edmond's Book on Spiritualism, Mrs. Crowe's "Night side of Nature," the account of the apparition of Mrs. Veal, which you know is prefixed to "Drelincourt on Death," Andrew Jackson Davis's writings, the Memoirs of Matthew Hopkins the Witch-finder, and the History of Salem Witchcraft—all these profound productions I have studied in hope to throw some light on the mystery in our midst; have sent, too, for the great work by Reichenbach, on the "Odic Force," which I shall consult with the same attention that I have paid to the other high authorities I have cited."

When Mr. Pipchin had concluded this formidable list of authorities on mystical matters, the ladies gazed at him with admiration and amazement, and like the school children in Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," wondered:

"How one small head could carry all he knew."

For a few moments all were too much astonished to speak, but at length Mrs. Coosypeg plucked up sufficient courage to inquire: "And to what conclusion have you come, Mr. Pipchin, if I may be so bold as to ask?"

"Madam," replied that gentleman, "the views of the authorities I have consulted are so conflicting that I have been unable to form any opinion at all. As to the witchcraft part of the business, there certainly seems to be a precedent in the case of Joan of Arc, but as the courts rule differently respecting that remarkable young woman, I shall take time to consider." And Mr. Pipchin knitted his brows, and looked the incarnation of legal dignity.

Just at this moment the door opened, and Phebe the pretty maid-servant entered with a basket, which she said had been sent with Miss Ramsay's compliments. Now it should be mentioned in this place and ought perhaps to, have been stated before, that Miss Chylena was a member of the sewing circle, though being the only one of the society who was young and pretty, she was by no means popular. She was known to have a beau, also, and that was an awful crime in the eyes of Miss Rawker especially, who took all manner of means to harass and annoy her. One way of indulging her spleen was, although she knew Miss Ramsay to be in delicate health, to allot to the latter young lady the largest quantity of work, and of the coarsest and most laborious kind, too. There were fines imposed on those who failed to send in their completed task at the proper time, and it so happened that at the last meeting Miss Rawker had forwarded to Chylena, in the hope of mulcting her, not only more than double the amount of work—but work, which, from its nature, could not, save by miracle, be performed by even half a dozen pairs of busy hands—much less one. What then, was the surprise and mortification of Miss Rawker to find that Chylena had sent home all the work, beautifully done, by the time specified for its completion?

"Well, I never!" exclaimed Miss Rawker.

"It's very remarkable!" said Mrs. Pipchin.

"O, it's so romantic!" simpered Miss Milkit.

"It's witchcraft—downright witchcraft," observed Mrs. Coosypeg, who was the most superstitious of the party. "To think that that chit of a girl should do more work with her skinny fingers, than all of us put together. It's too bad! and that's all about it; the old fellow must help her, that's a fact."

"I don't know what to make of it," gravely remarked old Coosypeg; "here had I been doctoring her for months, and she got no better, when she declined all further attendance; and to-day I saw her looking healthy and rosy as ever. I know she has had no other doctor, and I can't make it out, there's something wrong somewhere."

And with grave looks from some, doubtful shakes of the head from others, and all perfectly puzzled, the sewing circle broke up, each member of it making up her mind to fathom the mystery if it lay within the powers and penetration of woman so to do.

What a beautiful morning it was; a clear, crisp, October morning. The foliage was rapidly assuming autumnal tints, the sun shone mildly through the golden haze, and birds sang merrily on the branches. Every thing spoke of happiness and love—and so it should have been, for it was the marriage morning of Chylena Ramsay and Ralph Burney. I need not detain the reader, while I tell how lovely the bride looked, how bloom had returned to her cheek, and elasticity to her step; how proudly Ralph led her to the village church, and how gratified Mrs. Ramsay seemed; how spitefully Miss Rawker sneered as she beheld the ceremony performed; how old Dr. Coosypeg wondered at the almost miraculous restoration of Chylena to health and vigor; how Miss Milkit thought it very unromantic that Chylena should get married before her; how Mr. Pipchin marvelled, and how Mrs. Ditto thought the proceedings "very remarkable indeed"—I say I shall not stop to refer in detail to all these matters. Instead of doing so, I need only record that when the ceremony was over, Ralph invited all his friends and neighbors to a little feast on the lawn before his own cottage, and that they one and all (Miss Rawker, whose curiosity conquered her chagrin, included), accepted it. The tables were furnished with all the usual delicacies, and in the centre, covered with a white cloth, was, what most present supposed to be some rare dish that was meant to be a surprise. When the cake, pies, fruit and the like were disposed of, Ralph rose, and after thanking the company for their attendance, said :

"I have now to unveil a little mystery, which has for some time past puzzled all present."

It was wonderful to see the pricking up of ears, and glistening of eyes, on this announcement being made. The ladies of the sewing circle were especially eager to hear what was to come next. Ralph proceeded :

"My wife has been taken for a witch, and I have been mistaken for a ghost! I am happy to say that the real witch is now present; she is under that white cloth."

The white cloth instantly became the focus-point for all eyes; had those eyes been burning-glasses it would have been turned into tinder in no time.

"My wife, as all of you know, was long in ill health; her exertions to support herself and a widowed mother damaged her constitution, and she daily grew worse. I determined to prescribe for her myself, and availed myself of the services of a witch, and am happy to say the lady soon recovered. Look at her now, and tell me whether you ever saw a prettier piece of witchcraft. Well, my friends, it happened one night—I may tell all now—whilst Chylena, the witch and myself were together (the witch busy at her incantations), that I heard a step outside the window. Stepping out through the back door, I walked round to the post, and there I saw an impertinent fellow attempting to peep into the room. Before he was aware of it, I gave him a sound box on the ear, and with the toe of my boot sent him into the middle of the road."

"That was the shoemaker!" shouted a dozen voices, amidst "unextinguishable laughter." When it had finished, Ralph proceeded :

"And my shadow on the blind was the ghost! and now for the witch!"

The cloth was lifted, and there revealed to all eyes, was a beautiful GROVER & BAKER'S SEWING MACHINE!

"There, the secret is out!" added Ralph. "My wife was killing herself by perpetual needle-work, so I went to Boston and purchased that invaluable implement. It saved her time, her health and strength, and has saved me a good little wife, and its click, click, click, shall always enliven my home. By its means she was enabled to send in that large amount of work to the sewing circle, and through its agency my wife will be no household drudge, but what heaven intended a good wife to be, not a slave to her needle, but a friend and a companion. That machine with its little iron arm, will secure her leisure and rest, so that when I return home from my daily toil, I shall be received by one whose work is also done."

TOUCHING INCIDENT.

Some gentlemen passing through the beautiful village of Renton, in the Vale of Leven, Dumbartonshire, about nine o'clock at night, had their attention directed to a dark object in the church-yard. On going in to ascertain what it was, they found a boy of tender years lying flat on his face, and apparently sound asleep over a recently made grave. Thinking this not a very safe bed for him, they shook him up, and asked how he came to be there? He said he was afraid to go home, as his sister, with whom he resided, had threatened to beat him. "And where does your sister live?" asked one of the party. "In Dumbarton," was the answer. "In Dumbarton—nearly four miles off! And how came you to wander so far away from home?" "I just cam," sobbed the poor little fellow, "because my mither's grave was here." His mother had been buried there a short time before, and his seeking a refuge at her grave in his sorrow, was a beautiful touch of nature in a child, who could scarcely have yet learned to realize the true character of that separation which knows of no re union on earth. Thither had he instinctively wandered to sob out his sorrows, and to moisten with tears the grave of one who had hitherto been his natural protector, for he had evidently cried himself to sleep.—North British Mail.

THE ARABIAN HORSE.

General Daumas, having addressed a letter to Abd el-Kader, requesting to know his opinion on the origin of the Arab horse, received in reply, the following valuable piece of information: "Know, then, that amongst us it is admitted that God created the horse out of the winds, as he created Adam out of the dust. This cannot be disputed. Many prophets have proclaimed that when God would create the horse, he said to the south wind: "I would bring forth out of thee a creature; be thou therefore, condensed." Then comes the angel Gabriel, and taking a handful of the matter, presented it to God, who formed therewith a brown bay horse, and said, "I name thee Horse, and create thee Arab, and give thee a bay color. I attach blessing to the forelock which falls between thine eyes; thou shalt be lord of all the animals. Thou shalt fly without wings, and from thy back shall proceed riches." Then he marked him with a star on the forehead, the sign of glory and blessing."—Boston Journal.

THE MOTHER'S FUNERAL.

BY R. D. JOHNSON.

Arrayed in garniture of woe,
With footsteps tremulous and slow,
About the streets the mourners go!

List to the low, funereal bell,
Muffled and scarcely audible
It tells, alas! a mother's knell!

Around the sable troop appear
Tears upon manhood's cheek severe,
And brows up-knit with mortal fear.

And there are low, unbidden sighs
From women, whose meek, drooping eyes
Darken us with a sad surmise.

Arrayed in garniture of woe,
With footsteps feeble, faint and slow,
Into the place of graves they go!

O'er dust they tread with choking breath,
Man's history writ their feet beneath,
In but two chapters—Birth and Death!

"Ashes to ashes—dust to dust!"
Grave, hold our treasure, till the just Soar upward from their beds of dust!

Arrayed in garniture of woe,
With footsteps lingering and slow,
From out the Golgotha they go!

They tread the threshold which of yore
She trod who ne'er shall pass it more,
And grief afresh unlocks its store.

The unpressed bed—the vacant chair—
The picture on the wall is there;
The shade remains—the form is—where?

The little children grieve to see
Their father's lonely misery,
And crowd in wonder round his knee.

Enough! why further seek to show
How grief's unfailing fountains flow,
And antedate, perchance our woe?

THE OLD HOUSE.

BY E. H. BENNETT.

"Who is moving into the old house?" inquired Mrs. Fulton of her husband, as they sat in their pleasant parlor one cold, March morning, four years ago.

"An old acquaintance of yours; but one you have not seen for many years."

"An old acquaintance of mine!" exclaimed Mrs. Fulton, rising from the table and going to the window. "Do tell me who it is, James?"

"Harry Dudley's widow, Mary."

"James!" Mrs. Fulton crossed the room and stood beside her husband, with a pale cheek, and trembling lip; "James, you do not surely mean to tell me that Mrs. Dudley has so fallen—she whom I last saw in her splendid city mansion, with her carriage and servants, her magnificent rooms, and her elegant nursery—surely, surely, you are not in earnest?"

"In sad and sober earnest, Mary," Smith told me all about them yesterday, and I meant to have spoken to you of them before. When Harry died, which you know we heard was quite unexpectedly, the greater part of his property was involved, and after all the debts were paid, Mrs. Dudley found herself with a very small income, and five little children to support. It seems they have been very unfortunate, for of these five, three are dead, and the eldest boy, John, has not been heard of for two years or more. The youngest is a beautiful girl, but Smith says, a great sufferer, afflicted with lameness, I believe. You see what changes a few years make, Mary. It only seems like yesterday that you used to fret because we could not afford to live as the Dudleys did, and now you have all you want in this world, while she, poor thing, has come from bad to worse, until the old house over the way, her little furniture, and a very trifling income, is all her possession. But there, don't cry, my wife, you have the means and the will to assist them, if assistance they will accept, and I will gladly do anything in my power to benefit poor Harry Dudley's widow and orphan. Our own child may need a friend some day."

Need I say, after repeating this conversation, that Mr. Fulton and his wife were people whom prosperity had failed to render proud and cold-hearted? And many in the town of C—blessed the day that brought them from a distant State to dwell among us. C—had been their home for sixteen years—here their only child was born, and here they had prospered and grown rich—and so dear had it become to Mrs. Fulton, that she seldom bestowed a thought on her childhood's home, unless reminded by some incident like the subject of their conversation.

But her husband's story brought to mind many long-forgotten events of her young days, and long she sat that morning, recalling the past, and all in it that related to her widowed friend. She remembered now the happy school girl, whose reputation as an only daughter and heiress had won the consideration of their teachers, and the enmity of less fortunate companions.

She remembered too the idolized betrothed of the rich and handsome Dudley, on whom the knowledge that she was in reality poor, produced no effect, save joy that he could place her in the station she deserved; and then, last of all, came the recollection of the fondly loved, and exalting wife and mother, who with such joyful pride had taken her young guest away from the gay throng that crowded her splendid parlors, to show her what she styled her treasures.

With feelings of shame and self-reproach, Mrs. Fulton remembered how enviously she had looked on the richly-attired and beautiful mother bending over her sleeping cherubs, then with gentle hand drawing the curtains around each little bed, and with a whispered blessing on her darlings, once more seeking the crowd below.

Where now was all the splendor that had given rise to so much jealousy? Where now were the beauteous babes over whom the mother leaned with such fullness of love? Gone, gone, all gone. Widowed, in poverty, of her treasures one poor, afflicted one alone remained to share her sorrows; little wonder was it that she who had murmuringly wished her friend's lot had been her own, now offered up a silent but fervent thanksgiving that her prayer had not been granted.

But deeply as Mrs. Fulton felt for her friend, there were many in the world more to be pitied than Harry Dudley's widow. True she had fallen from an enviable station, she was poor, and suffering under many heavy afflictions, not the least of which was the dread uncertainty as to the fate of her son; but Mrs. Dudley possessed a strong mind and a buoyant spirit, that rose above trials and sorrows sufficient to have crushed another to the earth. In her sorest need, in her darkest hour, she yet could say, with a hopeful smile, "it is for the best."

One after another she had laid her babes in the grave, and though her tears fell fast, and the pale cheek and trembling lip told the bitter sorrow that was preying on her heart, not a murmur escaped the stricken mother, and to those who murmured with her she said, "They are better off, my fatherless babes."

But the loss of those three innocents, hard as it was to bear, was easy in comparison to the wearing sorrow occasioned by the unknown fate of her first born; he on whom she had depended as the prop and stay of her old age, on whom, in fact, she had centered more love than she herself was aware of, was gone, and his fate was a mystery.

She rarely spoke of him, never to strangers; but his portrait was never out of her sight; and for hours she would gaze on the sea, lost in sad thoughts, while the deep sighs that burst from her bosom told a piteous tale. For Margaret's sake, Mrs. Dudley hid her grief as carefully as possible, and in attending to her afflicted child, she no doubt found comfort, or at least, alleviation for her sorrow.

The old house, to which we have before alluded, was admirably suited to their wants and means, being a square, ancient-looking building, adapted more for comfort than splendor, with very pleasant rooms, a good prospect, and a large garden. When furnished with neatness and good taste, it presented quite an inviting appearance; and Margaret, rejoicing at her emancipation from the hated city, was never tired of expatiating on the delights they would enjoy in the new home.

The good people of C—— lost no time in calling on the strangers; and offers of friendship and trifling offices of kindness were showered on them, until Mrs. Dudley felt as if a good providence had surely guided her steps among us.

Mrs. Fulton was one of the first to enter the doors of the old house, and the broken friendship was renewed, and bound by closer bonds than ever. She saw them almost daily, and her presence was looked for, and welcomed as something pleasant and cheering. There they sat day after day, the mother and daughter, with books or needlework, quietly passing the hours; and Mrs. Fulton, herself lively and active, deplored the cruel necessity that compelled beautiful Margaret Dudley to remain a prisoner in that little quiet parlor, when the sun was shining so brightly, and the mild, warm atmosphere told of the near approach of spring.

"Can nothing be done for her?" she asked her husband, when one evening they had returned from a visit at the old house over the way. "Cannot we do anything for her? Mrs. Dudley says their physician thought her case anything but hopeless."

"I think myself there is much room for hope, but then the expense would be enormous. Margaret says she cannot consent to go away from her mother, and to insure success she ought to be under the constant care of a skilful surgeon, who to remain here must of course leave his whole business for a time, which scarcely any one would do, and if he did, would expect a return far beyond their means to make. It is a very sad case, and one I have often thought over, but I can come to no satisfactory conclusion."

"Is it not a son of your old friend, Judge Flemming, that Cousin Walter speaks so highly of in his last letter?"

"Yes, but what of that?"

"Could he not be induced to come, think you? If he possesses the skill Walter says he does, he would be just the one to attend Margaret."

"My dear Mary, Lewis Flemming has more business than he can attend to at home, and you know money would be no inducement to him."

"But suppose we invite Walter to come and see us; tell him the circumstances, and ask him to bring his friend with him? If he merits the praise Walter bestows, he will not refuse."

"It will require some nice diplomacy, Mary, for the Flemmings are rather difficult people to deal with, rich and proud, but withal, excellent at heart. If any one can manage it, Walter can, and you might as well try at once; he can but refuse."

But Lewis Flemming did not refuse; and he not only gave his friend permission to write, but himself penned a courteous letter to Mrs. Fulton, in which he assured her that his visit would be doubly satisfactory if he could be the means of restoring her young friend to health.

"Is there any hope, doctor?" Mrs. Dudley was dreadfully agitated; her usual firmness was evidently giving way, and she trembled violently as she asked the question.

"Every hope, my dear madam," said the young physician, kindly. "Nay, you may say a certainty; but Miss Dudley will have to undergo severe pain, and the cure cannot be effected for some time."

"Doctor!" Lewis Flemming started. He was passing one of the doors of Mr. Fulton's conservatory, and he might well mistake the beautiful vision for the "angel of the flowers." "I am sorry I frightened you, doctor; but I have been waiting here so long—I wanted to see you first—I—I—"

Dr. Flemming was by this time aware that his companion was no spirit, but a veritable human, beautiful as a fairy, but nevertheless, an inhabitant of earth. Moreover, having a very kind heart, in spite of his pride and riches, he very earnestly entreated the lovely girl to be calm, and tell him what had so agitated her; but finding that she was suffering from painful excitement of some kind, he very quietly led her into the conservatory, seated her beside him on one of the flower benches, and patiently waited until she was able to explain herself.

Her tears stopped in a few minutes, and removing her hands from her face, she told him she was Bella Fulton, that she loved Margaret Dudley very much, that she had waited there all the afternoon to ask him if Margaret would get well. Here her tears seemed likely to flow afresh, but the doctor smiled so pleasantly that she took courage, and waited quietly for his answer.

I don't know all he said; but I do know that he called her "my dear child" twice; that she was quite satisfied with his account of dear

Maggie, and that half an hour after, when she entered the room where he was sitting with her parents, and they thinking it was the first time their guest had seen their daughter, were about to introduce them, the doctor smiled his peculiar pleasant smile, and claimed acquaintance with Miss Fulton.

That night, when Cousin Walter visited the doctor's room previous to entering his own, he found that gentleman buried in a profound study, apparently oblivious of all earthly matters. After some little conversation about the new patient, in which said Walter appeared deeply interested, they both relapsed into reverie, which was at last broken by the doctor observing that he never saw a more angelic face in his life.

"What is she like?" eagerly inquired Walter.

"I should not think you would have to ask me," laughed the doctor, looking at his friend in astonishment.

"O, I cannot trust Mary's description. According to her account she must be perfection."

"But cannot you trust your own eyes?"

"I have never seen her. Who do you mean?" asked Walter, beginning to suspect that they were playing at cross purposes.

"O, you mean Miss Dudley," said the doctor, with an attempt to hide his confusion.

"And you mean my little cousin. Well, never mind, give me a description of the beautiful Margaret, and I won't say another word about the blunder."

"I cannot do her justice, I am afraid. To me she seemed a very lovely, interesting girl, with black hair and brown eyes, a fair, marble-like complexion, and a beautiful hand. I should think she possessed great fortitude, for when I told her she would have intense pains to bear, she closed her eyes for an instant, as if afraid, then looking at me as if resolved, she quietly said, 'I can bear it;' and there was something in that look that told me she could. But stop, Walter, don't go away yet. Why, what possesses him to rush out of the room in that fashion? I used to think I understood Walter better than any man living, but he becomes a greater puzzle to me every day."

Lewis Flemming was not the only one to whom Cousin Walter was a puzzle. Mrs. Fulton had long formed a nice little plot in which her wealthy cousin and her beautiful daughter were to play the principal parts, but somehow affairs did not progress to her satisfaction, and their visit drew to a close without any symptoms on his part that his beautiful young cousin had made any very deep impression on his heart. True, he was unusually serious at times, and frequently held long conversations with Bella, but the closest scrutiny failed to detect more than brotherly regard in his conduct.

With equal dissatisfaction did Mrs. Fulton remark that her child's high spirits had deserted her; that she very seldom laughed, never sung her favorite merry songs; and seemed to have grown much older in a very short time.

The family were at breakfast on the morning that their departure was spoken of, and on Walter's remarking that they should start on the third day, Bella spilled the coffee she was carrying to her lips, and evinced so much confusion that Mrs. Fulton whispered to her that she had better go and change the injured dress. Walter and her father laughed at her; while Lewis fixed his dark eyes for an instant on her blushing face, then looked very earnestly into his coffee cup, and left his breakfast half finished.

Later in the day, when the visit to Margaret was paid, and Walter left very contentedly reading aloud to her, the doctor surprised Bella Fulton in her father's library, and having prevented her first impulse from being carried out, soon had her in deep conversation. There was a great charm for Lewis Flemming in the artless girl's fearless simplicity, and he thought with a shudder of the time that might come when she would be as cold, as superficial, as fashionable as those whom he had met in the society of his native city.

"What a delightful task to teach this beautiful girl to love, to win her innocent, trusting heart, to render one's self necessary to her very existence, and then to spend a life time with such a companion. Too gentle and loving to be exacting and overbearing, too truthful not to warn those she loves of danger in their path." Thus soliloquized Lewis Flemming, and possibly his companion surmised what was occupying his thoughts, for she blushed and turned away from his searching look.

"Bella!" The doctor had dropped the formal Miss that usually prefixed her name. "Bella, I have had a pleasant visit here, and not a little am I indebted to your kindness for the same. May I hope that when I am gone you will not forget me; that you will sometimes remember our pleasant conversations, and read the books I have asked you too, for my sake?"

"I never forget my friends; I am very glad you have enjoyed yourself, and I will certainly try to improve. I have been a spoiled child all my life, Mr. Flemming, and because I did not love study, mama allowed me to play in the garden, and run singing about the house all the time I ought to have been in the school room. I know I am very ignorant, and Cousin Walter despises me for it, but I mean to do better for the future, and show him some day that I am not so great a dunce as he seems to think me."

"My dear child, your cousin has a very high opinion of you; and I am sure you never could imagine that I thought you ignorant. I only recommended some reading that I thought you had overlooked, and which I knew you would feel interested in."

"Please don't say anything more about it. I am quite certain I have a great deal to learn; for when Cousin Sophia was here last time from New York, I heard her tell mama that she ought to be ashamed of me; that I was as ignorant as a little Hottentot, and she hoped I would not come to the city until she was married and away."

"That was very flattering to you, certainly; but was Cousin Sophia very accomplished?"

"O, very; she used to sing nothing but Italian songs to papa; and she talked nothing but German with Mr. Van Brocken; and she always corrected young Dunccey's Greek translations. But here comes Cousin Walter, and I must run away. O, I wish I knew as much as Cousin Sophia, and then he would not laugh at me."

"And I am very thankful you don't," murmured the doctor, as she disappeared from the room. "But there, what a fool I am, it is Walter she loves, and I have been dreaming all manner of impossibilities. I suppose I am doomed to old bachelorhood, and must resign myself to fate."

And so, rather unhappy and dissatisfied, the friends went from C—. Lewis with the conviction that the girlish, beautiful Bella loved his friend; Walter no less certain that Margaret Dudley was deeply attached to the kind and handsome doctor. Neither did those who staid behind feel quite easy as to the result of the visit.

True, Margaret Dudley had passed the most trying parts of her cure with firmness and courage, and was now likely to enjoy the beauties of summer as she had not done for several years. But Mrs. Dudley, while she rejoiced at her child's recovery, sighed when she saw the new light that burned in Margaret's brown eyes, and felt that her daughter for the first time had a secret she was unwilling to impart to her. Like Walter, she believed that her child cherished a secret passion for Lewis Flemming, and rightly judging that he entertained none other than a friendly regard for his fair patient, she trembled at the consequences to her delicate and sensitive daughter.

Mrs. Fulton truly joined with her friend in rejoicing over the benefits derived from her plans; but at the same time her heart whispered that those plans had signally failed, as far as her own interest was concerned. Mrs. Fulton was ambitious for her child, as most fond mothers are; but she had an instinctive dread of letting her open-hearted husband know what she had been plotting about, and consequently there seemed something like a secret weighing on her mind; and having been in the habit of telling her James every little thought heretofore, such a secret was hard to bear, and Mrs. Fulton felt decidedly ill at ease.

Poor little Bella, unconscious of what had changed her, felt sad and dispirited; the house seemed lonely, and even her interest in dear Maggie's recovery failed to arouse her from the apathetic indifference that had taken the place of her accustomed gayety. It added a deeper pang to Mrs. Fulton's self-reproach every time she looked on the changed countenance of her darling; and unlike Mrs. Dudley, she was in constant fear lest Bella would some day tell her the dread secret she plainly saw was preying on her health and spirits. And so for one, two, three months, our friends remained in error; anxious and fearful lest their error should be confirmed, yet not courageous enough to seek explanations.

Margaret Dudley was able once more to breathe the fresh air in her pleasant garden, and though yet lame when the June roses were in bloom, she was sufficiently recovered to spend hours in the open air; where with the assistance of many willing hands, she amused herself by making the old house a perfect paradise of beauty. Drooping vines were lifted up, and made to adorn instead of disfigure; the graceful sumachs and acacias were trimmed and supported; old flowers were removed, and new ones planted, until strangers stopped to gaze at the accumulated loveliness, and wonder who was so happy as to dwell in such a bower.

July came, and with it the news that Cousin Walter and Lewis Fleming were about to start for Europe, the health of the former not being very good, and the latter having wearied of his lonely bachelor home. Farewell letters came to C—; but little mention was made of the inmates of the old house, and Mrs. Fulton felt surprised that Walter should have so readily forgotten people in whom he appeared so much interested.

Margaret also, who as a privileged friend, listened to the contents of his epistle, felt disappointed, though long schooled to suffer, and mourned over the destruction of hopes she had fondly cherished. Her sorrow, however, gave way to surprise on receiving a package of beautiful books, and a kind note containing a friendly farewell, and some hints that were perfectly enigmatical to her. What could he mean by regretting that he had ever visited C—, and hinting at wishes that could never be gratified? As it was evident he had not expected her to answer his letter, she had no means of finding out what he meant, and was obliged to content herself with the reflection that some day he would return, and then perhaps all would be explained.

"If he loves me," and Margaret more than suspected the truth, "if he loves me, time will make no change, and we may yet be happy."

But it was weary waiting, especially when she felt that he was under some mistake in respect to her feelings for another; and Margaret Dudley, spite her philosophical patience, was far from happy.

Bella Fulton felt keenly the disappointment, of not seeing her friends, ere they went away; but she kept Lewis Fleming's letter to her father, and pursued her self-imposed studies with redoubled energy.

That summer was an unusually gay one in C—, and numerous families, who could not or would not go altogether away from the neighboring city, sought pleasant homes in our beautiful town, where the luxury of fresh-air sea-bathing could be procured at less expense, and with less sacrifice of comfort.

In consequence of this influx of visitors, picnics flourished, and rural festivals were the rage in C— that summer. Beaux, who had never condescended to look on anything but broadcloth, lounged about in brown Holland and nankeen; and belles, who in the city would have been shocked at anything less than a twenty-dollar hat, was seen in our streets in gingham sun-bonnets. I do not mean to say that they had not also costly India mualins, Paris gloves, and expensive jewelry; but the sun-bonnets were undeniably rural, and gave the wearers an idea that they were picturesquely rustic.

Bella Fulton, as the sole heiress of her father's large fortune, was an object of considerable attraction to many of the city fashionables, and was flattered and caressed enough to have turned the head of any other girl. But childish and inexperienced as she seemed, there was more sense in that little head than most people gave her credit for.

True, she talked and laughed with young gentlemen, until their mothers shook their heads and "feared she was a sad little flirt," and even her own mother felt uneasy; but Mr. Fulton said:

"Let the child enjoy herself; she has not the least inclination to be sentimental, and I am glad to see she has recovered her spirits."

And so she went to picnics, and sailing-parties and riding-parties, and young ladies looked enviously at her and wondered she could "laugh so loud," and thought "all those long curls must be horribly troublesome, besides looking so babyish," forgetting to state that they would have given half their trinkets to have just such beautiful troublesome curls.

But Bella never stopped to think that anybody envied her, or called her a little flirt, or told their young gentleman friends that she was "nothing but a doll," not she. She enjoyed the passing pleasures with an earnestness that was unknown to her more worldly and pleasure-sated friends, and which excited the astonishment of the ladies and the admiration of the gentlemen.

"What fair lady do you escort this afternoon?" inquired Miss Julia Scofield of her brother Charles, as they sat together in the parlor of the hotel where they and a large party of friends boarded.

"Miss Fulton, of course," was the answer.

"I don't see any 'of course' about it; but if she is going with you, do entreat her to put those long yellow ringlets out of sight. The child looks a perfect fright with her hair hanging about her eyes in that wild fashion."

"Out of temper—eh, Julia?" laughed young Scofield, as he finished tying up a bouquet of beautiful roses he had been very carefully arranging for the last half hour. "You are not the only one who would like to hide Bella Fulton's long curls and her bright eyes, too, for that matter."

"What is the matter, Frank? You seem out of temper," said Mrs. Stevens to her son, as he threw himself on the sofa of the room where the family were sitting.

Mr. Stevens and his daughters looked up, and one of the latter exclaimed:

"O, Frank is only put out because Charley Scofield was before him, and secured Bell Fulton for the afternoon ride."

Miss Augusta Stevens raised her head languidly from the sofa pillow, and looked with a sort of faint wonder at her brother.

"What can you see in that little rustic, Frank? She is so perfectly unrestrained in her manner, that I am in misery all the time she is near me. In fact, she is more than my nerves can bear."

Miss Augusta raised her scented handkerchief and inhaled the perfume with an air that would have made Bella laugh, had she been present.

"I fancy there are more than you in C—who are 'in misery' when she is present," rather maliciously laughed Helen Stevens, who, being "engaged," did not fear the young girl's bewitching beauty.

"She seems too much inclined to be a flirt to please me," said the mother, who sympathised with her son's disappointment and felt angry with the cause of it.

"Not a bit of it, mother. She does not care for any one particularly, and tries to treat them all alike. She is as artless as a child, and enters into anything with the eagerness of a child. She does not know the meaning of the word flirt."

"You may well call her a child, Helen," said Miss Augusta. "I went there, the other day, and found her going into ecstasies over a new dress that had just arrived from the city. You would have thought that she had never had a dress in her life before. I was fairly sickened; such a fuss, and such kissing her mother, and all about a blue muslin dress."

Miss Augusta curled her lip with an expression of deep scorn, and appeared not to hear her father's speech about its "being quite a treat to find somebody now-a-days who acted naturally, and knew what gratitude was."

But our beaux and belles might have spared themselves anxiety on this particular day, for we were not allowed the privilege of seeing Miss Bella Fulton in her "hat and habit," that young lady being deeply engaged in consoling and comforting Mrs. Dudley and her daughter; and even Charley Scofield could not be angry with her, when she so earnestly begged pardon for disappointing him and fastened one of his beautiful rose-buds in her hair.

Letters had arrived that morning from Cousin Walter; and after describing the voyage and sensations on beholding "Old England," and many other items, he proceeded to inform them that he had met with somebody who he more than half suspected would turn out to be Mrs. Dudley's missing son.

"We found him at the hospital," he wrote, "whither Lewis would have me go with him; and truly I shall never regret the violence done to my feelings, if my visit should be the means of restoring dear Margaret her brother. But at present, I scarcely know whether to give you permission to tell them or not, so slight is the hope Lewis has that he will recover, and also because there is yet a doubt that he is the right person. 'Call me John,' he answered, when I entreated him to tell me his name; 'I have no right to disgrace another.' He is fearfully desponding, and as far as I can learn, has been very wild, very unfortunate, and is now ashamed and discouraged. If any one can do him good, Lewis can; and as we have removed him to our own rooms, he is with him day and night. He is very like Margaret, and I believe it was that that first attracted our attention to him."

It needed all Bella Fulton's persuasions to induce her mother to show this letter to Mrs. Dudley; and when she saw the effect of it, she almost repented having done so. The poor mother's excitement was so great, as to make her quite ill; and all her comfort appeared to be in reading again and again the words of hope, pressing the insensible paper to her lips, and passionately exclaiming—"My son! my son!"

It was soon decided that both Margaret and her mother should write, sending the letters to Walter's care; but it was long before Bella could induce the former to put a line into her letter for Walter's self, and then nothing but the argument "it is the least you can do, Maggie, to thank him, when he feels so interested about you," would have conquered her scruples. But had Margaret Dudley seen with what delight that little line was read, and how fervently it was kissed, she would not have repeated so heartily having consented to humor Bella.

But who could refuse the little beauty anything? Certainly not her parents—even when she asked them to invite Mrs. Dudley and Margaret to spend the winter with them in the city.

"They will be so dull when we are gone, you know, mama; and then the old house, pretty as it is in summer, is but a lonely winter residence, and I shall miss Maggie so—wont you ask them?"

And Mrs. Fulton looked at her husband, who smiled and nodded. And so it was settled; and Bella kissed her parents for thanks, but let her mother give the invitation.

It was long before another letter arrived, and when it did, there was little more to tell. The stranger had still refused to tell his name, but looked so longingly at the letters, that they had given them to him. Lewis and Walter had both been ill with the same fever that had so stricken down their young proteges. They intended going on the continent for a few months, for the benefit of all, and then they were coming home.

A winter evening in the city. A beautifully furnished chamber, in a magnificent house. Two young girls dressing for a ball, under the superintendence of a richly-attired lady, and with the assistance of a skilful maid.

I think we ought to recognize those beautiful curls, which, under Mademoiselle Laurie's careful training, have a careless richness in their profusion, even more lovely than when they excited the envy of less fortunate damsels at C—. And Bella Fulton herself is the same as ever—a trifle more sedate, perhaps, but that may be from associating with "that grave damsel, Miss Dudley," as some fun-loving young dandy has denominated "dear Maggie;" but Bella Fulton is as joyous and light-hearted as even her fond father could wish, and excites as much admiration as even her doting mother could expect. She looks peculiarly beautiful on this evening, and is in a high state of excitement at the prospect before her.

"O, mama! to think of your keeping it so secret, and getting these splendid dresses for us, without saying a word to me about it!" And she lifted up a cloud of white gauzy fabric and lace, delicate and beautiful enough for a fairy to wear.

But time was flying, and at last they were ready—the satin slippers, the spotless gloves, the lace handkerchiefs, the last white buds placed in Margaret's dark braids, and the finishing knot tied in Bella's snowy sash.

"We look like two brides—don't we, mama?—all in white; only that brides don't generally have short sleeves."

Mrs. Fulton scanned the dresses critically, and at last pronounced them perfect; and just then, one of the maids opened the door, and announced the carriage ready and "Mr. Fulton wanted the ladies to come down; he had something to tell them."

"Papa has got a letter from Walter, I know!" exclaimed Bella, flying to the door; then seeing that her friend stood pale and hesitating, she came back, and throwing her arm round Margaret's waist, begged her to be calm and come down with her.

On entering the parlor, they beheld Mrs. Dudley seated on the sofa, with a young man beside her, his arm round her, and her hand clasped in his. Mr. Fulton stood before the fire, and two other gentlemen sat in the shadow of the dark damask curtains.

Margaret had entered in advance of her friend; no sooner did she cast her eyes on the stranger, than with a scream she rushed forward, and in an instant was in her brother's arms. Bella, completely overcome with astonishment, stood speechless by the door; and not until Walter had seized one hand, and Lewis the other, did she find her voice to welcome them.

Mr. Fulton here said something about the carriage; but Margaret did not wish to leave her brother, and only when the young man promised to go with them, would Bella consent to accompany her mother.

"I have no scruples about going, as my old friend Mrs. A—— will have a warm welcome for me, even if I do look like a traveller. So come along, Walter—we shall be the lions of the evening!"

Dr. Fleming did not dance, but he had the more time to watch Miss Fulton's graceful figure moving in the quadrilla, and when it was over, he gladly made room for her between her mother and himself.

They were in an animated conversation, when a gentleman requested her to waltz—a request she did not comply with.

"Are you not fond of dancing?" asked Lewis, surprised at her refusal.

"Very."

"Then why refuse such a very eligible partner?" he inquired, half jestingly, half curious.

"I never waltz. Papa said once it was not what he liked, and I have never done it in public. I have sometimes at home with my cousins."

The doctor said no more, but there was something in his look that more than rewarded her for her self-denial.

But Lewis found that he could not keep Bella to himself; and as partner after partner claimed her hand, he left Mrs. Fulton in conversation with a friend, and went to seek his host.

"Come over here and look at the belle of the evening," said Mrs. A——, as she led him into one of the deep windows. "Is she not lovely? Not quite so animated to-night, as usual; but that is not to be wondered at—her most devoted attendant has gone to Washington on business. A very handsome couple will Mr. Scofield and Miss Fulton make."

Mrs. A—— was a little inclined to gossip. Lewis Flemming felt a cold chill creep over him, as he listened to her words. Had he learned that she was indifferent to Walter, only to find her the betrothed of another?

"Are they engaged?" he asked, as calmly as he could.

"Not openly; but then he pays her such attention, and Mr. Fulton appears to think so highly of him, that few doubt it will be a match when she is old enough to marry. You know she is but a child yet."

That night, Lewis ruminated long on what he had heard.

"Can it be possible," he asked himself, "that I was deceived?—that her welcome meant no more than a friendly greeting? Surely my vanity has not so cruelly misled me. But another day shall decide my fate."

And firm in his resolution, Dr. Flemming sought an interview with Mr. Fulton on the following morning; and after it was ended, and while that gentleman went to communicate the news to his wife, he went in search of his lady-love.

In the library he found Walter and Margaret, both looking deeply interested in what they were talking about; and the door having opened noiselessly, as all well-behaved doors ought to do, they did not hear the intruder, who withdrew feeling as if he had been guilty of he hardly knew what.

His next effort was more successful, for in the sitting-room he found Bella, looking very pretty and pensive, in a blue morning-dress and a brown study. There was a conscious start and blush, that gave her suitor a wonderful increase of courage and enabled him to state his errand in a much more favorable manner than he could have done, had she received him with a heartier greeting.

It would take too much time to repeat all that passed; so my readers must be contented when I tell them that Lewis Flemming, from that morning, felt no jealous fears of younger and more fashionable men, for he learned in that conversation that his beautiful betrothed had loved him long ere he dared avow his passion.

Walter, too, was happy in the knowledge of Margaret's long-concealed preference; and Mrs. Dudley no longer had to complain of secrets being kept from her, as the happy lovers made no mystery about their engagement.

Mrs. Fulton felt some little astonishment in learning whom Bella had chosen, and expressed her fears lest the difference in their ages should interfere with their happiness.

"Seventeen and thirty are a long distance apart, my dear James. I should have been better pleased, if she had chosen Walter."

"Far better as it is, Mary. Bella's inexperience needs a guide. Lewis loves a gentle disposition such as I am happy to say our child has become, under our judicious training. I have my hope that at the end of twenty years, Dr. Flemming will look back with as much cause for rejoicing as I have."

A little flattery is very useful, sometimes. Mrs. Fulton said nothing more against her daughter's choice; and when the business part of the arrangements was settled, they felt a little pardonable pride at the wealth of which her child would become mistress.

As for Bella herself, she never gave a thought to her lover's property, or consequence in the world; and all the request she ever made was, that they might have a summer residence in C—— "near mama and Walter and Maggie."

But first the fair young bride must be presented to her husband's stately mother and stylish sisters, who though rather scandalized, at first, at Lewis's childlike wife, ended by yielding her the love that none could withhold. Costly and beautiful were the presents they bestowed on their new relative, and well repaid did they feel by Bella's warmly expressed gratitude.

After Margaret's marriage, Mrs. Dudley continued to dwell in the old house with her son, whose delicate health and low spirits made a quiet residence desirable. To Mr. Fulton, the young man was invaluable as a penman, and his services were liberally rewarded by the generous merchant. Margaret spends a great portion of her time at her old home, and Mrs. Dudley has become so much attached to the little Walter, that the young couple have serious thoughts of going to reside with her altogether.

Bella Flemming scarcely looks a day older than she did at her marriage, and Lewis insists on her wearing her hair in curls as she did when he first saw her. They are very happy, and even Mrs. Fulton is obliged to confess that, in spite of the difference in their ages, they blend admirably. Lewis knows that his little wife loves to dress well, and he delights to surprise her with magnificent presents of apparel and jewelry, and she says he has the best taste in the world. Their house is the perfection of elegance and comfort, and they enjoy the manifold blessings that have been bestowed on them with thankfulness, ever mindful of the wants of those whose lot has not been cast in such flowery paths.

CHINESE MAP OF THE WORLD.

Among the articles brought from China by the French commission, from that country, is a map of the world, presented to the commissioners by the head mandarin of Canton. The Chinese geographer has arranged the world quite in his own way. With him there are no isthmuses, no peninsulas; the isthmus of Suez is replaced by a magnificent arm of the sea, which detaches itself from the Mediterranean to fall into the Red Sea. We see nothing of the isthmus of Panama, and the two seas of that side are connected in the same way. There are neither Pyrenees nor Alps, and hardly are the vast mountains of America indicated. On the other hand, however, China is liberally dealt with by the geographer, for on this point, it occupies not less than three quarters of the whole globe.—New York Albion.

One of the most unwelcome truths is to show up wickedness in high places.

A CUNNING TRICK.

Dr. Wallcott, the celebrated Peter Pindar, was an eccentric character, and had a great many queer notions of his own. A good story is told by one of his contemporaries of the manner in which he once tricked his publisher. The latter, wishing to buy the copyright of his works, offered him by letter a life annuity of £200. The doctor, learning that the publisher was very anxious to buy, demanded £300. In reply, the latter appointed a day on which he would call on the doctor and talk the matter over. At the day assigned the doctor received him in entire dishabille, even to the nightcap, and having aggravated the sickly look of a naturally cadaverous face, by purposely abstaining from the use of a razor for some days, he had all the appearance of a candidate for quick consumption. Added to this the crafty author assumed a hollow and most sepulchral cough, such as would excite the pity of even a sheriff's officer, and would make a rich man's heir crazy with joy. The publisher, however, refused to give more than £200, till suddenly the doctor broke out into a violent fit of coughing, which produced an offer of £250. The doctor peremptorily refused, and was seized almost instantly with another even more frightful and longer protracted attack, that nearly suffocated him—when the publisher, thinking it impossible that such a man could live long, raised his offer, and closed with him at £300. The old rogue lived some twenty-five or thirty years afterwards.—Literary Recorder.

THE PIANO.

Musical instruments, in which the tones were produced by keys, acting upon stretched strings, are of considerable antiquity; but the piano-forte, properly so called, is an invention of the last century. The instrument that immediately preceded it, was the harpsichord, in which the wire was twitched by a small tongue of crow-quill, attached to an apparatus called a jack, moved by the key. At length, in an auspicious hour for the interests of music, the idea arose that, by causing the key to strike the string, instead of pulling it, the tone might be considerably improved, and the general capabilities of the instrument otherwise extended. This contrivance opened an entirely new field to the player, by giving him the power of expression, in addition to that of execution; for, by varying the touch, a greater or less degree of force could be given to the blow on the string—whereby the effect of piano and forte might be produced at pleasure. This was the great feature of the new invention, and gave to the improved instrument the name of piano-forte. Who was the inventor does not appear certain. The merit has been ascribed by turns to the Germans, the Italians, and the English; and the date of the invention is also obscure.—Scientific American.

JOY.

Nature, in seal for human unity,
Denies, or damps, an undivided joy.
Joy is an import—joy is an exchange:
Joy flies monopolists—it calls for two;
Rich fruit! Heaven planted! never plucked by one.
Yours.

COME, GENTLE DOVE.

BY W. FELIX THIER.

Come, gentle dove, my soul is sad,
 My joys are all a-wing;
 And I would crave the melody
 That you alone can sing.
 Thy song, O, gentle one, though sad,
 Hath o'er my soul the power
 To warm its withering chords with life,
 Or calm its frenzied hour.

'Tis heaven indeed, to hear that voice,
 Whose golden murmurs roll
 Through every vein, an ecstasy
 Of rapture on the soul;
 As wild and free its warblings flow,
 An earnest of that bliss
 We all may eull in purer climes,
 When weary worn of this.

Thy spirit-harp forevermore
 Is "sounding on my brain,"
 And it will chime forever there,
 Till you shall come again.
 Forever and forevermore
 Is "sounding on my brain,"
 An angel song of melody
 That calls you back again.

BLIND MAN'S BUFF:

—OR,—

CATCHING A LOVER.

A STORY OF VIRGINIA.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

I was years ago travelling in the stage between Baltimore and Richmond—there were no railroads then—when at one of the stopping places the coach door was opened, and an elderly gentleman and his daughter entered. I was by no means sorry for this, as I had hitherto been the only inside passenger, and night was drawing on. The gentleman was evidently one of the "old Dominion" school—his daughter one of the loveliest creatures I ever beheld. Little wonder then, that in the prospect of a long ride over a bad and dreary road, that I hailed the appearance of both with satisfaction.

It was yet sufficiently light for me to see the face of my fair companion. She was about some sixteen years of age, but far more interesting than misses usually are at that dubious period; a curly headed, rosy creature, arch and good-natured, with a pair of eyes which were absolutely unique. Their color was extremely full and deep; the outline that of a prolonged oval; and usually seeming half shut, and shaded with dark eyelashes, they gave a sly or pensive expression to the curl of a red upper lip, but if aroused by surprise or mirth, they spread out beneath her arching brows with such a brightness of blue as was quite dazzling. They were eyes to sit and gaze upon, as you gaze upon the sky for hours.

She was travelling under her father's escort to Richmond, and being, as I said, without other passengers, I was soon on good terms with both. As it grew dark, the shyness of the little ward gave way to the vivacity of her spirits, and as papa already gave symptoms of drowsiness she gradually addressed herself to me in that vein of communicativeness which flows so beautifully from young lips.

I listened as though I had been a friend of ten years' standing, while she prattled on of her school-friends—of her visits to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and the like, so that in a very short time I knew most of her little history. When it grew chill at night, I folded my gray travelling cloak around her, and observed almost with fondness, her little head begin to nod, and her narrative to falter, until at length, quite wearied, she fell into a slumber so deep, that it was not disturbed, when, at the first jolt that occurred I laid her head on my shoulder, and passing my arm around her, kept it in that position. I was terribly uneasy lest the old gentleman should wake up and see how cosily I had managed matters; but luckily he snored on in blissful unconsciousness.

I could never sleep in a stage. Moreover my imagination was in great force; so as we lumbered along, I amused myself with various reveries concerning the destiny of the pretty creature then slumbering on my bosom. Sometimes a fanciful idea arose that our intercourse so recently begun, and so soon to terminate, might be resumed on a future day; and I busied myself with imagining the lively girl expanded into the loveliness of womanhood, and again crossing my path by some accident such as had already brought us together.

When day broke, the girl looked so beautiful and quiet nestling in my cloak, that I could not abstain from impressing a morning salute upon her brow; so lightly, however, as not to disturb her slumber, for she did not awake until the coach stopped at the hotel door, in Richmond.

I felt quite sad at parting with my charge, and, as I lifted her down the clumsy steps, I asked her to tell me her name, and not to forget me. She told me that she was called Madaline Paget, and that she had a good memory; but I little expected when I bade her farewell, that I should ever see her again.

Trifling as was this adventure, I was, at my then age of nineteen, so full of the dreamy visions of youth, and so great a stranger to the better part of her sex, that during my short sojourn at the South, and long after my return to Boston, the picture of those rich black curls waving on my shoulder, and the pair of blue eyes that opened on mine when she awoke in the stage-coach, perpetually recurred to my imagination. How angry I was at my stupidity in neglecting to ask her the precise address of her Virginian home. Indeed, I tormented all I met from that State, with whom I had any acquaintance, with inquiries concerning the name of Paget, until silenced by the ridicule they excited. The dissipation and business of life did not banish the maiden from my memory, and when I again travelled towards the South, at leisure moments I would ask myself—"I wonder what ever became of that pretty Madaline? By this time she must be a perfect woman, and I doubt not a fair one. I should like to know if she recollects her companion of the stage-coach?"

A delightful summer ramble had terminated at the White Sulphur Springs. On the afternoon of a day too sultry for walking, I was descending on horseback, a mountain by an unfrequented road which led to the margin of a little picturesque lake. The clouds began to gather heavily, and I urged my lazy beast, in the hopes of regaining my quarters before the storm should break. But hack horses are impracticable animals generally, and the one I had hired at the livery stable, was one of the laziest of his tribe, and upon a smart crack of the whip, came to a full stop at the angle of the road, and began to indulge himself in various pranks, to the great alarm of a young lady who was seated quietly sketching at the corner I had just turned. Suddenly she looked up, and opened to their full extent a pair of laughing blue eyes, which I felt certain I had looked at before. Yet, of their splendidly beautiful owner I had no recollection. At once—a thought—an inspiration it must have been, recalled my former companion of the stage-coach. I was sure it must be her. As I detest ceremony in investigations of this kind, I at once dismounted, took off my hat, and escorted the fair artist.

"Pardon me, miss, but it strikes me, that I have had the pleasure of seeing you before. Forgive me for having interrupted you."

She colored, and bowed slightly, and then looking around, called—

"Daniel!"

I knew the voice.

"If that be your servant, miss, I fear he is scarcely within call. It must have been the white-headed old negro whom I passed a quarter of a mile from here."

She gathered up her pencils, and appeared perplexed. At this moment, a few heavy drops of rain and a far-off muttering of thunder came on very opportunely for me. I assumed a most humble and respectful mien:

"Will you honor my quadruped by suffering him to bear you home, before the storm descends?"

She blushed again, and seemed to hesitate, but a loud clap of thunder aided my eloquence materially, and the preparation of a few moments beheld her seated on my horse, wrapped in the very cloak which had kept her warm three years before; and me trotting along at the animal's bridle, or occasionally seizing the apology of a steep descent, or a rough patch of road, for supporting her in the saddle. Soon the rain came down furiously, and I delivered my fair charge into the care of an anxious looking old gentleman, who was watching for her in the verandah of the hotel, and in whom I at once recognized the papa of the stage-coach. From her I received a host of pretty thanks, and from him what I valued far more, the permission to call on the morrow, and inquire whether she had taken any injury from the exposure.

"Daniel," said I, to the old, woolly-headed servant, whom I met hurrying to the hotel, "how long has Captain Paget been at the Springs?"

"'Bout six weeks, sar."

"And is Mrs. Paget here also?"

"No, sar. She's dead, sar. Nobody with the cap'n but Miss Madaline, sar."

I slipped a dollar into his hand, and told him to hurry home and dry himself. As the old fellow shambled off, he said, slyly:

"The cap'n's very rich, sar—very rich—plenty of money, sar—ah, ah!"

Here was full and pleasant information. My conjecture was assured. No troublesome mama or brother—father was old, and well off in the world. Nothing could be more delightful. I returned to my quarters in the highest spirits, and in a rich stream of Utopian visions, engaged my apartments in the town for "two months, certain."

My call on the following day was kindly received; and perhaps because he was in want of amusement, Captain Paget certainly rather encouraged than acquiesced in the approach I made to become an habitué under his roof. I thought it best, however, to cautiously abstain from recalling to his memory our former meeting: But with the fair Madaline I was not so scrupulous; and as soon as we became tolerably good friends, and I was permitted to escort her to views which papa could not reach, I took an opportunity of approaching the subject, though cautiously at first.

The moment, however, I touched upon it, the expression in Miss Paget's eye, or perhaps a little heightening of color, convinced me that she had not forgotten the circumstances of our previous meeting; and I ventured to speak of it, and of the many recollections it had left, without reserve. Why I had hitherto neglected to make the inquiry, I should fail in attempting to explain, those alone, who have been fascinated as I then was, will understand the reason. Henceforward, we became as old friends, and I need not add, constant companions.

I never spoke to her of love, although my heart became almost oppressed with its sweetness. I wonder how I was enabled to keep silence, for there was something in Madaline's manner, which whispered at times as if she would have forgiven my presumption, had I broken it.

But autumn was now nearly past, and I was compelled to return to the North. At parting, the old captain gave me a kind invitation to his mansion, when I should again visit Virginia, and when, in his presence, I essayed to bid farewell to his daughter, my self-possession so nearly left me, that I could barely say, "good-by."

That last day was a miserable one, and when evening came, I could not restrain my desire to say one kind word to Madaline before leaving the place. It was in vain that reason hinted the folly of indulging the pursuit that in my then circumstances, seemed to be hopeless. Before the sun had quite set, I was standing once more at a gate, from which, when open, looked down on the valley below. Would she come? I was sure of it. I stepped aside for a moment. She slowly approached, and stood for a few moments gazing on the scene. I stole to her side, and whispered "Madaline."

At that, I feared she would faint, so pale did she become; but the color directly returned to her complexion, until cheek, brow and neck were glowing with a crimson flush. She held out her hand smiling, but with her eyes full of tears.

"I could not bear to leave you, my sweet friend, without taking a kinder farewell than the few cold words spoken this morning."

She looked downward, and I could see her lip quiver, but no words came.

"It will be a long, long time before I see you again; will you let me thank you for those happy months, or will you add one other treasure to all your gifts of gentleness and condescension? Will you repeat that sweet promise you gave me as a child? Say that you will not forget me, beautiful Madaline Paget."

"Did I break that promise?" she replied in a low voice.

"Ah, but you are now to enter the world, where you will be sought, and caressed, and loved; but no one will love you there so fondly as an old friend, dear Madaline."

She made no answer, but wept.

At that moment, the voice of Captain Paget was heard calling her by name. She slightly pressed my hand, in which I still held hers, and whispered hurriedly, "good-by."

Had Mephistophiles himself then stood at my elbow, I could not have abstained from kissing the lips that uttered those kind, musical words. She struggled, escaped from my embrace, and ran to the house.

For two long years I remained practising my profession in Boston. Need I say what was the pole-star of my endeavors? Those dear words: "I will not forget you," were forever in my ear, and supported me in moments of anxiety and disappointment, of which, God knows I had my full share. But I kept my resolution to avoid Madaline Paget's presence, until I could appear before her in the character of a decided suitor, yet how dearly did it cost me. How could I expect that her memory, to which I had preferred no direct claim, would survive the pleasures of absence, silence, and the assiduous of others?

In the winter of 18—, I returned to Virginia. My difficulties were at length smoothed away. I had not heard of Captain Paget and his daughter since their departure from the Springs. Chance happily directed me to an old friend in the neighborhood of Richmond, from whom I obtained at the same time an invitation to pass the week from Christmas to New Year's day under his roof, and the welcome intelligence that Captain Paget was his neighbor and intimate acquaintance.

I arrived at my friend Hartley's on Christmas Eve.

"You are come at the right moment," said he. "The party from Captain Paget's house, join our merry-making to-morrow, and you will have a good opportunity for renewing your Springs acquaintance."

Between fear and expectation I had no sleep that night. And my excitement continued. A few words to Hartley, indeed, would have put an end to my suspense; but I had resolved to conceal every indication of peculiar interest, until I had learned how Madaline would receive me. I was actually trembling when I entered the drawing-room half an hour before the early dinner, but still the face I sought for was not there.

A carriage drove up to the door, and Captain and Miss Paget were announced. I started forward—a thousand furies! The old gentleman was, indeed, the same; but instead of the beautiful girl I expected, there appeared an aged, thin lady, with all the vinegar look of a maiden sister. Captain Paget greeted me heartily. I forbore to inquire at the moment for his daughter. It had, indeed, been useless, for he was hardly seated before “where is Miss Madaline?” rained upon him from all sides.

“Poor Madaline! I was afraid to bring her out on so cold a day, even to a Christmas revel—she has been so delicate of late.”

Here he looked at the villanous old tartar, in lace cap and spectacles, who nodded assent. I could have shot them both.

I need not describe the dinner. As soon as it was over, I slipped away as quick as I possibly could, without being noticed, seized the first hat I could find in the hall, and ran down the avenue as fast as the frozen snow would allow me.

“Show me Captain Paget’s house,” said I, to a lad I met.

In three minutes I was standing on the piazza of the mansion. Pausing to take breath, I reconnoitered the house, before ringing the bell; so softly stealing round, I reached a window which was brightly illuminated from within. The curtain was partly drawn aside. It was a long room, fitted up with thick, oaken panels, alternating with family portraits. The chief light proceeded from a vast log, which lay glowing and flickering in the wide chimney. The place was full of boys and girls, from seven to twelve years old, one little fairy-like creature being engaged in binding up the eyes of a young lady (the only grown up person of the party) who was seated upon a stool, with her back turned towards the window, amidst shouts of merry laughter. I drew closer, and as she rose to begin the game, I knew by the little white hands extended to catch the fugitives, the elegant form, the rich, black locks, and the dimpled chin, although the eyes were covered, the person of sweet Madaline Paget.

From an involuntary impulse, I tried the clasp of the window; it opened, and there I stood within the curtain, gazing with tremulous delight and eagerness on my beautiful mistress. Merely the game went on, the little folks skipping about, taking especial delight in teasing her by every means in their power. At last, she came running towards my hiding place!

“I’m sure,” she said, “there’s some rogue hiding here, who shall not escape quite so easily as he did the last time.”

I cannot describe how this random speech affected me, but I internally blessed the omen, and coming forward as she approached, quietly possessed myself of her two hands, and pressed them to my lips. Startled, if not alarmed, by a touch so unexpected, she gave a sudden cry, exclaiming:

“Papa, is it not you?” and freeing one of her hands, hurriedly removed the bandage from her forehead. It was a serious moment for me, and the little people looked as alarmed as if Satan himself had stepped from behind the curtain.

On recognizing me, Madaline shrieked, changed color, tried to speak, and burst into tears. I supported her to the sofa, and knelt at her side.

“Forgive me, dear Madaline. I little thought I should alarm you so much; but hear my excuse.” And then I explained to her how I came to be there, and craved pardon.

“I do not know,” she said, blushing deeply, whether I ought to listen to you at all or no. You deserve that I should send you away at once.”

“You would not be so unkind, did you know how I have longed to cast myself on your mercy.”

“Well, I forgive you.”

I was in the seventh heaven. Adroitly setting the children to play by themselves, I returned to Madaline, and told my tale, explaining as well as I could my past silence, asked for her pardon and her fair hand. She was naturally too sincere to tyrannise over me at such a moment, and when, after an ardent expostulation and entreaty, I raised her from the sofa, and silly leading her under a branch of mistletoe, covered her eyes, lips and brow with kisses—she had already breathed the sweet word that made her mine forever.

I was married soon afterwards, and never since have failed at Christmas time to join in a game of blind man’s buff, and to kiss my wife under the branch of mistletoe.

Anybody who should study human nature much, would find that it is one of the most dangerous amusements to bring people together to talk who have but little to say.

AN ARABIAN SONG.

BY JAMES HOGG.

Meet me at even, my own true love,
 Meet me at even, my honey, my dove,
 Where the moonbeam revealing,
 The cool fountain stealing,
 Away and away,
 Through flow'rets so gay,
 Singing its silver roundelay.

Love is the fountain of life and bliss,
 Love is the valley of joyfulness;

A garden of roses,
 Where rapture reposes,—
 A temple of light
 All heavenly bright;

O, virtuous love is the soul's delight!

THE VICTOR OF THE TOURNAMENT.

BY HARRIET A. DAVISON.

THE day for the grand tournament by Louis XII. of France, arrived; appointed to please his beautiful and youthful bride, Anne of Bretagne. The galleries running round the lists were filled with the beauty and nobility of the kingdom. Conspicuous sat the queen, surrounded by her circle of lovely maids of honor, among which, far the most beautiful was Lady Marguerite, only daughter of Ernest, Count of Chatillon.

With a beating heart Marguerite of Chatillon watched the opening of the tournament. Until within six months Marguerite had lived in the retirement of the convent. What a change! six months ago the inhabitant of a retired convent, now the centre of admiring eyes, for this day she sat the chosen Queen of Beauty and Love—from her hands must the victor receive the well-won prize, the chaplet of honor.

The heralds, enforcing silence read the laws of the tourney, which having done, they moved back to their places. A flourish of trumpets and two large processions entered the lists of either side and formed themselves into two lines, equal numbers in each, directly opposite to each other with their respective leader in front of each line. It was a glorious sight to look at, as the knights sat proudly on their horses, gayly and fitly caparisoned, their lances upright, armor streaming with ribbons, and love tokens glittering in the bright, warm noonday sun. Again the trumpets sounded, and the herald in a voice of thunder gave the expected signal, "Laissez aller!" Spurs were dashed into the flanks of the horses, and both parties rushed together, meeting with a shock which fairly shook the ground, and caused many bright, rosy lips to pale.

The cloud of dust raised by the trampling of the horses was so great, that at first little of the effect of the encounter could be seen. As that rolled away, it was seen that many of the knights on both sides were dismounted, and retiring in discomfiture from the field.

Again and again they charged, and with the same result; some men each time rolled on the ground. Many were the handkerchiefs waved and encouraging, enthusiastic shouts from the gallery. The number in the lists diminished, so that now Marguerite found no difficulty in following the movements of one particular knight, who, mounted on a superb black war-horse, rode him with peculiar grace. Both horse and rider were unadorned—the trappings of the steed were very plain, and no love knot floated from shoulder, breast or hemlet. At each charge the knight either unhorsed or drove back to the palisade his opponent. One after another the vanquished retired to the end of the list. One only remained to oppose him. A fresh charge with lance in rest, and like chaff before the wind the man was driven back to the barrier, and the stranger knight remained the conqueror. Then the king threw down the baton, and the heralds declared Eustace De Rohan victor, and bade him advance and receive the chaplet of honor from the hands of the Queen of Beauty and Love.

The trumpets sounded, and amidst a burst of triumphal music, the knight advanced and knelt at the foot of the steps of the throne. Covered with blushes but with an exquisite grace, Marguerite descended the steps and bending placed the chaplet of flowers on the knight's uncovered head.

We must pardon Marguerite if she trembled slightly, and with an inward shrinking gazed at the victor at her feet, for Eustace De Rohan was the only son of her father's deadliest enemy, whose name she had never heard mentioned save with bitter curses on father and son, and on the family for generations to come. She looked now for the first time on the son of the hated house of Rohan. There was nothing in the handsome head bending so gracefully before her, to excite her fear, neither in the rapid, searching glance of the dark proud, eyes, which, after the ceremony of coronation had been completed, fell on her. On the contrary, the manly, handsome, though rather dark face, reassured the blushing girl, for with an exquisite grace she extended her delicate hand, which was kissed respectfully, while she said, in her rich sweet voice:

"May honor rest on thy brows—long years after this chaplet is withered away."

So ended the glorious tournament, one of the gayest ever witnessed by the court of Louis XII., but from that moment two hearts at least were changed. Sleeping or waking, the graceful form and bewitchingly lovely face was ever present to the thoughts of the young, brave Count De Rohan, and to Marguerite, the mention of his name brought a sudden thrill. A few days after they were publicly introduced to each other.

Day by day, meeting each other constantly, they began to love each other, or rather loved the more, for from the tourney day each lost the watch and ward of their own hearts. One day the queen received a request from the baron of Chatillon, that his daughter might be spared attendance upon her grace for a little while. The father had need of the daughter. The summons broke in on the pleasant dreams of the young lovers. Marguerite, for the first time since Eustace De Rohan knelt at her feet in the list, thought of the feud between the two families. When the queen gave her permission to return home for a short time, Marguerite buried her face in her hands and wept. "'Tis but a short time, dear child," said the gentle Anne of Bretagne, with whom the graceful, gay Marguerite was a favorite.

Still Marguerite wept, and the queen kindly endeavored to soothe the passionate grief, fully believing that Maggie wept because she was to part from her loved mistress. Suddenly Marguerite raised her beautiful face and spoke, scornful to be deceitful.

"Your grace mistakes the cause of my emotion. Truly do I grieve to be separated from my kind mistress, but a parting of a few weeks would scarcely wring these tears from me. The cause lies deeper."

Of a kindly, sympathizing nature, the queen besought Marguerite to confide her sorrow to her, and such was her earnest, winning manner, that Marguerite unhesitatingly opened her whole heart to her loved queen. Both Louis and his gentle spouse began to devise methods to induce the haughty baron of Chatillon to lay aside his animosity. While they thought, others acted.

Marguerite, after a tearful interview with her lover, left the court for the gloomy castle of Chatillon. Her heart grew heavy and her cheeks pale as the palace walls faded from her sight. Her father came himself to conduct her home, so she could have no last interview with her lover. Sad and weary-hearted, Eustace De Rohan remained at court, now distasteful to him.

Rumors had reached the baron of the attachment of Eustace De Rohan to his daughter, which was his motive for withdrawing Marguerite from court. She came, the affianced bride of Count De Rohan, but Baron Chatillon knew not that; and thought in his wisdom that he had effectually put a stop to any progress in the matter. So his astonishment was but natural when one bright, sunshiny morning, he woke to find his daughter gone. Over mountain, through valley, he sent his retainers, commanded to bring back the lost bride and her husband, the husband dead or alive. All search was fruitless. In his despair the baron applied to the king, but the gentle, politic Louis gave him no satisfaction.

Three years rolled on, and the baron lived a lonely, morose life. No stranger was permitted within the gates, and beyond the park the baron was never known to stir. One dark, lowering day, just as the gray twilight shadows began to creep over the earth, two travellers, a man and woman, presented themselves at the castle gate. They seemed bent and old, and in the arms of the man was carried very carefully a bundle. The old porter came forth to speak to them.

"Do not ask it. Bread and wine I will bring you, but enter you cannot."

Earnestly they pleaded, but the old man shook his head and remained firm. They questioned him if it was by a vow that his master kept all strangers beyond his gate.

"No, there is no vow, but 'tis his wish. Three years ago, come this blessed night, there came a minstrel to the castle. The next morning, minstrel and young lady Marguerite were gone. Since that day no stranger has ever set foot inside the castle gate. The baron mourns for his lovely daughter, and curses the false Eustace De Rohan who, disguised as a minstrel, entered his house and stole his child, the pride of his house."

The female bowed her head still lower as the old porter spoke, but as he finished speaking, she stepped forward, and throwing back cloak and myffler, disclosed to the faithful seneschal the beautiful face of Marguerite, Countess De Rohan.

"Hendrich, here stands your master's daughter, with her husband and child; admit us within these gates and your task is done."

"Dear lady, walk in; if my head should be the price of my disobedience, I cannot say no to my own loved lady." And he opened wide the gates and let the two pass in.

But there their trouble was not ended; butler, valet and page had to be passed, and all were faithful servants to their stern, though just master—all respected the grief which sought solitude and shunned the gaze of man. To each in turn, Marguerite declared herself, and such was the undying love they bore their former young mistress, who possessed still the same winning grace of her maidenhood, that they preferred the prospect of punishment and disgrace rather than disobey her request. Thus the Count and Countess

De Rohan proceeded till they reached the little ante-room adjoining the vast parlor. There Marguerite stopped, wishing that her husband should enter first. That was her request not from any fear, but trusting that her father would relent, and wanting in the pride of her young heart to owe her reconciliation to her husband. Marguerite embraced her husband, then opened the door of the saloon, and her husband entered. At the opposite end of the room sat the Baron of Chatillon, much changed since he last saw him. Eustace De Rohan could not see his face, but the martial figure was no longer upright and firm, but bent. With a beating, throbbing heart, Marguerite watched her husband and father.

Noiselessly, slowly, Eustace approached the old man. The firelight thrown from the huge woodfire, shone on a pale face and compressed lips. A few steps more and the two men will be face to face. The spot is reached. Count De Rohan knelt before the old man, who had started up in angry surprise, with his head bared, and as he knelt, he threw back the cloak from the bundle, disclosing a bright, handsome babe, who at this moment began to crow. A smile stole over the old man's face; taking the baby, he eagerly scanned its tiny features. As he gazed, his heart softened, and bending his head he wept. At this moment, Marguerite threw herself at his feet, tears sparkling in her eyes.

"Father, thy Marguerite sues for pardon, begs to be taken back; sues for herself, and her husband and her child."

"Daughter, I have been wrong; my rage was foolish, impotent. Children, rise, kneel not before me. Bless you, Marguerite and Eustace."

Thus, through the means of the lovely babe, the Count and Countess De Rohan were received in their home. From that moment the baron was devoted to the child, on whom he settled his possessions, asking only that the boy should bear the title of Baron of Chatillon. This request was cheerfully granted, as in course of time others came to bear the proud name of De Rohan.

PRINTER'S LUCK.

A week or two ago, a Cincinnati printer visited the theatre, and found a pocket-book containing $250. Rich, beyond all expectation, he determined to rest awhile. He "put a sub on," spent what money he had of his own, incurred several little debts, and then concluded to break in upon his treasure, by purchasing a new hat. He entered a hat store, bought one of the latest style, and tendered one of the $5 notes in payment. It was pronounced a counterfeit, and so in turn every note of his $250 found treasure! He has gone to work again, saying that being a printer, he should have known that the bills were worthless!—Ohio Cultivator.

THE CAPTAIN'S YARN.

Conversing with the captain of a vessel, the other day, he related the following anecdote: "I had a first-rate officer who sailed with me for several years. He was an excellent seaman, and a perfect gentleman. I remember I took him once to the Italian opera in London, and he expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the performances, though he had no ear for music, didn't understand the language, and was too bashful to look at the figurantes. A particular and very amiable trait of his character was his domestic affection. Sailors, roving about the world, are seldom very constant; but this man was a perfect model of conjugal fidelity. He was always speaking of his wife—he had no children—always buying presents for her in every port he visited. Well, one day—we were lying off the river Gambia, in Africa—my mate, after dinner, leaned back in his chair and fell asleep. I went on deck to smoke a cigar. When I came back, I found poor M. lying on the cabin floor—a corpse! A sudden stroke of apoplexy had carried him off. I was inexpressibly shocked. He had a sailor's grave—and every heart on board the brig was heavy at his loss.

"On the home voyage, I was thinking all the while of the agony of M.'s poor wife, when she learned of his death, and how I should break the news to her. She always flew down to the pier as soon as she heard of our brig coming up the bay, and I believe she could read every signal-flag that was thrown out from the station. Well, we had no sooner made fast to the wharf, than down came a handsome hack, and out springs the mate's wife, rigged out from top to toe like a first-rate frigate on a gala-day, with a fathom or two of ribbon astern of her. 'Poor girl!' thought I, 'how soon my tale will blanch the roses of your cheek.' 'My husband?' she inquired, as she sprang lightly on the deck, showing a pair of tiny feet cased in the daintiest satin shoes that ever a French shoemaker turned out. 'I am sorry to say, madam,' said I, 'that he has been very sick.' The color came and went in her cheek. 'Tell me all,' she cried, grasping my arm. 'Well, then, madam,' said I, 'if I must say it, he is dead.' 'Glad of it, by jingo!' was her answer. She was ashore and off again, in the trying of a reef-point—and the next week she was married to a merchant's clerk."

Habits influence the character pretty much as under currents influence a vessel, and whether they speed us on the way of our wishes, or retard our progress, their effect is not the less important because imperceptible.

I SAT ON THE BANKS OF THE RIVER.

BY LENA LYLE.

I sat on the banks of the river,
 Beneath a grand old tree,
 And I saw the sunbeams quiver,
 Through my leafy canopy.
 As they fell upon the water,
 'Twas beautiful to see,
 But I heeded not its beauty,
 For my thoughts were all of thee.

The twilight was approaching,
 The sun had gone to rest,
 Within his gorgeous chambers,
 Far in the rosy west.
 And the gentle stars were hasting,
 Each one to meet his bride,
 When I turned my footsteps homeward,
 And left the river-side.

As the moon rolled on in beauty,
 And the fragrant nightwind swept,
 Sweet dreams came to my spirit,
 As peacefully I slept.
 I dreamed that thou wast with me—
 We'd met to part no more,
 And the sweet place of re-union
 Was on the river-shore.

When the morning dawned in gladness,
 And I met its sunny gleam,
 My soul was filled with sadness
 To think it was but a dream.
 But though an idle vision,
 It brought me nearer thee,
 And although it quickly faded,
 It left sweet memory.

FRANK'S PROPHECY:

—OR,—

DOINGS AT SUNNY SLOPE.

BY ESTHER BERNÉ.

"I SAY, Sophie, have you heard the news?"

"What news?" said I, suspending for a moment, the occupation which my wild, roguish brother Frank had so unceremoniously interrupted.

"Wait a moment, sis, till I have recovered my breath, and then I'll tell you."

So saying, my tantalizing brother threw himself into a chair, and gasped several times with such vehemence, that I shrewdly suspected that his sighs were got up for the occasion, and not genuine. As, however, whatever curiosity I might feel, I showed none, but calmly resumed my writing, Frank soon condescended to impart his news.

"A new teacher has been appointed at the Academy, and as the term commences next week, why then, I suppose we shall have a sight at his majesty. Now, don't you call that a piece of news, Sophie?"

"To be sure I do; but have you heard anything about the gentleman—who and what he is?"

"As to that," said Frank, "there are half-a-dozen reports about concerning him, any one of which you are at liberty to believe. But I have my own private idea of him."

"And what is that?" said I, not noticing that the mischievous boy had whittled away half of my pen-handle, and was now amusing himself by sticking the point of the pen into the table.

"Why, you see, Sophie," said Frank, in a confidential tone, "it's my 'idea that our new teacher hails from 'down east'—indeed, I am quite sure of it. I can see him in my mind's eye, dressed out in a long, swallow-tailed coat, adorned with bright, brass buttons. He'll rule the poor 'gals' and boys of Sunny Slope Academy with a rod of iron, and before three months have past, will throw himself and his fortunes at the feet of my adorable sister—Sophie Merton."

I had a great inclination to shake Frank, but he eluded my grasp by a dexterous movement, and escaped from the room. In a moment, however, he returned, and thrusting his bright, curly head through the open door, added:

"Take care of your heart, sister mine, for if ever a prophecy came true, mine will."

I don't know why it was, but as I gathered up the remains of my pen-handle, a thoughtful shade rested upon my brow. What if Frank's prophecy should come true? I was foolishly romantic enough for a moment to believe that it might. But the next instant I was dancing lightly away upon my afternoon duties.

Two days afterwards, there was a great stir and commotion in the village of Sunny Slope, for rumor ran that the new teacher had arrived and was staying at Lawyer Boardman's house. Three or four of the neighbors called upon my aunt, for the express purpose of describing the new resident to her; but as their accounts of his appearance were very contradictory, I determined not to believe any of them, but to wait patiently till the next day, when I, as one of the scholars, should have a chance of judging for myself.

The fates had willed it otherwise for me, however. That night when my father came home to tea, he brought a letter for my aunt Nellie, who for many years, ever since my mother's death, had been our housekeeper. My aunt was exceedingly thoughtful after the letter had been read, and held a long conference with my father, which I was at length invited to join. When I entered the room, my father said smilingly

"Well, Sophie, how should you like to be my housekeeper for a little while?"

Housekeeper! My very heart bounded with joy at the idea, for I took great delight in domestic matters.

"Your aunt will be obliged to be absent from home a week, perhaps longer. Do you think you could supply her place in the meanwhile?"

"Of course I could," said I, whilst a rapturous vision of the laurels I should win in my domestic campaign, floated through my mind. My father laughed heartily at my confident air.

"Be not too sure, Sophie; you know there is such a thing as falling. However, I shall predict nothing but success for you. But what says your aunt about it?"

"O, Sophie will do well enough with the thousand and one directions I shall give her," said aunt Nellie in an encouraging tone. And so the matter ended. I was to be sole housekeeper for the next week or two, and consequently for that length of time I should have to give up all idea of going to school. But as Frank was to attend regularly, I should, at least, get some reliable account of the new teacher. Aunt Nellie's thousand and one directions were magnified ten-fold, I was about to say—but seriously speaking, they were almost endless in number. Only one out of the multiplicity of directions did I remember distinctly afterwards; and that one only because it had been repeated so many times, that it had at length succeeded in penetrating my giddy brain.

"Now, Sophie," said my aunt, as she stood equipped for the journey at the front gate, "remember what I have told you—but above all, bear in mind, that under no circumstances whatever, are you to allow any cattle in my kitchen garden. I trust to you to make war upon all such intruders."

Thus much of her parting injunctions I remembered and acted upon, as will be seen anon. When Frank came home that day from school, I snatched a moment from my busy cares, to inquire about the new teacher.

"I'm sorry for you, Sophie," said Frank, with a comically serious face; "instead of the 'down easter' that I sketched out for you the other day, you will have to accept of a venerable, bald-headed gentleman, who indulges in a pair of gold-bowed spectacles, and who seems to be a very wise personage. But on the whole, I congratulate you that it is no worse; for, as I observed to you before, Sophie, 'what is to be, will be,' and I feel an inward conviction that what I have prophesied concerning you will happen."

Happily Frank's inward convictions were here expended upon the dinner, the appearance of which spared me a further tirade of nonsense. I will not say but what I endured a little disappointment when I learned that an elderly instead of a young man was about to govern our little school world. I was, to say the truth, somewhat fond of a reasonable flirtation, and here was a chance for one fine one destroyed. But I quickly forgot this subject in my new dignity and importance. I verily believe, that I grew two inches during the first day of my new office.

The next day towards night, whilst I was making preparation for tea, I happened to glance through the window at the garden, where grew many a precious root and herb. To my extreme horror, I saw a cow just poking her head through the gate, and in fancy I already saw the demolition of my aunt's cherished treasures. To snatch my sun-bonnet, to rush down that path through the flower garden into the kitchen garden, was but the work of a moment. But the cow had already effected an entrance, and stood gazing with a philosophic eye upon the feast of green things spread out before her. As I had promised aunt Nellie to make war upon all intruders, I prepared with a courageous spirit to drive away this quiet-looking cow. But the animal, probably suspecting my intention, made a sudden leap, and ran the whole circuit of the garden, demolishing many a flourishing plant. I pursued her with great animation, and had almost succeeded in driving her through the gate, when making a frantic plunge, she once more made the circuit of the garden. Again I pursued, incited by the chase, and again I failed as before. I was beginning to see that two would be better than one in such a warfare as this, and therefore I called loudly for Frank, but there was no response. Again I endeavored to drive her out, but the troublesome animal, evidently enjoying the frolic, had no disposition to end it. Discouraged, and I am ashamed to own it, almost crying, I stood at last by the gate in a kind of calm despair. Suddenly I heard a voice say:

"Can I help you?"

I looked round—there stood a young man, a stranger, but a little distance from me. I had forgotten that the street was so near, and that any one passing, could easily have seen the whole affair.

If there had been a convenient opening in the earth just then, I could have sunk into it very readily, but as there was not, I stood with sun-bonnet in hand, disordered hair, and an extremely red face, looking at the apparition before me. Without any more words, the stranger swung himself lightly over the fence, and approaching me, said :

"If you will please stand this side of the gate, I will drive the animal round, and I fancy you will have no more trouble with her."

I did as he had suggested, and I soon had the pleasure of seeing the garden free from the intruder, and the gate securely shut, as a precaution against the entrance of future depredators.

I turned round to thank the stranger, and not knowing whether to laugh or cry, I compromised the matter by crying a very little, and then laughing immoderately, for I was both extremely vexed and amused at the remembrance of the scene in which I had acted as a prominent character.

"I am very much obliged to you, for your timely aid," I said, as soon as I was able to speak.

"Pray, do not offer thanks to one who does not deserve any. I was passing by, and saw your trouble, and as every true knight should, I came at once to your assistance."

"The distressed damsel, whom you found in such woeful plight, thanks you once more, sir knight, and begs to wish you good evening."

I turned to walk back to the house, ashamed and mortified, but yet not exactly sorry that my adventure had occurred. I wondered not a little, that I had not heard of strangers being in town ; for the young man who had come to my rescue, was no one whom I had ever seen before. I finally came to the conclusion that he was a student at the academy, and a native of some other town ; for occasionally it happened that our school was attended by people from other places.

The next day at dinner, my father informed me that he should bring a gentleman home with him, and that he would like to have me do my best. Of course this was quite an anxious and important piece of news for me, for I knew that my father had a fastidious horror of any glaring defects or deficiencies in the appointments of his table ; and my experience in housekeeping had not been so long that I could feel entirely safe. However, I determined to do my best. At the appointed hour my father and his guest arrived. With much surprise and confusion, I recognized my gallant rescuer of the day before. Happily the embarrassment which both of us evinced at the introduction, was, if noticed, passed without any comment from my father. But in the confusion of the moment, the name of the stranger escaped me ; by no effort could

I recall it to my recollection, though I knew that my father had distinctly pronounced it.

With what pride I surveyed the tea-table, which presented a neat and elegant appearance as we entered the dining-room, no one can comprehend, unless placed in the same situation. The snowy cloth, the white biscuit, the clear, transparent preserve, and the fresh, golden-hued butter, would have tempted almost any one. But when I poured out the fragrant tea, the picture of home comfort was complete. I saw that my father was pleased at my management, and this idea caused me to do the honors of the table with unwonted grace. But the coffee-cake with which the table was adorned, was my crowning achievement. It was a delicacy which I was very fond of myself, and by the introduction of which, I hoped to please my father and astonish our guest. I marked with delight the dark, rich color of the cake, just the shade for coffee-cake, and I thought with pride that my reputation as a good housekeeper would be very much increased by the effort of genius displayed in the construction of such a delicacy.

But, ah, what vain hopes ! Scarcely had my father tasted a piece of the cake, when he deposited the remainder in his plate with a little grimace, which I well understood. Astounded and mortified, I tasted of the cake myself, and discovered that in the making of it, I had omitted one of the most important ingredients, and that what I had supposed was cake, was nothing but an extremely tasteless mixture.

I watched our guest with secret anxiety, as I saw him endeavoring to dispose of a slice of the cake, and I fancied that politeness more than inclination caused him to eat what must have been distasteful to any one's palate.

"By the way, Sophie," said my father, making a kindly attempt to relieve my obvious embarrassment, "I should judge by the looks of aunt Nellie's garden, that in spite of your vigilance, some four footed beast had penetrated within its sacred precincts."

I cast an amused look at our visitor, and met in return such a merry smile, that I was almost ill-bred enough to laugh outright then and there. In the evening, however, when the whole amusing scene had been explained to my father, I had an opportunity to indulge in a hearty laugh at the remembrance of it.

"Did I not hear you say, Miss Merton, that you should attend school this term ?" said our visitor, as my father withdrew from the room to attend on some one who had called on business.

"Yes, I shall attend ; that is, if I like the teacher."

"Have you any doubt about it?" asked my companion, with a smile.

"I must confess," said I, "that the description my brother Frank gave me of him has not exactly prepossessed me in his favor."

"May I ask how he described him?" said the visitor, with an amused look.

"He says he is quite an elderly, bald-headed, gold-spectacled gentleman, with a vast deal of learning. And the worst of it is," continued I, "Frank threatens that before three months have passed, I shall have carried the old gentleman's heart by storm. To plague Frank, I have a great mind to try it."

"So do, by all means," said my companion, joining heartily in my mirth.

"As we are to be school-mates, will you aid and abet me in my treasonable designs?" said I.

"To be sure I will, Miss Merton, to the fullest extent of my power; and I have a presentiment that by our combined exertions you will succeed."

I laughed at the prospect of success, but said nothing.

"As a token of our compact, will Miss Merton give me this rose?" pursued our visitor, directing my attention to a flower which I held in my hand.

I smilingly assented, and the rose consequently changed owners.

A week from that day, aunt Nellie arrived home, and after approving of a few of my proceedings, and disapproving of a great many, the affair of the garden included, she finally expressed her conviction that I should make quite a housekeeper in time. I will not say but what I was as glad to get rid of my charge, as I had been to take it, for once in a while as a vision of my school-mate that was to be, and the strange compact I had entered into with him, came across my mind, I had just a little curiosity to see him again.

The next morning bright and early, I started for school, and as I neared the academy, I recognized with pleasure many a familiar face peering forth from the window. As I entered, there was a loud shout from the girls, and many an inquiry as to where I had been for the last week or two.

There was a general burst of merriment when I informed the assembled group that I had been keeping house for my father, and more than one young lady lamented that fate had no such good fortune in store for her.

"I say," said Ellen Acton, a merry girl of fifteen, "you'll lose your heart directly, if you don't look out. We have every one of us, even little Allie Elton, fallen in love with the new teacher."

"It's no such thing," said Allie, putting her little, rosy mouth close up to my ear, "I have not fallen in love with him, but I like him ever so much, because he is so good. I know you'll like him, Sophie."

"Don't trouble yourself on my account, Allie," I said aloud, "there is not the slightest danger of my really falling in love with any one at present, still less with our venerable teacher."

Here the bell rung to call us to order, and we hastily scrambled to our seats. For a moment the teacher's desk was unoccupied, and then—how shall I describe my confusion, when I saw my gallant knight in the cow affair, and our subsequent guest, seat himself in the teacher's post of honor, as if he were perfectly at home! A vague suspicion as to his identity crossed my mind, a suspicion which was confirmed by Allie Elton's whispering remark:

"That's our new teacher—don't he look pleasant?"

I vouchsafed no reply, for just then our new teacher's eye wandering over the room, encountered mine. An almost imperceptible smile rested upon his face, as for one instant his glance remained fixed upon my countenance, which I felt was dyed the deepest scarlet. I was very glad when I was relieved from his scrutiny.

How that long day passed, I never could tell. The only thing that I remembered distinctly, was a request on the part of Mr. Minturn, the teacher, that I would remain a few moments after school. When the scholars had departed, and I was tremblingly waiting for a renewal of our former conversation regarding our strange compact, I was surprised by the utterance only of these few, simple words:

"Will Miss Merton oblige me by removing her books to this seat?"

The seat which he designated was a front one, and I had occupied all day one of those farthest back from the desk. There was no explanation given, no reason for the request offered, not the slightest word more said regarding the matter, unless it was a very pleasant 'thank you,' uttered when I had complied with the request, which I complied with; though I am ashamed to say, in a somewhat sulky manner. A better feeling, however, rose up within me, as softly opening the door, I looked back to see him wearily poring over his books, a task which was yet to be done ere his day's work was completed.

My new seat had its advantages, after all. Never did I look up from my book, but what I caught a friendly glance from my teacher's eye, and I returned to my lesson with renewed energy. Whenever he was talking to the school, or explaining any subject, his eye, almost involuntarily as it were, sought mine. We seemed to have established a sort of tacit communication with each other, though we never overstepped the limits of our respective positions—those of teacher and scholar. Gradually it became my habit to remain after school when I needed any assistance about a difficult lesson. Readily, clearly, and with a kindly manner and a quiet deference towards myself, which completely won my heart, Mr. Minturn helped me out of all my troubles. I even took up newer and harder tasks than the rest of the girls, and we spent many a pleasant hour poring over our ponderous tomes.

I never could tell how the change in our affairs originated, whether in me or in him. But certain it is, that in the course of time, a coolness arose between my teacher and myself. As gradually as I had fallen into the habit of remaining after school, so gradually did I fall away from it. Our pleasant lessons were at an end, and one fine summer's day when I met Mr. Minturn and Ellen Acton walking out together, I felt that henceforth school would have no interest for me. From that day I began to dislike it, and I finally prevailed upon my father to allow me to leave school. There was a burst of sorrowful exclamations, on the part of the girls, when I announced my intention of leaving.

"What will Mr. Minturn do without you?" whispered Allie Elton.

"O, he will get along well enough," said I, with assumed carelessness — "perhaps he will rejoice."

"Hush!" said Alice, "I think he overheard you."

"It's of no consequence if he did," was my reply, as I walked away to my seat.

"Will Miss Merton remain a moment?" said Mr. Minturn, at the close of school, as with a hasty "good-by" to him, I was about to take my departure with the others.

I resumed my seat, and awaited patiently what he had to say. When the last loiterer had departed, he arose, and approaching my seat, took from his pocket-book a faded rose, and held it up to view.

"Does Miss Merton remember what this is a token of?"

Half angry with myself at the tell-tale blushes which covered my face, I made no answer.

"Ah! I see you do," said he, smiling. "But are you still disposed to carry on your treasonable designs against the old gentleman's heart?"

Still I made no reply.

"Then hear me," said he, vehemently, "the promise that I gave you, to help you as far as was in my power, was no light one; the first time I saw you at school I felt its importance. I requested you to change your seat, that I might have the selfish pleasure of having you near me; of being cheered and comforted by your glance. Our after school labors were infinitely pleasant to me, but perhaps wearisome to you. I cannot blame you for withdrawing yourself from them, but I do blame you for leaving school, and for asserting publicly that I should rejoice at such a step. You know, or ought to know now, that I should be utterly desolate if you were gone. Now will you answer me, Sophie?"

I did answer, but what that answer led to, is of no consequence to any one. I will merely say that I persisted in my original determination of leaving school, but that not near so much sorrow was experienced by Mr. Minturn as might have been expected under the circumstances.

A short time after, Frank came to me with an amused face, and with the remark:

"Well, Sophie, my prophecy is actually coming true, isn't it? and you are going to marry the identical old gentleman. I hope you will always believe in me after this."

MORMON LIFE.

Mrs. Smith, who has just escaped from Mormonism, has written a book, in which she gives this account of Mormon courtship and marriage: "Coercion is seldom used to effect marriages among the women. They are indulged in the utmost freedom of choice among the men. They are only required to marry some one, "and the man of her choice" is not at liberty to refuse to marry a woman when asked to do so. Proposition for marriage comes as often and with as good a grace from the female as from the male. An apparent hardship in this system, and it is only in appearance, is, that it would be likely to leave some men without wives, while others have a great number. But the fact is that women accumulate under the system. I think it seldom occurs that a man wishing to marry, who is able to support a wife, cannot find at least one; although many not over good-looking men, who have no high official dignity to recommend them, are obliged to content themselves with one or two. It is considered, however, in 'good society,' to be a want of position and rank to possess but one wife, and few men have the moral courage to appear in public with less than two; while on great occasions, when it is an object to make an impression on the public mind, it is the custom of men of position to appear surrounded by a numerous train of wives, the more the better."

If man could only understand and appreciate how deeply he is the object of divine love, he would be overwhelmed with confusion and astonishment.

THE STORY OF A JEWEL.

BY FRANCIS I. STANLEY,

Beneath the surface, and far out of sight,
Buried in the earth, and hidden from light,
In a coffin of dust, entombed in night,
A wonderful jewel lay.

The meanest pebble was there side by side
With this stone, whose lustre a king in pride
Might have given to deck with it his bride,
Yet neglected there it lay.

The traveller's footstep heavily pressed
The earth that gloomily lay on the breast
Of this jewel, that, placed in a knightly crest,
Might lead him to glory undying.

The wild flowers blossomed over the spot,
Where this wondrous stone by its gloomy lot
Might be doomed to stay till all were forgot,
And in their graves were lying.

The war horse pawed the spongy mound,
And chariot wheels tore up the ground,
And blood was scattered all around
O'er the tomb of the glittering jewel.

The peaceful ploughshare furrowed the soil,
And the heavy tramp of the son of toil,
As with axe he gathered his woody spoil,
Shook the bed of the hidden jewel.

And many a storm took its wilful way,
And often a sunny and peaceful day
Looked down upon the bed of clay,
Where slept the precious stone.

And the sun sent many a beaming lance
Of light to earth, to woo with a glance
The brilliant jewel on its rays to dance,
And leave its tomb of night.

But a jealous mother is the mossy earth,
And never a gleam of the sun's bold mirth
Reached the gem in the spot of its birth—
Its prison debarred of light.

And there the jewel was destined to stay,
Till coarse and stern cold man one day
Plucked the stone from its casket of clay,
And smoothed its jagged side.

Then proud did beauty her diadem toss,
And haughty fawners bowed to the dross
Whose covering did many a by-road cross,
And earth was once its bride.

And little the good and much the harm,
And wicked and baleful was the charm,
For it raised by man 'gainst man the arm
To plunder and destroy.

And better, far better, the jewel had staid
In the prison where nature its power laid,
Lest of peace and love should strife be made,
Because of the shining toy.

It is not by regretting what is irreparable, that true work is to be done, but by making the best of what we are. Forget mistakes; organize victory out of mistakes.

THE TRAVELLING CLERKS.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

THERE was once a time, so long ago that you, dear reader, cannot surely remember it, when heaven was called Olympus, and the god inhabiting this Olympus was called Zeus, Jove or Jupiter, three names which signify about the same thing. This god had one day the singular idea of making mankind happy. You shall see, dear reader, how he was cured of this idea, and how the other gods, his successors, were cured of it after him. It remained to put this idea into execution. Jupiter reflected a moment, then suddenly raising his head, said:

"I have it!" And he summoned to his presence the seven stars of the Lesser Bear.

The stars obeyed, and assembled at his feet. Men, astonished gazed at the sky. Astronomers seeing these seven meteors tracing luminous paths in the azure of the firmament, predicted the end of the world. Thus are learned men deceived respecting divine intentions. The stars said:

"We are here, resplendent and terrible majesty; what wouldst thou of us?"

"Pack up your trunks and travel on earth," replied the son of Saturn and Rhea; "you shall receive two Brabant crowns per day for your travelling expenses."

"And what are we to do on the earth?" asked the stars.

"I have taken it into my head to make mankind happy," replied Jupiter; "but as they would not appreciate happiness, if I should give it to them, I shall require you to sell it. You shall be my travelling clerks."

"We will be what you ordain us to be, all-powerful majesty," said the stars, in tones so melodious that men raised their eyes towards heaven, suspecting that from heaven alone could proceed so sweet a concert; "but what shall we sell to men?"

"Form yourselves into a line, and pass one by one before me."

The stars did so, and arranged themselves in the order designated:

Jupiter said to the first, "You shall sell wit."

To the second, "You shall sell virtue."

To the third, "You shall sell health."

To the fourth, "You shall sell longevity."

To the fifth, "You shall sell honor."

To the sixth, "You shall sell pleasure."

To the seventh, "You shall sell riches."

Judging of the desires of men by the prayers which were addressed to him, Jupiter thought that when men should have wit, virtue, health, long life, honor, pleasure and wealth, they would be happy. This was, in fact, a reasonable idea.

"And now," said he to the stars, "go and sell to mankind as much as you can, of your divine merchandise."

Neptune and Pluto, who had all along laughed at this plan, began to laugh still more loudly, repeating:

"What a comical idea! what a comical idea!"

The seven stars packed up their commodities in different chests, furnished to them by the warehouse of heaven, and descending upon earth, began to offer their wares in the first great city on their way.

"Buy wit! buy wit!" cried star No. 1. "Buy it; I have it fresh and warm. Buy wit! who wants wit, wit, wit?"

A Homeric laugh received this proposition.

"Does this woman take us for fools?" said the editors, the romance-writers, the dramatic authors, the managers of theatres, and the farmers'-general.

"A pretty girl indeed, faith!" said the dandies, looking at the merchant of wit through their eye-glasses, quizzing-glasses and spectacles, and switching their boots with the riding whips or canes which they carried in their gloved hands; "only she looks a little like a blue-stocking. What a pity!"

"What is this prude doing here?" said the women; "she had better have brought us silks from Lyons, laces from Valenciennes, scarfs from Algiers, corals from Naples, pearls from Ceylon, rubies from Visapour, and diamonds from Golconda; but wit! it can be had for nothing, any day."

And the poor star passed along, without selling any, from street to street, till at last, finding a door open, she entered without knowing where. She had entered the academy. They were receiving a neophyte. He had just finished his discourse, and the secretary was about to reply.

"Buy wit, buy wit!" cried the star.

The audience burst into a laugh, the secretary took a pinch of snuff, and sneezed for half an hour. The president called the ushers, and said to them:

"Take away this mad woman, and give her description to the porters, that she may never again be allowed to enter these doors."

The ushers led away the star, and the porters took down her description. The star went away in disgrace; but as she was a faithful star, she determined to fulfil conscientiously the mission which had been entrusted to her.

She therefore went on till she came to a square, in the middle of which stood a bust, and at the end a great arch, entered by twenty steps, which a crowd of people were ascending and descending, appearing very busy, and yet very stupid. The star thought this would be a good place to sell her merchandise, ignorant that the more stupid people are the less they think of having wit. She traversed the crowd, and entered a large hall where three men, clad in black gowns, and coiffed with square black caps, were seated before a desk, and beside the three men, other men in similar costume.

Then she recognized that she had entered a court house, and that the men in black were judges, advocates and attorneys. They were pleading a cause of the highest importance, and the hall was full. The lawyer for the plaintiff, who was small, ugly, slovenly, with a flat face and nose, had just finished his plea, and was drawing his conclusions, so that there was comparative silence at the moment the star entered. She thought the time propitious, and began to cry out:

"Wit, gentlemen; who will buy wit?"

Now it happened that the lawyer who had just spoken, and the one who was about to speak, each saw in this offer an epigram, and, for the first time agreed, accusing the wit merchant of contempt of court. Fortunately, the chief justice was a man of much wit, and contented himself with ordering the star to be conducted from the court room by two police officers. The two officers took the star each by a ray, and led her into the street, saying:

"Be thankful it is no worse; but do not show your face here again."

The poor star went away in confusion; but as she had resolved not to leave the city without selling, she walked on, on, until she arrived at a great square in the middle of which stood a Grecian temple.

"Good," said she, "here is such a temple as I have seen at Athens, and the Athenians had so much wit that they will desire to buy it, at whatever price." Then she began to cry out, "Buy wit, Athenians; buy wit!"

Two men passed along; one had beneath his arm a portfolio, full of coupons of every description, the other held a memorandum book, in which he was making figures as he went along.

"I think she called us Athenians!" said the man with the portfolio.

"It seemed to me I heard something like that," said the man with the memorandum book.

"What did she mean by Athenians?" asked the man with the portfolio.

"It is probably a new company which has just been formed," replied the man with the memorandum book.

"Buy wit, buy wit!" cried the star, following the two speculators.

"Good!" said the man with the portfolio, "another company is about to fail." And they entered the Grecian temple, which was no other than the exchange.

There were buying, selling, paying interest; some were offering Spanish coupons, others personal credit; those liquid gas, these water at one's dwelling; and everybody was trying to find a market for his merchandise. The star passed along through all this tumult, crying at the top of her voice:

"Wit, wit! who will buy wit?"

A stock broker approached her.

"What have you for sale there?" asked he.

"Wit; do you know what it is?"

"I have heard of it."

"You ought to buy some, if it be ever so little, were it only to make acquaintance with it."

"Is it quoted?"

"No."

"Well, then, what do you expect to do with it here?"

And turning his back upon the star, he went in search of another broker, who pointed out the star to a police officer, who demanded her card, and seeing that she had none, conducted her to the commissary of the quarter, who in consideration of her ignorance of the place where she had been found, an ignorance demonstrated by the nature of the merchandise she had attempted to sell there, contented himself with ordering her to quit the city within twenty-four hours. The star was so weary of the affronts she had suffered from the inhabitants of the city, that she took her way to the nearest gate. But at this gate the custom house officer stopped her.

"What have you in this trunk?" said he.

"Wit," replied the star.

"Contraband, contraband," said the officer, who pronounced contraband all merchandise, with which he was not acquainted.

And he arrested the poor star, and condemned her to pay a fine; after which two officers seized the chest, broke the phials, and poured their contents into the gutter, like adulterated wine; while two others taking her by the arm, conducted her out of the city, enjoining it upon her never to set foot there again, under pain of three months' imprisonment.

Meanwhile, the wit was flowing into the gutter. Since that day the ragamuffins who play in the gutter, have had more wit than anybody else.

While star No. 1 was going out of the city at one gate, star No. 2 was entering it by another, crying:

"Virtue, virtue! who will buy virtue?"

The first who heard this singular cry thought themselves mistaken; but the star, full of confidence in her merchandise, proclaimed it so loudly and so freely that even the most incredulous had no longer room for doubt. Those who heard it, shrugged their shoulders, and said to one another:

"It is some mad woman escaped from Charenton."

The rich added, "Houses are built so small now, and we have already so much furniture, where could we put virtue?"

The poor muttered, "What should we do with such valuable merchandise; it is not worth the trouble of making sacrifices to buy it, for no one would believe we possessed it."

The young cavaliers said, "Virtue! we have already two horses, a pack of hounds and a jockey; virtue, in addition, would be a luxury which our parents would not allow us."

The women said, "Good! we have trouble enough to catch husbands without virtue; what should we do with it?"

One woman only approached the merchant. It was a widow.

"How much does virtue cost?" asked he.

"Only the trouble of taking care of it."

"It is too dear," said the widow. And she turned her back on the merchant.

The latter, seeing that the inhabitants of the city would not come to her, resolved to go to them. A door was open, she entered.

"What do you want?" asked in a sharp tone, a tall, thin, bony woman, whose dog, seemingly as surly as herself, began to bark.

"Pardon me, madam," replied the star, humbly, "I am a merchant."

"I do not want anything."

"Everybody wants what I have to sell."

"What is it?"

"Virtue."

"If you sell virtue, you will be glad to buy it?"

"Undoubtedly; why do you ask?"

"Because I have some to sell," said the prude.

"Show it to me; perhaps we can make a bargain."

The prude opened the drawer of a toilet-table, and took from it some virtue, so old, so pieced, so darned, so full of spots, so worm-eaten, that it was impossible to tell what it might have been twenty years before.

"How much will you give me to sell you this virtue?" asked the prude.

"How much will you give me to buy it?" asked the star.

"Impertinent," exclaimed the prude, wresting the virtue from the merchant's hands; but it was so dried up and fragile that it fell to pieces like a spider's web.

This was a bad affair; the prude threatened the merchant with a law suit, and the star ran a great risk of paying a heavy fine, or even going to prison. She then offered the prude an entirely new virtue, instead of that which was worn-out. But the prude made her pack up her merchandise, and though the star had all sorts of virtues, the complainant could not find one to suit her.

The merchant was obliged to offer her an indemnity in money. After a long discussion, the indemnity was fixed upon. The star drew from her pocket three Brabant crowns, and politely requested the prude to give her the change. The prude went out on pretence of seeking it, and returned with the guard.

"Here is a woman who entered my house to rob me," said she; "arrest and take her to prison."

It was in vain that the star explained, the guard, who consisted of foreigners not familiar with the language of the country, took her before the commissary of the police. There she stated the facts with so much simplicity, that the magistrates, who knew among other things that the prude had no virtue to sell, dismissed the officers, and left alone with the accused, asked her what were her means of subsistence. The star opened her chest, and showed her merchandise. The magistrate laughed.

"This is a business," said he, "that the law does not recognize, and if you have no other, I must request you to leave the city. We have our own poor to support."

The poor star cast down her head, and went out of the city, leaving her chest with the commissary of police, who, in a dinner of that body which took place the following New Year's, distributed its contents as presents to his comrades. It is since that time that police officers have been so virtuous.

On the same day, the third star entered the same city. It was she who sold health.

"Health; health for sale!" cried she; "who will buy health?"

"Is it you who have health for sale?" was exclaimed in every direction.

"Yes. Health for sale! health for sale! who will buy?"

In less than a minute, there was a large circle around her; everybody asked for it, everybody wanted it, the poor star did not know whom to listen to first. But most of those who reached out their hands to take the fortunate specific, had long before destroyed health in themselves, and had only the wrecks of bodies; so that health, who had some self-respect, was unwilling to re-enter the places from whence she had been so ignominiously driven.

Others asked, "Is the maintenance of health expensive? What does she eat? What does she drink; and how must we treat her?"

And the star replied, "Health eats with moderation, drinks pure water, goes to bed early and rises with the sun."

Then the people shrugged their shoulders and said:

"This merchant does not recommend her merchandise; one might as well become a hermit as to buy it."

Meanwhile there were two classes of individuals, who said to each other:

"If this merchandise should find a market, we are ruined."

These were the physicians and grave-diggers. We said two classes of individuals; we might have said a single class; for in this city the physicians and grave-diggers have formed a partnership under the title of Messrs. Death & Co.

The grave-diggers and physicians assembled, and resolved, at all hazards, to rid themselves of the merchant and the merchandise. The grave-diggers undertook to take care of the latter, the physicians of the former. A grave-digger seized the chest.

And as the poor star was crying out, "Stop thief! they are stealing my health!" a physician who was standing at a door, said to her:

"Come this way, little one, come this way; it shall be restored to you."

The merchant saw a man of respectable appearance, and well-dressed, though in a somewhat sombre style. She had confidence in him, and accompanied him. He conducted her to the hospital. When the poor star recognized the place, she wished to leave; but the door was shut. She then perceived that she had fallen into a snare.

"Mr. Physician," said she, "have pity on me; I am perfectly well."

"You are mistaken," said he, "you are very sick."

"But I have a good appetite."

"A bad symptom."

"I sleep well."

"A bad symptom."

"I have a clear eye, a calm pulse, a red tongue."

"Bad symptoms, bad symptoms"

And as the star, persisting in her assertions that she was well, would not undress and go to bed, the man in black called four attendants, who undressed her by force, and fastened her into bed.

"Ah," said the physician, "you pretend to sell health, when we sell sickness; instead of proposing a partnership with us, you come to set up in competition; well, you shall see what you shall see."

And he called three of his brethren, and they had what physicians call a consultation, and what the grave-diggers, their partners, call a death-warrant. They decided that the star should be submitted to pathological treatment, the most expeditious of all treatments. First they put her on a low diet. Then they took from her every day, four pallets of blood. At last, under pretence that she slept too much, a somnolence which might bring on apoplexy, they tickled her feet every time she closed her eyes.

Fortunately, in her quality of star, the merchant of health was immortal. She did not die, because she could not; but she was very sick. Fortunately, one night her attendant fell asleep. The poor star succeeded, one by one, in freeing her limbs. Then she crept softly from the bed, opened a window, fastened one of her sheets to the bars, wrapped herself up in the other, and descended into the garden of the hospital.

She climbed over the walls. Once on the other side of this deadly enclosure, the star began to run with all her might. As the hospital was close by the cemetery, people took her, not for an invalid escaping, but for a phantom. The sheet in which she was enveloped confirmed this opinion. So, instead of attempting to stop her, everybody, even the sentinel at the gate of the city, stood aside to let her pass.

"Ah," exclaimed she, "if Jupiter has a second budget of health to send upon earth, he must choose some other merchant than myself."

In our quality of historian of these wonderful events, we are informed that the grave-digger who had stolen the chest from the star, had carried it to his comrades, telling them what it contained. Then, altogether had dug an enormous hole in the form of a grave in the middle of the cemetery, thrown the chest of health into it, and covered it up. So that no one had profited by the good will of Jupiter, except the dead. Since that time the dead have been in better health than the living.

While they were treacherously conducting the star to the hospital, where she would certainly have died, if she had not been immortal, a cry somewhat analogous to that which had just been so unsuccessful, was heard in another quarter of the city. It was the fourth star attempting to dispose of her merchandise, and crying:

"Who wishes for long life? Who would live forever? Buy! buy!"

At this cry the whole city was in commotion. A rich banker, who had a house at Paris, at Frankfort, at New York, at Vienna and at London, ordered his agent to raise as many millions as would be necessary to buy the whole box for himself; but there was a disturbance, people cried out against the monopoly, and hung the banker.

Then the king, who was a good king, declared by an edict that long life should be sold publicly, and that every one, except criminals condemned to death, should have the right to buy it according to his means. Immediately each approached the star with one hand full of money, and the other empty.

"Long life! long life!" said the buyers; "here is money, take my money."

"At your service, gentlemen and ladies," replied the star; "but have you provided yourselves with the merchandise which my three sisters had for sale?"

"And what did your sisters have for sale?" asked the buyers, eager to possess the precious merchandise.

"The first sold wit, the second virtue, and the third health."

"We did not buy any."

"Then," replied the merchant of long life, "I am sorry, for without wit, virtue or health, long life would have no value."

And the merchant closed her chest, refusing to sell her merchandise to those who had not had sense enough to buy that of her three sisters. Her chest closed, she found that she had, without noticing it, a bit of the precious commodity in her hand. It was a small piece of long life, only about three centuries. A parrot was near, on his perch.

"Have you breakfasted, Jacquot?" asked the star.

"No, Margot," replied the parrot.

The star began to laugh, and gave him the piece she held in her hand. The parrot ate it to the last crumb. Since that time parrots have lived three hundred years.

At this moment, the merchant of long life, who was looking at the parrot as it was eating its morsel, heard a great tumult; she distinguished these words:

"Honor! honor! who will buy honor?"

It was the fifth star making her entrance into the city. All those people who had refused to buy wit, virtue and health, and who had just been refused long life, were furious.

At this cry, "Honor! honor! who will buy honor?" they resolved not to purchase honor, but to seize upon it, and if possible, have it for nothing. Consequently, they fell upon the poor star, who, seeing herself thus menaced, opened her box and shook it. A thousand things fell from it. There were crosses, titles, ribbons, golden keys, epaulettes.

Everybody rushed at some article and carried it off, each believing that he had secured honor, while the cunning star had distributed only honors, which are not the same thing. True honor had remained at the bottom of the chest, as hope was left at the bottom of Pandora's box. Since that time honor has been rare and honors common.

Meanwhile, the sixth star arrived, exclaiming, "Pleasures! who wishes to buy pleasures?"

Everybody thronged around her. Those who had secured a good share of honors, wished also to appropriate pleasures, and with their crosses in their button-holes, their titles in their pockets, their ribbons around their necks, their golden keys hanging from their vests, their epaulettes on their shoulders, advanced with the others to have their share of pleasures.

But the others thought these gentlemen abused their good fortune; they called them greedy, there was a riot. They wrested the box from the hands of the star, and it was in turn wrested from their hands. Amid all this confusion, it fell on the pavement, was broken, and pleasures rolled in every direction.

The result was, that, instead of each seizing the pleasure suited to him, they were divided, not according to appropriateness, but by chance. Women had hunting; men, laces and ornaments; the gouty, dancing; the paralytic, walking; the deaf, music; the blind, painting. In short, no one had what he would have chosen; so all were dissatisfied, and censured the merchant. Which seeing, she took to her heels and fled, instead of asking for her money. Since that time pleasures have been unequally distributed.

And when the poor merchant of pleasures, who had just seen her merchandise so boldly pillaged, had gone out of the city, she perceived her seventh sister, the one who was to sell riches, fainting in the ditch beside the road. The merchant of pleasures ran to her, sat down beside her, laid her head on her knee, and applied salts to her nose. But it was not without difficulty that the seventh star was restored to herself. On recovering, she told her story as follows:

"Hardly had I come in sight of the city, hardly had I had the imprudence to say that I had riches for sale, than the men fell upon me, robbed me, and left me for dead, as you have seen."

"But who were these wretches?" asked the other stars, who had approached her.

"Bandits?"

"Vagabonds?"

"Men dying with hunger?"

"They were millionaires, my sisters," sighed the seventh star.

And when the seven stars had returned to heaven, and related to him who had sent them, how they had been treated here below, Jupiter frowned. But Neptune and Pluto burst out a laughing.

"We told you, sire," exclaimed they, "that your idea was a comical one."

And they repeated, in chorus, "O, what a comical idea!" And Jupiter, at last, was of their opinion.

A NOVEL DESIGN.

M. Leon Scott, of Paris, has devised a method for obtaining the vibrations of the human voice expressed in signs, written, so to say, by the voice itself. The human ear is found, as is well known, on examination, to be chiefly composed of a tube ending in the tympanum, an inclined vibrating membrane. It is also well known that sound is transmitted with extraordinary purity and rapidity through tubular conduits, and it would appear that, if there were no disturbing causes, the transmission might be continued to an incredible distance without any diminution of intensity. There is an experiment on record, tried by M. Biot, who, placing himself at one of the extremities of a tubular aqueduct 950 metres in length, carried on a conversation in a low voice with another person situated at the opposite extremity. These facts have been turned to account by M. Scott in the following manner: a tubular conduit receives the vibrations of the human voice at one of its extremities, shaped like a funnel; at the other extremity there is a vibrating membrane, to which a very light pencil or stylus is attached. This stylus rests upon a slip of paper, covered with a coating of lamp-black, and is made by the aid of clockwork to unroll from a cylinder while the person whose voice is to be experimented upon is speaking. The stylus, in receiving the vibrations of the voice through the tube, marks the paper with undulating lines expressing the different inflections. These lines are afterwards indelibly fixed by taking photographic impressions of them.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE PROMISED HOUR.

BY GEORGE P. MORRIS.

The fountains serenade the flowers,
 Upon their silver lute;
 And, nestled in their leafy bowers,
 The forest birds are mute:
 The bright and glittering hosts above
 Unbar the golden gates,
 While nature holds her court of love,
 And for her client waits.
 Then, lady, wake—in beauty rise!
 'Tis now the promised hour,
 When torches kindle in the skies,
 To light thee to thy bower.

The day we dedicate to care—
 To love the witching night!
 For all that's beautiful and fair
 In hours like these unite.
 E'en thus the sweets to flow'rets given—
 The moonlight on the tree—
 And all the bliss of earth and heaven,
 Are mingled, love, in thee.
 Then, lady, wake—in beauty rise!
 'Tis now the promised hour,
 When torches kindle in the skies,
 To light thee to thy bower.

NIGHT ON THE MOUNTAIN.

BY EDGAR L. HAMMOND.

For three days I had been travelling on horseback with a friend, through the hilly region of one of our Northern States, and now we had not more than two-thirds of our journey accomplished. Night was coming on again, when we found ourselves, weary and hungry, at the foot of a huge mountain which had loomed up before us in the distance, long and long since, from the plain below, and which it had seemed that we should never reach. We had passed no human dwelling for hours; not a sign of life lay in sight; the gloom around us grew deeper every moment, the wind moaned and muttered complainingly, and clouds, wild, black and threatening, their edges lurid with the departing sunset, were piled upon the summit of the mountain, warning us of the tempest which was just at hand.

However severe it might prove, we had no shelter from it—at least, no safe one. Behind us lay only the forest we had just traversed; above us, height upon height, arose bristling woods of pine and fir to the very summit of the ascent, hiding the narrow road which led over the mountain. My companion cast a rapid, thorough, quiet glance over the scene before us—at the swift and silent approach of the thunder-clouds.

"This storm seems to be coming on fast," he said. "It will be hardly safe to meet it up yonder. Let us look about us, and seek some shelter. Some hollowed rock, or overhanging crag hereabouts may possibly afford it."

We dismounted, and securing our horses, commenced to explore on either side the broken and declivitous ground, thinly scattered here and there with trees which skirted the base of the mountain. Our search proved of little avail.

"Come—let us push on, then," I said to Harleigh—"let us push on, Walter; we may discover some harboring nook further up, after all. At least we shall be no worse off than we should be here."

We re-mounted, and continued to follow the rocky path, which now began to grow more steep, and at length to wind along almost entirely in shadow, beneath the thick growth of spruce, pine and fir, which clothed gradually with denser luxuriance the mountain-side. As we proceeded, the wind muttered and moaned more wildly, stealing with a low, wailing sound through the trees, that began to bow their tall crests before it, while their heavy branches swayed hither and thither, filling the atmosphere with the most powerful aromatic odor; and heavier, and more threatening grew the masses of cloud that darkened and spread every instant more rapidly over the mountain, and rendered the gloom about almost as deep as that of midnight.

We rode on at our best pace, and the greater part of the time in silence. As yet, no place of shelter presented itself. More and more thickly wooded grew the way on either side the sinuous path we followed, and rank-growing underbrush choked up the narrow intervals between the trees. The darkness became deeper, we could hardly discern our way; more than once our horses stumbled, but we kept on. And now the violence of the wind increased; down the steep descent it rushed, and tore, and raved, shrieking through the tossing branches, that bent and twisted with its might, and swayed before it like reeds. Harleigh's cap was torn from his head, and whirled away in a twinkling. It was not the time to think of stray caps then. We could hardly take care of ourselves; it was impossible to speak—almost to breathe. We were forced to bend our heads almost to our horses' necks, before the irresistible fury of the element that assailed us. Darker and darker it grew. Suddenly there was a blinding flash of light—a burst, a crash of thunder almost deafening in its violence, that rent the atmosphere on every side, and continued for nearly a full minute before its might was spent. Our horses reared instantly, trembling in every joint with fear, and snorting wildly. It was with difficulty we could control, much less pacify the frightened creatures. It was not until the last, long, low, rolling sound had died away in the distance, that we could bring them to their feet again.

And now the rain came sweeping down the mountain side, not in drops, but in sheets—in torrents of water. The density of the foliage overhead partially protected us from this for a time; but as soon as we pressed on, the path became more open, the pines more thinly scattered, and now we were exposed to the full force of the storm. It came in a very deluge, drenching us to the skin in an instant. The lightning shone forth again; flash followed flash, lighting up the gloom, and showing to us the dreariness of the prospect around, while the roar and rattle of the thunder became almost incessant, and our horses in their fright, were nearly ungovernable. It required our strongest effort to keep them under control. I could feel Ali trembling under me—while the lightning showed me his beautiful eyes, dilated and wild with terror, his small ears laid back, and his delicate nostrils quivering. Poor fellow! I patted his arching neck, and smoothed his fine mane, which was streaming with water, and spoke to him in the low, tender, caressing tones that I knew he loved so well. He understood and answered me in his old, affectionate way, but the shrill, tremulous sound he uttered was full of distress, almost human.

The wind no longer raved, but the rain rushed down as incessantly as ever, in a steady torrent sweeping over the mountain-side. For a few moments at this point, the lightning ceased, and the thunder was silent. Suddenly Harleigh uttered a brief ejaculation, and at the same moment Ali gave a sharp, shrill neigh.

"What is it?" I asked of my companion.

"Don't you see? Look up—yonder—"

Even as he spoke, my glance had caught, far distant, the gleam of a light—a single starlight ray, that shone cheerfully through the storm. I comprehended the satisfaction of my friend. This solitary beacon was the light shining from some farm-house window. It scarcely required the impulse we gave to our horses, to urge them onward now. Already they had perceived, by their instantaneous and unerring instinct, that a shelter was near, and joyfully they pressed on to reach it. We rode rapidly along; down rushed the rain more violently than ever; again the lightning flashed, and the thunder burst above us with almost terrific power. The horses shrank and trembled again in every limb—but only pushed on the more eagerly toward the place where our beacon-light was burning.—It seemed very far away, and I almost thought the longer we rode, the more distant it appeared. Still we kept on. At length we lost it. Harleigh, as well as I, had kept it hitherto in view; we had never, either of us, taken our eyes from it, so far. As we lost sight of it, an exclamation broke from the lips of each. But our horses seemed to know better than we; they had their instinct to guide them, which was an advantage over our simple sense of sight, which had just been put so completely at fault.—They seemed to increase their speed, as they proceeded through the storm, with the elements still warring around in unabated fury. Again we entered beneath the trees, and continued our way in almost utter darkness for a long time—a darkness only made visible at times by the faint gleam of the lightning, that barely penetrated the heavy, dense canopy of foliage overhead. And again we emerged from the trees upon the open mountain—to discern, to our infinite relief, the light we had lost, shining just before us, certainly not more than the distance of a quarter of a mile. It was only the trees that had hid it from us. Nearer we rode, and nearer; and presently saw by a bright flash of lightning, that now played less sharply, and for a longer time over the horizon, that we were approaching, as we had supposed, a farm-house, which we perceived to be of ample size, and comfortable appearance, and surrounded by well-fenced fields. It stood on the left of the path we pursued, from which a winding avenue led up to its porch, and there, shining from the windows, from which the curtains had been drawn, was the light which had guided us on. It was with feelings of relief, that we rode up to it from the road; and our horses gave once more a shrill neigh of pleasure as we dismounted before the door.

The sound of their voices seemed to have attracted the attention of the people within, even before we ourselves had taken measures to inform them of our proximity; for even as I raised the heavy brass knocker, in order to summon them, there was a sound within as of some one approaching, a sound audible without, despite the roar and rush of the storm, and the door was opened without delay.

It was evidently the master of the house that made his appearance; a tall, stout, good natured looking man, dressed in homespun, and bearing in his brown hand a lantern, which he swung aloft as he stepped out upon the sill, taking a quick survey of us and our condition, as the rays of its light fell upon us, with our drenched figures in the foreground, and the poor horses with their glossy coats reeking, and their long manes streaming with rain, just behind.

He gave us hardly time to make known our petition for shelter and rest; exclaiming, as he beheld our situation:

"Well, that's too bad, I declare! Soaked through and through, and half dead, I'll be bound—good evening, sirs! Seem to be in a pooty bad plight. Come in—come in! Here you—Jack—Thomas!" and he turned his head towards a door on the left of the passage. "Here, you—somebody call Josh, and take care of these strangers' hosses!"

The door opened, as we stepped across the sill, letting out a stream of light and warmth from the farm kitchen, from which one or two stout lads were issuing. At the same moment there appeared around the corner of the house, a man, also evidently one of the "hands," buttoned up to the chin, and dripping with rain. It was "Josh" himself, a brown-haired, blue-eyed, freckled-faced specimen of humanity, with a broad, good-natured countenance, that expressed infinite pity at the sight of our condition, as he declared sympathizingly, that we were in "consid'able of a bad fix," and forthwith took our horses in hand. He had just been down to "see arter the critters" around the farm; and our poor beasts, drenched and weary, were straightway led off to be cared for by Josh, and share the abundant comforts that were supplied to the creatures belonging to this hospitable dwelling, in the shape of good food and warm shelter.

Meanwhile, our kind host led us into the kitchen, where a bright fire blazed on the broad hearth, and one or two of the help were stirring about; the two lads whom we had noticed, having taken themselves off to help Josh, with an activity and readiness that manifested the general prevalence of the spirit of hospitality which greeted us with such welcome warmth.

We had reason to be grateful for the welcome offered us so freely; but it was with reluctance that we saw the inconvenience to which we were likely to put the kindly dwellers in this hospitable place. We expressed our gratitude to our host for his warm-hearted reception, and begged that we might put him to no further trouble on our account. But he seemed to be ignorant of such a thing as inconvenience. In an instant he had caused the kitchen table to be drawn out, while the two girls proceeded to lay the cloth; and then, lighting a lamp, he signified his desire that we should follow him up stairs to exchange a portion of our wet clothing for some dry.

We demurred from this; merely requesting the favor of permission to dry our garments as we stood before the kitchen fire. But he urged that there was no necessity for this. We followed him, therefore. In our portmanteau, the oil-skin covering of which the rain had failed to penetrate, we had a supply of dry linen. Conducted to a chamber, our host soon supplied us with other articles of attire, chiefly belonging to himself and his sons, whom we found to be the lads who had accompanied Josh to see after the comfort of our beasts. We accepted this provision with thanks, and afterwards returned with our host to the kitchen, where the wet clothing we had removed was hung before the fire to dry, and we were seated before a well-furnished table, and requested cordially to make ourselves "to hum." It scarcely need be said that we did so. An ample meal, added to the glow and warmth surrounding us, dissipated the utter wretchedness of the preceding hour. When we had finished, our host conducted us to a pleasant parlor, on the other side of the passage, which, though no other occupant than ourselves appeared, gave tokens by the feminine belongings—books, sewing and knitting-work piled in a basket, on a workstand by the hearth—of the presence of one of the gentler sex.

This person, we soon found, was the sister of our host, who, he informed us, had gone to see a room prepared for us. She appeared presently, and welcomed us as cordially as though we had been neighbors instead of strangers. The kindness that met us on every side, we could not sufficiently appreciate. An hour passed away in cheerful conversation around the hearth, during which time we gave our warm-hearted host and hostess some information regarding ourselves, and our business in that part of the country, imparting it freely, though they asked us no questions, judging it to be but right that they should know something of the strangers whom they so nobly entertained. We were shortly joined by the farmer's two sons, bright and intelligent lads, of seventeen and nineteen years of age—boys still, though nearly as tall as their father.

No mother joined our fireside group. She was dead. They showed us the next morning where she lay—down under the willows, by the stream that flowed around the mountain-side at the foot of the farm-garden.

A little while, and our number broke up. Harleigh and I retired to the room prepared for us, just as the storm, with its evanescent fury spent, was clearing off to the northwest. The moon was shining soft and fair over the whole landscape before we slept.

The next morning the sun rose gloriously and without a cloud. An early hour saw us ready to resume our way, returning earnest thanks to our worthy entertainers for their hospitality, of which we afterwards took opportunity to express our sense in a more substantial way. Though the first, it was not our last visit there; Harleigh and I have visited the place more than once since, and always met with a welcome as warm as that which greeted us on that memorable night of which I have written.

A VOLUBLE DRUNKEN MAN.

If there be one sight in the world more supremely ridiculous—perhaps even more ridiculous than saddening—it is that of a voluble drunken man. Such an one we saw the other day, reclining on his elbow, within two feet of the end of the wharf, off from which had he fallen he would assuredly have been drowned. On being asked what he was doing there, he replied: "None o' your business; wish I was an Indian!—that's all I hope! My uncle wanted me to go up to Round-Hampton, North-hill brandy-and-water-cure office! Ha! ha! ho! ho! Ketch me at that. Miz'able place—miz'able!" "Where do you live, and what is your business?" "I'm living here, just at present—ha! ha! ha!—and my business is a lawyer." "Do you practise?" "Not at present; did last week; case of assault, with attempt to batter; got beat by a miz'able pet-pet-PET-ifogger!" Poor fellow!—Bee.

PHYSICIANS AS EVIDENCE.

In the trial of Ira Stout, at Rochester, N. Y., for the murder of Mr. Luitles, the testimony of physicians sent by the coroner to examine the prisoner in his cell, for the purpose of obtaining evidence against him, was offered, but objected to, as coming under the statute of New York which excludes the evidence of a physician relative to matters of confidence with his patient. There was a difference of opinion among the judges, as to whether the testimony should be allowed, but the majority were for a liberal construction of the law, and sustained the objection, on the ground that the prisoner had reason to believe that the physicians came to him to administer for his relief, and that therefore the district attorney was not at liberty to prove by them the condition in which they found him.

THINK OF IT!

How many of both sexes, from overloading their brains, and underworking their bodies, have sunk prematurely into their graves! How many have become tenants of lunatic asylums! How many the victims of chronic dyspepsia, and all manner of nervous disorders! What is the value of any conceivable amount of learning to him whose frame has become enfeebled and broken down by the intense and protracted labor of acquiring it? If the head has become the veriest storehouse of knowledge, of what use is it to the person, whose fingers are too feeble to turn the key! It is the bow of Ulysses, in the hands of the suitors.—Medical Journal.

A DISPUTE BETWEEN MEN OF HONOR.

The pleasant satirical "Pickwick papers" furnish the following amusing description of a dispute between two young gentlemen of honor, which seems to have been conducted with much spirit on both sides.

The belligerents vented their feelings of mutual contempt for some time in a variety of frownings and sneerings, until at last, the scorbatic youth felt it necessary to come to a more explicit understanding on the matter, when the following clear understanding took place.

"Sawyer," said the scorbatic youth, in a loud voice.

"Well, Noddy," replied Mr. Bob Sawyer.

"I should be very sorry, Sawyer," said Mr. Noddy, "to create any unpleasantness at my friend's table, and much less at yours, Sawyer—very; but I must take this opportunity of informing Mr. Gunter that he is no gentleman."

"And I should be very sorry, Sawyer, to create any disturbance in the street in which you reside," said Mr. Gunter, "but I'm afraid I shall be under the necessity of alarming the neighbors by throwing the person who has just spoken out of the window."

"What do you mean by that?" inquired Mr. Noddy.

"What I say," replied Mr. Gunter.

"I should like to see you do it, sir," said Mr. Noddy.

"You shall feel me do it in about half a minute, sir," replied Mr. Gunter.

"I request that you'll favor me with your card, sir?" said Mr. Noddy.

"I'll do nothing of the kind, sir," replied Mr. Gunter.

"Why not, sir?" inquired Mr. Noddy.

"Because you'll stick it up over your chimney-piece, and delude your visitors into the false belief that a gentleman has been to see you, sir," replied Gunter.

"A friend of mine shall wait on you in the morning," said Mr. Noddy.

"Sir, I'm very much obliged to you for the caution, and I'll leave particular directions with the servants to lock up the spoons," replied Mr. Gunter.

At this point the remainder of the guests interposed, and remonstrated with both parties on the impropriety of their conduct, on which Mr. Noddy begged to state that his father was quite as respectable as Mr. Gunter's father, and that his father's son was as good a man as Mr. Gunter, any day in the week.

As this announcement seemed the prelude to a re-commencement of the dispute, there was another interference on the part of the company; and a vast quantity of talking and clamoring ensued, in the course of which Mr. Noddy gradually allowed his feelings to overpower him, and professed that he had ever entertained a devoted personal attachment toward Mr. Gunter. To this Mr. Gunter replied, that, upon the whole, he rather preferred Mr. Noddy to his own brother. On hearing which admission, Mr. Noddy magnanimously rose from his seat, and proffered his hand to Mr. Gunter. Mr. Gunter grasped it with affecting fervor; and everybody said that the dispute had been conducted in a manner which was highly honorable to both parties.

GRIEF AND SMILES.

BY MRS. BROWNING.

I have a smiling face, she said,
I have a jest for all I meet,
I have a garland for my head,
And all its flowers are sweet,—
And so you call me gay, she said.

Grief taught to me this smile, she said,
And Wrong did teach this jesting bold;
These flowers were plucked from garden-bed
While a death chime was tolled—
And what now will you say?—she said.

Behind no prison gate, she said,
Which slurs the sunshine half a mile,
Are captives so uncomfortable,
As souls behind a smile.
God's pity let us pray, she said.

TURNING THE TABLES:

—OR,—

HAPPY IN SPITE OF ONE'S TEETH.

A LOVE TEST FOR THE LADIES.

BY MRS. H. MARION STEPHENS.

"WELL; and in the next place?"

"I am ashamed to own it, even to you, Laura—certainly, to any other person the tortures of the inquisition couldn't wring it from me—Laura, I am five years older than William Lawton."

"Most enormous discrepancy in age. I would laugh at you, only you look so grave and serious. Why, my husband is all of twenty years older than I am, and where will you find a happier couple?"

"Ay, but the difference—"

"The difference between tweedle dum and tweedle dee. I thought you had too much mind of your own to dwell upon any such subject as that."

"I can't help it; five years is not much now, but fifteen or twenty years hence, when he will be in the very prime and vigor of his manhood, and I—ugh! I shudder to think of it. If the difference was on his side, if he was ten, fifteen, or even twenty years my senior, I should rather like it. I think under any and every circumstance a man should have the advantage of his wife in point of years. There are certain experiences and phases in a man's life which must be encountered before he is prepared to be a good and faithful husband. Say what they like of the temptations of woman, those of man are ten to her one. Look at the unequal matches that have come under our own observation. There are the Moretons, for instance—a reflex of my future, should I be mad enough to marry William Lawton—Mr. Moreton, in the very strength and vigor of his manhood, fond of excitement, fond of gaiety, fond of society—the very life of any company he may chance to be in—see the admiration he excites; see how he is courted and fêted, and petted by women of all grades and ages; why they seem to ignore the very existence of a wife's claims upon his time and affections, and all because she happens to be old and broken down, and too feeble to enjoy the style of boisterous amusements which he seems to relish. Why, Laura, if I was in that woman's place I should grow mad—I should grow wicked—I should do something horrible. It is hard enough to bear now, William's sometimes deferential attentions to other women—hard enough when I have no claim upon them—but if he was my husband I could not bear them. I must have all or nothing; so you see yourself how impossible it is that I should ever become the wife of William Lawton."

"You are making mountains out of molehills, Mary; trying to be frightened at shadows. What you say about the Moretons might happen to the best regulated of matches. It is the difference in their dispositions, not in their ages. Mr. Moreton, as you say, is full of happy, wholesome, ardent life; Mrs. Moreton is miserably jealous, passes her whole spare time in inventing torments for him, and in trying to defeat his schemes for happiness. She is one of the, fortunately, few specimens of our sex who make a man disgusted with the word home. I have known them from their earliest marriage. I have watched the pertinacity with which he waited upon his wife's requirements, seen how he tried to win her into a love for his pleasures, and failing in that, to assimilate himself to hers; but finding everything unavailing, that the harder he tried to please her, the further he was from his purpose, he became tired at last and determined, at least, to please himself. If it were possible for us to look down through all the shams of life, into the secret heart, we should find the history of the Moretons no isolated one. But come, we have been talking from externals, let us talk from the heart; do you love William Lawton?"

"Laura, Laura, you are presuming too far, even for an intimate friend; that is my secret."

"O, very well, very well. I am your friend, too sincerely your friend to look upon you risking your happiness for a shadow, without giving my word of warning. I am older than you, Mary, and from circumstances which it is not necessary to name, have had large experience of life. Will liam Lawton loves you now, deeply and well. It may not be his first love; most men of his age have had their apprenticeship to the tender passion; but if that love was met by you with a love as strong, as fond and as tender, if it was nurtured and cherished as man's love should be nurtured and cherished, it would be his last. I say this now, for it is the last time I shall ever speak to you upon the subject. Think upon it well, for the happiness of two lives depends upon your decision."

Her good friend was gone, and Mary Stetson was alone. In another parlor in the same hotel where Mary Stetson made it her home, sat a young man, evidently suffering greatly from that very uncomfortable and by no means desirable visitor, impatience. And a very handsome young man he was too, you would see that at once. He had splendid eyes; large, frank, wide-open eyes, that were gray when sunlight warmed them, and black by gaslight; eyes that you would have trusted, and have been willing to swear by, if occasion required it, and that you would have known were an index to a true and manly heart. There was a shadow in them now, and a wrinkle or two in the full, broad brow, which was not usually to be found there. He was very restless, too, seeming to have neither eyes nor ears for anything but a certain door leading into the great hall, which he evidently was anxious to see open.

"What a time she has been," he muttered to himself, flinging away the book he was pretending to read. "I could have done the business in half the time, got either a 'yes' or 'no,' confound it all, when women do get together—O, here you are, at last. Well?"

"Not too well, William," replied his visitor, dropping pettishly upon a lounge. "I have done the best I could for you, but she is so ridiculously sensitive to her age. Thirty, well it is no joking matter, but as I tell her, if you don't find any fault, I don't see why she need."

"Thirty? She don't begin to look so old as that. But what has that to do with it? She's handsome, clever, talented; all that a man need look for in a wife; besides, I love her, and deny it as she may, she loves me. O, you needn't smile, my vanity, you think it; you needn't. A man must be very stupid, and very unobservant if he do not find some method to sound the heart he prizes, to determine whether a woman loves him, or merely likes him. I have sounded her heart. I know there is a something in the way, some obstacle, without which, she would be most fond, most tender, most true. A wife to help and encourage her husband, to be a companion, instead of a petted doll baby—a woman who, knowing herself to be in the right, would have strength enough of purpose to contest her opinions, and stick to them through thick and thin. That's the sort of woman I want for a wife. I don't expect an angel, and as for a few years, more or less—"

"If you will only argue with her in that way."

"I will. There is nothing else for it. Perhaps when she knows I am aware of her objection, I can laugh her out of it. I'll go now; she is in her parlor?"

"I left her there. Success to you."

"I say, can't you fling an old shoe after me, for luck? They say that's certain to bring success."

While Mrs. Fleurie and William Lawton, for he it was, as of course the reader is aware, were thus engaged in discussing Mary Stetson, she sat where her friend had left her, engrossed in the most perplexing thought.

Mary Stetson was an orphan, rich, well-born, highly educated, and a star in the highest circles of fashion. She was not by any means a beauty, yet her stately figure, her commanding presence, and a certain intellectual something, more easily understood than described, gave her a reputation for beauty which the real connoisseur would fail to detect. Her position in society, together with an unusual fascination of manner, made her many admirers, nor must it be supposed that she had reached the age of thirty, without formal proposals for her heart and hand. They were all rejected, of course, else I should not now be writing her haps and mishaps. Then came William Lawton to the city, and singularly enough, to board at the same hotel with herself. His position as a young lawyer of uncommon ability, his high breeding, and indisputable reputation, together with his handsome face and form, very shortly interested the select circle in which Mary Stetson moved, to an unusual degree. As Mrs. Fleurie used to say, more pretty girls were ready to fall at his feet or into his arms, if he would only open them wide enough, than you could shake a stick at; and it wasn't the girls alone— young widows, rich, elegant, and revelling in the best of this world's treasures, were equally emulous of sharing their substance with the handsome young lawyer. He was a sensible man, or all this devotion would in the end have made a fop of him. Mary Stetson was by no means the least to admire him. He was just the style of person she had often sought, but never found. He was so noble in principle, so manly in sentiment, not at all egotistic, as his great talent might have warranted him in being, but open, frank, fearless in argument, never thinking it beneath his manhood to acknowledge an error if he discovered himself to be in one. All of this fed the admiration of Miss Stetson, until, after the companionship of two pleasant years, she made the discovery that William Lawton was considerably more to her warm woman's heart than a younger brother, the footing upon which they had stood. Then came the struggle. She would die before William should know she had given him her heart; ay, given it him unsolicited, there was the greater shame. What did she do? Why just what you or I, dear lady, would not have done unless we wanted to show our hand and call the game. Where she had been frank, tender and sisterly, she grew as cold as if she was engaged by contract to do the freezing for the whole city; where she had been accustomed to meet him with a warm clasping of heart and hand, she now recognized him only by the stately of her stately courtesies. William Lawton was not the man to let this state of things continue long. He insisted upon seeing her alone, and having accomplished that almost impossible feat, burst into such a torrent of eloquence, impulse and love, that before he left her, drawing her to him, and looking through her eyes straight down into her betrayed heart, he won a womanly confession, which, weak as it was, called forth from him many an answering vow, and quite as many kisses as there was any occasion for under the circumstances. A happier man never lived, for the next few weeks, than was William Lawton. He was an engaged man—engaged to the only woman he could ever hope to love, and never was astonishment more apparent than when his betrothed came to him with tears in her eyes, begging him to cancel the engagement. It was her thirtieth birthday. Twenty-nine had not seemed so terrible many years; but thirty! the best of a woman's life was gone at thirty. She dwelt upon it, until it became a monomania with her, yet her sense of the ridiculous was so strong that she dared not tell him. There was an obstacle to their union—that was the only consolation she would give him. Thus matters stood when he enlisted Mary's friend, Mrs. Fleurie, in his behalf. The reader already knows the result of her mission.

When William Lawton reached Mary's parlor, he found the door slightly ajar, sufficiently so as to admit of his seeing without being seen. He had no intention of listening, he was too much of a man for that; but the hope which had held him up in Mrs. Fleurie's presence, deserted him as he approached his sweetheart's presence.

Mary had risen, and was standing at the pier glass, gazing intently upon her face. Not a wrinkle, not the faintest semblance of a crow's-foot, not the smallest apology for a silver thread among her dark braids. The fresh, earnest face she gazed upon might have been twenty instead of thirty, so smooth and unworn as it was. And well it might be fresh. Until now, no great emotion had swept the blue veins into knots on that fair forehead; no scathing passion had left its place upon that rounded cheek.

"Still," she murmured in her determination to be unhappy, "it might have been. Shall I, old woman that I am, chain his bright, fresh manhood to my age and wrinkles? It would be all very well now, but ten years hence he would despise me; he would accuse me, and with reason, of using my extra judgment to fascinate his reason."

"No, no, no! By heaven you wrong me. What are years to love? Because you happened by accident to be born a few years before me, I must suffer for it. O, Mary! my Mary! don't, don't let any such foolish impression part us. Trust me—"

But "my Mary" was not in a trusting humor. It isn't the pleasantest thing in the world to be caught bemoaning our own deficiencies, even by a stranger; what must it be then when one's own lover is the intruder?

"Well, sir?" she said, looking straight into his face, her own blazing with indignation.

"Don't, Mary; I can't talk to you when you look like that. I was a listener by accident, not by design. You know what I would say—that nothing ever could make me lose my respect, my dear love for you."

"Your love! The love of a boy for his first plaything. A penny whistle would reconcile you to my loss. Try it."

When Mary looked up again, the room was empty, and her lover gone.

"Well, I have done it now," she muttered, discontentedly. "He never will come back. I had no business to ridicule him, at any rate. He loves me—I am sure of that—and O, if I could only overcome this horrible idea of being older than he, of being a laughing stock hereafter, as Mrs. Moreton is, I should love him more dearly I think than ever woman loved man. I will try. I will even ask him to forgive me for my rudeness. If he loves me as he says he does, one little transgression won't turn his heart." And so talking, while preparing herself for tea, she quite reasoned herself into the belief that all would yet end for the best.

Can any of my lady readers fancy for a moment why Mary Stetson took especial and peculiar pleasure in getting herself up on the most tasteful and elegant scale for this particular night's tea? Or why, now that she had irrevocably offended her lover, in fact so deeply offended him that only humiliating concession could win back his allegiance, that she felt happier, and more relieved in mind than she had for many previous months? I am afraid, intellectual and self-centred as she was, there was a small bit of the coquettish element in her incomparable nature.

"That will do, Jane; you can leave me."

Do! I should think it would do. Look at her as she stands there, training the last, and indeed only ringlet, through a refractory braid, that it may fall gracefully around her dainty little ear. How sweetly that low-cut lining lilac tissue harmonizes with the soft bloom on cheek and lip. Through the fleecy net work of tissue you can just see the rising and falling of a bust white as Parian marble. Don't mistake me. Mary Stetson is a pure, good, true woman. She would be the last to resort to indelicate means for the accomplishment of her purposes, but she cannot control the heart-throbs, whose pulsations leap up into light with every breath. Tiers of cloud-like flounces waving with every breeze add new grace to her willowy form, giving it a freshness and piquancy not at all to be looked for in one of her much-bemoaned years. Even herself, standing there counting up the charms her mirror presented, began to wonder what had become of the last ten years which had shone so formidably from her anxious face only twenty-four hours ago.

The sudden sounding of the gong warned her that time was up for reverie, and giving a last twirl to the refractory ringlet, she left her room for the supper table. A murmur of admiration reached her ear, as unattended, yet sufficient for herself, she swept gracefully down the room to where an obsequious waiter stood, chair in hand, ready to serve her. For the first time in many months, Lawton's chair at her side was vacant. A fresh, ringing laugh, so out of place at that elegant and aristocratic board, attracted, not alone her attention, but the attention of every person present. And O, horror of horrors! by the side of the brightest, gayest, blithest little specimen of blonde beauty that eye ever saw or heart ever dreamed of, sat the truant lover, William Lawton. For one half moment Miss Stetson lost her self possession; it was but for a half moment. Then, coolly and critically surveying the pretty stranger, she continued her supper as if nothing had happened.

I do not, however, judging from my own experiences of youthful folly, think Miss Stetson relished the piquancy of that gay, girlish laugh so greatly as the rest of the boarders seemed to. It was so infectious, too, brimming over into the midst of that august crowd like a bubbling fountain into a shadowed lake. Everybody seemed to like it, and to catch it up in crisp gushes; dignity wilted down under it like an icicle under a sunbeam; staid matrons unbent from their frosty stateliness, and gave signs of human animation, while young ladies, girls who had been trained to subdue every approach of youthful effervescence, only waited the chance for an introduction, that they too might for once in their lives indulge in a good lung-reviving, heart-cheering laugh. They were not long in accomplishing their aim—youth and innocence are passports anywhere—and it was not long before Nettie Gray became the most popular of all the popular young belles at the far-famed W—— House. Sweet Nettie Gray! she is married now, and her "by-low-baby-bunting" is considered a marvel of musical excellence by the sturdy pioneer who calls her "wife;" but even at this late day, there is more than one disconsolate old bachelor in Boston who has a vivid and melancholy remembrance of the beautiful blonde who for one brief month glittered, the brightest sunbeam that ever shone, across their now desolate track.

Nettie was no coquette, but she did so like that everybody should love her. Having no mother living, and often out of the jurisdiction of her father, she had brought herself up, and now stood upon the bridge which parts the child from the woman, with just as few faults in her nature as could be found in that of the best regulated and most carefully educated girl. Her life had been all sunshine, and only that her natural instincts were of the purest and most sensitive kind, she must have been irretrievably spoiled by the injudicious petting of all connected with her. When tea was over, Mary learned all there was to know from Mrs. Fleurie, one of those penny-post women, although a harmless one of the sort, of whom every popular hotel has a specimen. She was really fond of Mary, and had a most exalted opinion of William Lawton, and it annoyed her beyond measure to see her friend rejecting the happiness she knew was so desirable for her to obtain.

"Now you'll see," she exclaimed, rising in a pet from the sofa, after a long explanation regarding Nettie Gray.

"Nettie Gray is just as sweet as a pink; so fresh, so unaffected—you can see that—there is no acting about her. And do you think William Lawton hasn't eyes like other men; and senses to be entranced, and reason to be influenced? Why even I, a woman, am half infatuated with her. If you could only have seen her in the parlor this evening, after tea, you wouldn't be quite so certain of Master Lawton's allegiance to you. And she, with her fresh, country face, and country manners, among all those worldly and artificial women—why, I could think of nothing but a single rosebud in a bouquet of dahlias."

"You are enthusiastic."

"I am more than that—I am truthful. The gentlemen are perfectly infatuated with her. When I came out, not one of them had left the parlor. You would have thought she had known them all her life the way she chatters with them."

"Rather bold, I should think, for a young girl."

"Not a bit of it. There's the charm. A gentleman would as soon think of taking a liberty with his friend's wife or sister, as with her. She bears the word 'innocence' in every feature of her lovely face. Why the man would be a fiend who could think an impure thought with those clear, frank eyes looking straight up into his face."

"Well, if you won't look out for your own interest, I can't; so there."

"But if Mr. Lawton's fancy has been taken by a fresh, young—"

"Young! bah! I'm sick of it. You ought to have a strait jacket, to be made to secure your own happiness in spite of your teeth. I'm not going to speak to you again of William Lawton. I'm sorry for him; as for you, you deserved to lose him, and you will, too, if you don't change your tactics."

Mrs. Fleurie flaunted out of the room in a violent rage. This was the end of her match-making, was it; and between the most eligible parties in the country? She didn't care if he did make a match with little Nettie Gray; only Nettie could only cling to him, she couldn't strengthen him as Miss Stetson could. William Lawton met her at her parlor door, his face in a perfect flush of excitement.

"Bad," thought Mrs. Fleurie, but she only said, "How came you acquainted with Nettie?"

"She is my cousin; her mother and my mother were sisters. It wouldn't be a bad match, eh? Only her father don't like the idea of cousins marrying."

"I should think not. And Miss Stetson?"

"I am off in that quarter—tired, worn out. But say, isn't Nettie a beauty?"

"You are not sincere, William Lawton; you are talking merely for talk's sake. Come, I see by your face, there is something to tell. What is it? Haven't I always been your friend?"

"Yes, but—"

"Not a very successful one, eh?"

"Well, then, the matter stands just here. I need not tell you how long and how well I have loved Mary Stetson. My protracted siege has shown that. I am going to try once more, and for the last time. If I do not succeed, I will marry Nettie Gray, cousin or no cousin. Now what I want of you is to keep my secret. Don't let Mary know that Nettie is my cousin; make her think I am desperately smitten with her, and then if she has a woman's heart, she will be sure to show it."

"Isn't that a dangerous experiment? You know how severe she is upon all deception."

"I can't help it. It is the last chance; the forlorn hope, if I lose that, go all. I'll try no more. I am ashamed of my manhood, as it is."

"No man need ever be ashamed of loving a good woman, even if the love is not returned. However, I'll do my best for you."

William went at once from Mrs. Fleurie to Miss Stetson; but the latter lady received him with such haughty disdain, such cold, cutting sarcasm that his visit was of the shortest possible duration. All that long evening, and for many evenings after, soft gushes of song, or wilder bursts of laughter came in detached echoes to the lonely chamber of Mary Stetson. In vain Mrs. Fleurie stormed and fretted, in vain depicted to her the progress her lover was making in Miss Nettie's affection—she would not leave her solitude. No, the society was too young for her; she had no taste for such frivolity. She did not believe in Mrs. Fleurie's declaration that William Lawton had eyes and ears only for Nettie.

"He has loved me," she used to say, in extenuation of her doubts. "He has loved me; he would never be satisfied with the companionship of that frivolous child. They are trying to delude me, but I will turn the tables on them yet."

But the weeks went on, and all at once came a shock which sent the blood from her face back upon her heart. William Lawton and Nettie Gray were to be married. No warning of the shock, no preparation for the great disclosure. Lawton came to her himself, leading by the hand his tiny bit of a betrothed. She could recognize him now; she could be his friend, now that he had placed far away all chance to annoy her by his love. She could afford to be his companion again, allowing him to sit by her and read to her as he used to when he so vainly annoyed her by an unwelcome suit.

"But your betrothed (with a scornful curl of the lip), wont she be jealous?"

"O, dear, no," the little midget answering for herself, "not in the least. He told me how it would be from the first. Of course, if you loved him—"

"Nettie! Nettie!"

"Well, don't snub me before her. I believe you do it on purpose to make her think you can do as you please with me. O, what a love of a picture! Is that you?"

"It was." Miss Stetson's voice was so stern and severe that Nettie turned to look at her.

"I didn't annoy you, I hope. I do things sometimes which are not polite, because I don't know any better. I didn't expect it was like you now. I could see you were a good deal older—"

"Nettie!"

"Do let me be. I think you have taken a pinch out of my arm. If that's loving, I beg to be excused. That isn't the way he acts when he is alone with me. I'd tire of him short metre if it was. I'm not used to be scolded, and so he'll find when I'm his wife. If you've got over it—over his jilting you for me, I mean—you'll come and see us married."

Miss Stetson's face was livid with passion. With an impetuous wave of the hand, and a stamp of the pretty foot, she ordered them from the room. The last sound she caught, was, "Well, she's a polite one, I don't think;" but if she could have caught the musical laugh, half smothered in a pocket handkerchief as it was, her ideas of sudden infatuations would have been wonderfully brightened.

"He to marry that simpering chit of a girl. He that has loved me. That he never shall and I live to see it. But how is it to be accomplished? I cannot change my course all at once, and there are now only ten days to the wedding. What can William be thinking of? Why he would be disgusted with her in a week. And this is the fresh country girl who is turning the heads of all the men in the house. Fool that I have been; I'll dress for the parlor; I will show them the difference between a silly, simpering country girl, and a woman of mind and education. No, it is not egotism, it is no shame to acknowledge one's own talent. Yes, I will give him a chance to judge between her and me."

Miss Stetson was as good as her word, but somehow she seldom came in contact with Nettie Gray. There had been a new arrival, a young man with whom she seemed wonderfully intimate, and who appropriated a large share of her society. After a few evenings, matters took their old course, and William Lawton was once more a privileged visitor in Miss Stetson's parlor. But the evening for his marriage with Nettie was fast approaching, and as yet no further explanations had been vouchsafed on either side, than that it was to be so, and that no mortal power could prevent it.

"If you had only shown me your heart before it was too late, Mary, all this anguish might have been spared."

I don't know what was the answer of Mary; I only know that when her woman's heart had given way sufficiently for her to hide her tears on his bosom, the door opened, and Miss Nettie stalked in, in tears and disordered tresses. She looked very like as if she had been indulging in a good cry on somebody's bosom.

"I can't stand it, and I don't see why I should. I love him too well to lose him, and if this isn't cut right off just where it is, it will be worse for us all, now mind." Nettie, sobbing with every word, was not too intelligible, but Mary was at no loss to understand what her words aimed at.

"You love him! you—a bread-and-butter school girl—a childish, capricious, uninformed pet, who knows just enough to cry for a lost toy. Why, I love him more in one moment than you could in all the strength of your years. Ay, I don't mind saying here, or anywhere, in fact, I love him; I might never have known how well, but for this fatal, this ridiculous engagement."

"Yes, that was what he said, but I don't see as it is one bit nearer than it was before; and, good gracious! in two days we are to be married; and I do believe he will marry me."

"He mustn't."

"That's just—"

"I say he mustn't. You are not fitted for each other. You are no companion for him. You would be unhappy, and so would he. Unhappy!—yes, miserable—miserable."

"What are you talking about?"

"I know you like him now—any young girl would like him—but in a month, you'll forget such a person ever lived."

"You had better not tell my Harry so, for he is jealous now as he can live; besides, he wouldn't believe anyhow."

"Your Harry?"

"Yes; why, yes—that's what the trouble is all about. O, you needn't make me any signs, Mr. Lawton; the secret has either got to come out, or my head has got to come off, one or the other. O, Harry is so ferociously angry."

"I don't understand—"

"Of course you don't; but you have got to understand, and then if you don't strike while the iron's hot, I'm not to blame. You see, William is my cousin; but Harry says cousins are just as bad as anybody else. Well, he sent for me, promising to take the best of care of me, and when I got here, what should he tell me, but that I was to pretend being in love with him, just to try a certain other lady whom he believed loved him, and whom he loved best of anything else in the world? Well, it was all very fine for a time; but you was as cool as a cucumber—didn't give in a grain, no matter how hard he flirted. But the zest of the story is, Harry came home just in the midst of it, and to his great consternation, found me engaged, positively engaged to another—no matter if that other was my cousin—you must own it looked rather dark."

"Well—yes—but—"

"But the worst is to come. I had made it all right with Harry; he saw the joke, and enjoyed it heartily as any one; he didn't enjoy it long, for this nice cousin of mine, in one of his tantrums, came rushing in where I was sitting at the piano, and before I knew what he was about, kissed me—actually kissed me. I shouldn't have minded that, but Harry caught him at it. Gracious! but wasn't there a scene—"

"Nettie, Nettie, you have done for me."

"I can't help it; if I hadn't, Harry would have done for me. It was all on your account—the kiss; he thought you were giving in—softening like, and he had hopes you would come to before the wedding day. There, the mischief is out; you may as well commence killing me as soon as possible. O, dear, how white! O, William, catch her—she is fainting!"

But Miss Stetson was not fainting. For a moment, the consciousness of the deception which William had practised upon her, aroused all the indignation of her nature; but the next, love grew triumphant. She thought of all he had borne for her, her rudeness, her exacting caprice, and the intolerant mania which had so nearly separated them.

"Come," said Nettie, smiling through the traces of her tears, "decide quickly; I'm not so sure I won't marry him now if you continue obstinate. Good gracious, there's Harry now, walking past your door. Do say yes. Come, I've tried to make you happy, in spite of your teeth, as Mrs. Fleurie says, and Harry never will forgive that kiss unless he knows for a certainty it was meant for some one else."

"Yes, come, Mary; we all know your heart says yes."

"You, too, Mrs. Fleurie?"

"Yes, me, too. Confess we have rather turned the tables on you."

"O, dear, Harry looks very savage."

"Well, then, you don't quite deserve being forgiven all at once, William; but I suppose it is all for the best."

"Yes, indeed, all for the best."

"I can only say you shall never regret your confidence in me, if you should live to the age of—"

"No more of that, William, if you love me."

"It is all right, Harry; come in. All friends here. You needn't be afraid of him; he is a bluff sort of a fellow, but perfectly harmless unless he's jealous. Instead of my marrying Cousin William, day after to-morrow, we will all be married together, and go to the Falls for a honey moon."

"Shall it be so, Mary?"

"I resign my commission. I am out-generalled. Do with me as you think best; I will leave the decision to Mrs. Fleurie."

"To me? Good! Then I order the double wedding to take place soon as possible, before somebody I could name changes her mind. You can't say now that I haven't made you happy in spite of your teeth."

And so she had. William Lawton and Mary Stetson have been married ten years, and Mary is forty; but to see the happy, contented face, shining forever in her husband's home, you would never think of pronouncing her more than thirty.

SINGULAR DISCOVERY IN HORTICULTURE.

In a late number of the Emporio Italiano, a description is given of the discovery of a new process by an Italian florist in Aricia, by which it is asserted that delightful fragrance may be bestowed upon plants naturally inodorous. In order to attain this object the roots are covered with fragrant manures. Thus with a decoction of roses the discoverer has been enabled to give the rhododendron the perfect fragrance of the rose. In order to secure a successful result, it is necessary to treat the seeds of the plant to which it is desired to give fragrance. They are steeped two or three days in the required essence, then dried in the shade, and shortly afterwards are sown. If it is desired to change the natural odor of the plant for one more agreeable or more desirable, the strength of the essence is doubled or tripled, and a change must be made in the nutrition of the plant. In order to make the artificial odor permanent, the plant must be sprinkled and dampened with the essence several days in the spring for two or three years. And thus, also, it is said, a gardener may at his pleasure cause different plants or trees to share their odors with each other, by boring through the stalk, or trunk, or root, an opening into which to pour the fragrant ingredients.

LIFE'S DAY.

BY G. CHAUNCEY BURE.

O, come in life's MORNING,
Be glad at the dawning,
Why list to the warning
Of time's future storms?

The NOONTIME approaches!
Its sorrow encroaches,
On hearts it reproaches
With useless alarms.

The EVENING is falling;
Old age is appalling—
Eternity calling,
How solemn and loud!

NIGHT! night is oppressing!
Poor life is distressing,
God, grant us thy blessing,
For thou art our aid.

THE IRON MASK.

BY JAMES COGSWELL.

THE morning of the twenty-eighth of May, 1686, rose bright and lovely, on the green hills of France, shedding the splendor of a new-born summer over her fair fields and pleasant vineyards. The pretty isle of St. Marguerite lay like an emerald on the blue waters, and its one castellated tower was flooded with sunshine. A boat lay at the landing-place, almost in the very shadow of the tower, the wet oars gleaming like silver, and its clean, white deck sprinkled here and there with the spray.

The moment she touched the rocks, three men stepped from her to the rude stairs that were cut in the low sea wall that surrounded the island, and made their way to the tower. One of these men was well known to the boatmen, as Monsieur de Saint Mars, the governor of the castle of Pignerol, from whence the little vessel had brought him and his companions to St. Marguerite, as governor of the tower. The others were unknown. One of them was of a most noble and commanding figure, the regal dignity of which would have distinguished him in the most humble dress. But this man wore a kingly garb, rich and magnificent enough for an especial court costume. The finest linen and the most superb lace were visible, and his buttons were all of the finest gold, with the letter M. engraved on each. A short cloak fastened at the throat by a diamond clasp, protected him from the fresh breeze from the water. The one ungloved hand, soft and fine as a lady's, though somewhat brown in color, wore an immense diamond ring upon the third finger. The hair, long and wavy, was of a bright chestnut hue, and fell down upon the collar of a rich Genoa velvet that adorned his cloak.

But the face belonging to this noble looking figure was scrupulously concealed by a black velvet mask, which left not even the space between the cheek and ear visible. It was evident that M. de Saint Mars, although he exhibited the most profound respect towards this personage, was narrowly watching him, and continued to do so, until they were safe in the tower of St. Marguerite.

Here, a magnificent apartment, furnished with every convenience, and arranged with the utmost taste, awaited the prisoner—for prisoner he must surely be, who required such unceasing watch and guard. Books, flowering shrubs and paintings adorned the apartment, and a splendid guitar lay on the table, showing that he was no common prisoner. The third of these persons was evidently only a servant to the prisoner, and while busy about his person, was subjected to the same restraint and confinement; for after a respectful inquiry whether the masked person was comfortable and pleased with his new situation, M. de Saint Mars left the room, locking the door upon both. After the servant had performed his required services, he rang a silver bell, and was let out by the governor himself, but never allowed to leave the castle, or to have communication with any person within it, save Saint Mars.

Louis XIII., the son of Henry IV. and Maria de Medici, ascended the throne of France, in 1610, after the murder of his father. His mother was declared regent, and guardian to her son; but forming a party for herself, and allying herself with Spain, France was soon made the seat of dissension and civil disturbances, and she was banished. In the height of these disturbances, Louis married a Spanish princess. There was but one bar to the happiness of this union, and this was, year after year it remained childless.

In one of the excursions of the king to the mountains, he entered into conversation with two herdsmen, whose wisdom, and the simplicity of their manners, deeply engaged his attention. Finding that they possessed some knowledge of astrology, Louis invited them to give him some proof of their powers, which he would realize in his own person. They complied, by predicting that to the throne of France within the year, would be born twin-heirs, who would occasion civil wars which would convulse the kingdom.

Long and deeply, Louis pondered on this strange and unlikely prediction. His union with the queen had already lasted over twenty-one years, and it required a strong faith on his part, to believe the mysterious prophecy. The more he pondered, however, the more he began to lay down rules for his own conduct, should the prediction be verified. And he, at length, came to the cruel and unwarrantable decision, that should the event take place, the second born should be secretly removed, and his existence never be revealed, except to the person or persons who must, necessarily, be aware of the fact.

So much for the appropriateness of his title as Louis the Just! No wonder that his biographers cannot discover why this surname should have been applied to him!

Of the rearing and training of this repudiated child of France, nothing is known, nor who supplied to his infancy and childhood the tender cares which should have been bestowed by the royal parents. The veil of impenetrable secrecy covers this part of his life, never to be revealed until the grave gives up its tremendous secrets, and brings alike king and peasant to the bar of Omnipotence.

All that is known is, that Louis XIV. was born on the fifth of September, 1638, twenty-two years after the marriage of his parents; and that thirty years afterwards, the "man with the Iron Mask," supposed privately to be his twin-brother, was carried with the greatest secrecy, to the castle of Pignerol, of which Saint Mars was governor, and thence he was conveyed, some time after, to the isle of St. Marguerite.

Whoever were the depositaries of this secret, must have been bound by the most solemn and awful oaths never to reveal it; otherwise the death of Louis XIII. happening so soon after the birth of the dauphin, might be supposed to have dissolved the shackles that bound the unfortunate prince, and placed him in his true position. We, of course, must assume that his age was five years, at the death of the king, his father.

The long summer days were passing away at Saint Marguerite. How wearily to him who lingered there, a prisoner, watched, guarded, yet addressed by a vain show of deference, that must have made its mockery apparent, we cannot know, but may faintly imagine. Who can tell how often the kingly blood mounted into that noble brow, and swelled the veins that beat wildly beneath the impenetrable mask! Or how the eagle heart, chained into silence, might sometimes weep at the "sound of all things free!"

"There went a swift bird singing past my cell,
O, love and freedom! ye are lovely things,
With you, the peasants on the hills may dwell,
And by the streams—but I, the blood of kings,
A proud, unmingling river, through my veins,
Flows in lone brightness, and its gifts are chains!"

Once, only, the prisoner—Marthioli, as he was called—received a visitor from the court of France. This was the minister of Louis XIV., Marquis Luvois, whom he received while on the island of St. Marguerite. The minister remained standing while in his presence, and addressed him with a deference due only to royal blood. Marthioli replied to him with his musical voice—that voice which could not be heard without the deepest emotion by the few who heard it, so deep, yet so soft and melodious in its accents. They who sailed upon the blue waters that surrounded the lovely isle, sometimes caught the sound of that voice, as it sang to the music of the guitar, and wondered from whence came those thrilling notes that floated on the night breeze in divinest melody.

Not like the exile of St. Helena, who, a century and a half afterwards, fretted and fumed out the hours of his captivity, did the noble prisoner of St. Marguerite murmur and complain of his lot. No sound of complaint ever issued from his lips, to those who guarded him with such jealous watchfulness. If his soul rebelled against the life-long wearing of the captive's chain, it was breathed to the blue sky or the silver stars alone.

One day, when Martel the servant was ill and unable to attend his master, the latter was left alone for many hours. Perhaps, even the absence of Martel might have made the moments of captivity seem more mournful, or weigh more heavily upon his spirit. None knoweth, for he never spoke to living ear the thoughts that pressed his soul in the hour of his solitary vigils. But at sunset, a boat was rocking over the water with a single oarsman, clad like a fisherman, and another figure in a long, gray robe, like a friar, and from the tower of St. Marguerite soft notes were sounding from a guitar, and a song of captivity floated on the breeze.

The fisherman lifted the shining blades from the water, and the setting sun made them glitter like molten gold in his rays, while he listened; and then the music ceased, and from the high window there fell down something that looked like a white, fleecy cloud, directly into the little boat. The fisherman took it up, and passed it respectfully to the friar, who saw that it was a roll of white linen, written all over with words in the Spanish language. He had scarcely, however, glanced across it, ere he was called by M. de Saint Mars, who had witnessed the proceeding from a window, and now appeared at the landing-place with every mark of terror and rage in his countenance, and reaching out his hand, bade the friar pass the roll of linen upon the oar blade. Hastily concealing it in his vest, he authoritatively ordered them to land, and follow him to an apartment in the castle. Here he detained them several hours, endeavoring to extract from them what they knew; nor did he suffer their departure, until the monk reiterated his assertion that he had not read a single word, and that even if he had done so, he did not understand the Spanish language. The fisherman declared his inability to read at all.

Saint Mars released them at last, after learning where he might find them again if necessary. At parting, he said to the fisherman: "Go—you are very fortunate in not knowing how to read." He was not afterward molested, but the poor old friar was found on the third day dead in his bed.

For twelve weary years, did the prisoner remain upon the island; but as if it were too much to bestow upon him the air and light of heaven, he was again removed, still closely masked to the horrible dungeons of the Bastille, of which Saint Mars was appointed governor. Here, a room, somewhat more tolerable than that of the other unhappy prisoners awaited him; but he was not permitted to cross the courts, and even to his physician he was not allowed to unmask. Indeed, from the first, orders had been given to take his life if he discovered himself. The beautiful hand was permitted to be extended for his inspection, but the face was never visible to the gaze of the physician.

Laborde, the confidential servant of the king, expressed a desire to discover the prisoner's real name and rank. The reply of Louis was: "I pity him, but his detention injures no one but himself, and has prevented greater misfortunes. You cannot know him."

Louis himself had attained his majority before the secret was made known to him, and it stands out a dark blot upon his character, that he did not restore the wretched man to freedom. Like Maturin's maniac, kneeling to her daughter on the cold flagstones in Dublin, he might have exclaimed—"Have ye no touch of nature in ye?"

Even at the last, that impenetrable mask was still closed over the face, which if shown, might have raised such a tempest in France, as would have caused a revolution more terrific than could be imagined among people even less impulsive than the French.

At ten o'clock, in the evening of November 18, 1703, the angel "who unlocks death's flowerwreathed gate," unbarred the prison walls for the noble captive. God be thanked that neither "powers nor principalities" can bind the spirit! He died as he had lived—calm, quiet, uncomplaining—perhaps scorning to utter a word that would denote pain or suffering—perhaps joyful that the hour of deliverance was near.

With the jealous watchfulness which had guarded his life, his room was searched after his death for some trace which he might have left, leading to the secret, borne by him so long and so patiently. The walls of his room were rubbed and whitewashed to hide a chance pencil mark, and every article burned which had been used in his service. Even the tiles of the flooring were removed, lest a letter might have been placed beneath. Some light was supposed to have been thrown on the mystery, when at the destruction of the Bastille, July, 1789, a card was found, on which was written the number 64,389,000, an unintelligible cypher, and the following note—

"Fouquet arriving from the isle of Marguerite with an iron mask—" Afterwards ........ ...., and below "Kersadwin."

Fouquet, was superintendent of finance, and was condemned to perpetual imprisonment by Louis XIV. in 1661. Whether the note is intended to show that Fouquet and the man with the Iron Mask are identical, or only that they were brought from the isle of Saint Marguerite together, has been a disputed point. There can be scarcely a question that the latter is the true statement, and that there is nothing else intended by the writer of the note.

On the twentieth day of November, 1703, the remains of the mysterious prisoner were committed to the earth in the cemetery of the church of St. Paul, by the name of Marthioli. His age was stated in the record of his decease, as five years younger than Louis—doubtless an intentional mis-statement.

THE LESSON OF TRAVEL.

Toleration is the great lesson of travel. As, in a small way, a man may mortify spiritual pride, by strolling on Sunday in a western city from church to church, each of which is regarded by its sect as the true straight gate, so in a large way, is he benefited by wintering in Rome and then shipping at Naples for the east. For thus he learns the truth, emphasized with all magnificence, that neither upon this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, is the only spot of worship. In Rome, you have seen the pomp of the world's metropolis surrounding the Pope. In Damascus, the meanest beggar in the bazaar would spit upon the Pope with loathing.—Eastern Travels.

SUMMER.

BY LIEBIG MORSE.

Up and away! O, let us be roaming [ing,
Where the swift-footed stream o'er the gray rock is foam-
Flecking with gold where the sunbeams lay;
Up on the knolls the yellow flowers are blowing,
And the emerald grass in green tufts a-growing
O'er the hills where the lambs are at play.

The gentle south's all day a-breathing,
And the smell is sweet of trees a-breathing
With velvet leaves their limbs;
In the hedge the hawthorn flowers are waking,
And songs of the birds through its trees are breaking
With wild and thrilling hymns.

And mark where the grass is tall and green,
How the strawberry blows, like snow, are seen
Peeping out with starry eyes;
The young grain waves its silken hair
With sleepy songs on the hillside fair—
A shadow swift o'er the valley flies.

The silvery tinkling bells you'll hear,
From pastures borne to the drowsy ear,
And murmuring hum of the bee;
The butterflies wake with the golden hours,
And are floating about like winged flowers
Drifting through the azure sea.

Through the forest aisles you hear the hymns
Of birds and breezes 'mong the limbs,
And smell the swamp flower's breath;
A murmuring thrill runs through the pine,
That too has drunk of the southern wine,
And joyful woke from its wintry death.

THE CABIN BOY'S FATE.

BY JAMES FRANCIS ALCORN.

"BEAR a hand with that binnacle lamp, you confounded whelp!" exclaimed Mr. Evans, chief officer of the ship Harkaway, when on the eve of being relieved by his subordinate. "Here you've been for the last half hour a workin' on it, an' I don't see as it's a mite nigher trimmed now than then."

"I'm sure I'm doing my best, sir," said a bright, intelligent youth, not more than fourteen, who was the person addressed, and who held the not-very-much-to-be-envied position of cabin boy, under the steward above named.

A few minutes more, and the lamp was relit and placed in the binnacle by the interesting youth, who then sought the gruff chief mate and reported the completion of his task.

"So ye've got through at last, hev ye? I've more'n half a mind to make the second mate keep ye all next watch, jest to make up for ye're tarnal laziness."

"O, don't, sir, please."

"And why not, booby?"

"Because I'm so tired, sir; and have so much to do to-morrow."

"O, yes, some good excuse, I'll warrant. Well, you must be more spry about the things you undertake."

"I always do my best to please you, sir; but—" And the youth stopped short and burst into tears.

"But what? Come, stop bohooing and out with it."

"You are always angry, whatever I do."

"And you don't know the reason, eh?"

"No, sir."

"Well, 'tis because you never do anything as well, or as quickly as you might. Now be off with you; I can't have you whining and bellowing round here."

Thus urged, the poor boy turned, crouching away, and creeping back to his damp berth in the steward's state-room, was saluted by the latter with a volley of curses, not loud, but deep, as being the cause of depriving him of his rest.

"I could not help it, sir; indeed I could not!" sobbed the weeping boy.

"None o' your confounded lies to me, you lubber. D'y'e think I don't know nothing? You didn't trim that lamp, yesterday, an' you know it. And now, cuss yer picter! I must be roused out by that old boss of a mate, a trying to wake you. Mark my words, you've got to find some other place to hang your hammock after this night; I'm blowed if I'm going to be roused out for nothing every night."

"I trimmed the lamp, yesterday—indeed I did, Mr. Beals—and it wouldn't gone out to-night, if Mr. Evans had let it alone."

"Pshaw, boy! what did he do with it?"

"Harry Smith's at the wheel, an' he told me the mate took the lamp out the binnacle to light his cigar, and 'at the wind blew it out."

"Fudge! a likely story. Now I know better'n that; Mr. Evans is too good a sailor, an' knows too much to do such a trick as that. But turn in, turn in; I want to get asleep afore one bell." And as the meek subject of his displeasure obeyed him, he turned over in his berth and was fast asleep, long ere the former could still his throbbing heart, or choke down the anguish which found vent in deep sobbing.

Poor boy, how hard was his present lot, contrasted with that enjoyed during the greater portion of his existence, while the painful consciousness that the present was of his own choosing, and in opposition to the wishes of kind friends, but added to his mental torture. An orphan, he had no father's or mother's voice to guide him, and fortune seemed to have cast him forth to struggle alone. His utter ignorance of ocean life oft proved the means of subjecting him to the displeasure of his superiors, who seldom hesitated to chastise him severely, thereby cramping his energy, smothering his ambition, and breaking down his natural independence; those very elements of mental organization so essential to his success.

The scene in which he is introduced to our readers is a fair illustration of his lot, rendered so bitter by the joint chastisement, reproaches, threats and accusations, which were showered upon him on all sides, none manifesting for him the least degree of sympathy, or the slightest shade of pity. Yet I have no desire to convey, by this assertion, the idea that all that ship's company were demons of cruelty. Far from it! It numbered as many humane men, perhaps, as any other crew afloat; men who, had they been placed on land, and surrounded by different associations, would doubtless have proved exemplary for their kindness towards their fellow-creatures, and as defenders of the weak and the oppressed. But in their present position, and surrounded by existing associations, it required some unusual manifestation of flagrant cruelty to arouse the dormant sympathies of their nature, or awaken their slumbering pity. Nay, in many instances, they even added their chidings to those of the most austere of his superiors, and accusing him of stupidity, inadvertently aided in crushing him.

Could they have placed themselves in his position for a brief period, how readily would they have afforded him the sympathy he so much needed, and by its cheering influence enabled him to battle successfully with the difficulty which environed him. But no such fortune was in store for him. He must toil on, unloved and unpitied, with no hope to cheer him during the dreary period which must elapse ere his foot again pressed the soil of his native land, and he was released from thralldom.

"Steward!" exclaimed Captain Hardy, one morning, a few days after the scene described in the commencement of our sketch.

"Did you call me, sir?" demanded that worthy, entering the cabin from the pantry.

"Yes. I wish to know if you found anything on the transom, yesterday?"

"Anything on the transom, sir?" responded the steward, confusedly.

"Yes. Did you observe nothing on the transom, yesterday?"

"No—no, sir—that is, nothing but the books, and things usually there."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes sir." And the speaker turned red and white alternately, betraying an unusual degree of confusion.

"Who dusted the transom yesterday?" demanded his interrogator, somewhat sternly, regarding him with evident suspicion.

"Willard, sir, he always does."

"Ah, true; I remember, now, I was present a portion of the time he was so engaged."

"Why, sir; is anything missing?"

"Yes, indeed—a case of rings of great value, which I placed on the transom yesterday forenoon, when called on deck in a hurry, and which I forgot altogether until I discovered its absence from the usual place of deposit, when I recollected subjecting it to inspection yesterday, and also leaving it exposed on the transom."

"Strange! what could become of it?"

"Not at all; it never moved of its own accord. Send that boy here."

The steward departed for this purpose, and in a few moments the cabin boy entered the cabin and confronted the captain, who demanded, sternly:

"You dusted that transom yesterday?"

"Yes—yes, sir," faltered the boy, cowering beneath the severe regards of his questioner.

"Well, where's the small casket, or box, which stood just here at the time you commenced?" resumed Captain Hardy, indicating with his finger a spot just beneath the mirror which graced the ship's sternpost.

"I—I don't know, sir; I didn't see no box," replied the boy, hesitatingly.

"You didn't see no box? Come, come, that won't do. You must not prevaricate with me; I won't stand it. Tell me where that box is."

"I don't know, sir; indeed I don't. I did not see it." And the boy cowered almost to the deck, white with fear, as the angry man advanced menacingly towards him.

"Liar!" he ejaculated, halting within a few paces of the trembling youth. "Do you dare assert a falsehood? You must have seen it; you are the only person who could have seen it, except myself. Confess you stole it, and I'll let you off easily; but if you persist in this falsehood, I'll flog the flesh off your bones!"

"Stole it!" exclaimed the terrified child. "O, no, I never stole anything in all my life. Indeed, I did not!" he continued, dropping on his knees at the captain's feet, and giving free vent to his tears.

"Up, up, I say, you grovelling worm, if you would not have me crush you!" shouted the enraged captain, who deemed he saw in the result of the child's terror unmistakable evidence of his guilt; while the poor little fellow, in obedience to his command, regained an upright posture, trembling in every limb, when the captain resumed. "What do you mean by persisting in this falsehood? Do you think you can escape with your ill-gotten gain?"

"Perhaps you had better have his berth and chest searched at once, Captain Hardy," suggested the steward, who entered just then, followed by Mr. Evans.

"Yes, yes, search everything belonging to him, steward, and you, Mr. Evans, go with him as a witness."

"O, now you will believe me!" exclaimed the boy, amid his tears. "Now you will know I'm innocent!"

"Guilty, I am afraid," rejoined the captain, regarding him half angrily, half grieved. The expression of the lad's countenance indicated conscious innocence at the moment; but his demeanor at first had been as clearly indicative of guilt, and being deemed sufficient evidence thereof, by the former was still considered as such in the absence of more convincing evidence to the contrary.

The mate and steward were not long absent, ere they returned, bringing with them, as evidence of the boy's guilt, the missing casket with about half its original contents, which Mr. Evans affirmed he found concealed beneath the mattress of the bunk occupied by Willard. This was received as conclusive evidence of the youth's guilt, by his commander, who would not permit him a word in self-defence, but inflicted upon him then and there summary chastisement, as a reward for the apparent falsehood he had uttered, at the same time declaring his intention of handing him over to the civil authorities, as soon as the ship reached a home port.

The punishment inflicted upon the youth was so severe as to incapacitate him for further discharge of his duties for the present; but he was denied the privilege of rest, being obliged to continue the discharge of them at the peril of his life. This he did without a murmur, while his dim eye brightened and his cheeks glowed at times with a supernatural lustre; such as never glowed there before, and was but the herald of that disease which had marked him for its prey, and had already fastened upon his vitals.

The late discovery of his seeming guilt rendered his position still more unenviable, while as a natural result thereof, he was banished to the fore-castle, and from thence by the men, being at length compelled to take refuge in the long boat, where he was exposed to the fury of the elements to such a degree as to hasten the advance of his disease. He was no longer permitted to do duty in the cabin, but compelled to stand a regular watch at night, doing duty as look-out, even though kept on deck, day after day from early dawn till dark, as a punishment for some real or fancied neglect of duty, or inability to perform tasks in reality beyond his strength.

Such treatment was more than he could endure, and as a natural result, his constitution gave way before it, and he was stretched, moaning in pain, upon his rough pallet, in the unsheltered long boat, ere they reached their destined port. Moved by pity for him at last, the carpenter, hitherto apparently oblivious of his existence, removed him to his own room, and ministered to his wants, if not tenderly, at least humanely, and by so doing, recalled his fleeting spirit, and prolonged his life.

During this attack of illness he was permitted to rest in peace, and this rest, combined with the genial air of Batavia, restored in a great measure his health, but failed to raise his drooping spirits. Nothing seemed to affect them now; not even the visible distrust with which he was regarded by all.

The ship was homeward bound, and he was again on duty; as usual performing double tasks, and faring the worst of all the crew, having failed to gain one friend among the crew save the carpenter, and his friendship was rather the offspring of pity than love, and therefore, not very deep or permanent. Still he was the only one of all that crew who recognized his claims upon humanity, and therefore the only one in whom the little outcast reposed any confidence. Into his reluctant ear he poured the brief detail of his former life and longings, hopes and aspirations, sorrows, struggles, wrongs, and despair, and ended by vehemently asserting his entire innocence of the crime charged against him.

The carpenter paid but little attention to his asseverations of innocence at the time; but reverting to the affair sometime after, subjected the boy to a severe cross-examination, which resulted in the full establishment of his innocence in the mind of the former; which fact, when coupled with some points in his previous history, so moved his auditor that he espoused his cause, declaring his faith in his honesty, and his determination to befriend him henceforth.

But the friendship of the carpenter, instead of proving beneficial to the boy, had quite a reverse effect; causing captain and mates to regard him with augmented aversion, and treat him with increasing severity, deeming his newly-acquired friend an unquestionable proof of his duplicity, and if possible, confirming their opinion of his guilt. Under their renewed harshness he declined quickly, until it became evident to his new-found friend, that he could not long survive, when he essayed the task of procuring his exemption from duty, stating his fears for his life.

"Let him die, then," exclaimed the exasperated captain, on whose private purse the loss sustained had made a serious inroad. "Let the confounded thief die; 'twill save his country expense, and cheat the hangman of at least one fee."

"But I am certain of that boy's innocence, Captain Hardy," returned the carpenter.

"That boy's fol-de-rol! Carpenter, I wish you to examine the head of the fore-topmast forthwith, and report its condition to me." And the incensed captain turned abruptly away, resolved to hear no more in his victim's behalf.

A week later, the emaciated youth encountered his gaze for a few moments, while employed in polishing the brass work inlaid in the main capstan head, as he passed from the cabin to the quarter deck, when he was joined by Mr. Evans, to whom he said:

"Is that boy really ill?"

"No, sir; at least I guess he only shams sick. He don't complain of being so, however."

"Willard! Willard! Come, my poor boy, eight bells has struck and the wheel been relieved some time. I'm afeared Mr. Evans'll be after you if you don't turn out, and show yourself on deck," said the carpenter, as turning over in his berth, and leaning half over its edge, he laid his hand gently on the shoulder of the youth—who occupied the lower berth—soon after the morning watch was called, on the morning succeeding the conversation just recorded.

"Yes, sir," responded the boy, so feebly that the carpenter started, and striking a light with a lucifer, lit the lamp; while the boy continued, "I heard the watch called, and tried to turn out; but 'twant no use, I couldn't do it."

"Ah, so soon!" muttered the carpenter; demanding after a momentary pause, "Have you slept any since you turned in?"

"No, sir; I have been in such pain that I could not sleep."

"Where is the pain?"

"In my breast and left side. O—I can—O—I can hardly breathe sometimes."

"Ah, I see how it is. Lie still, be quiet as possible, and do not attempt to speak."

"Ha! aint you out yet, you young sojer?" demanded Mr. Evans, entering the carpenter's room abruptly, and advancing to the sick boy's berth.

"Hush! Softly, Mr. Evans! I'll answer for him, if you please."

"Answer for yourself, meddler! And just recollect those persons are most esteemed who pay most attention to their own affairs."

"Doubtless, sir, and as I have a decided aversion to all unnecessary noise and disturbance in this room, at present, I must beg you to talk in a lower key."

"Indeed, old blunderhead! Come, you lubber, out o' this, I say!" continued the mate, tearing the blanket from the form of the sick youth, and reaching his right hand and arm towards him, evidently intending to drag him out by force; when the carpenter laid a restraining hand on his arm, saying:

"No, sir; you can't drag that boy out of his berth in this room—so long as he is in his present condition—if you are mate?"

"I can't, hey?" demanded the mate, struggling violently, but in vain.

"No, you can't! Neither shall you bluster here, as you choose! I wish you to understand that here, in this little seven-by-nine place, I command, and deeming you to be an intruder, have half a mind to kick you out."

"Mutineer."

"Ay, mutineer, if you will! I like the term; it graces well the lips of a tyrannical coward like thyself. That poor boy! Look at him! had he strength to obey the summons of the bell, he would have saved you the journey here; but I'm afeared he has stood his last watch, and if so, who think you is accountable for his death? O, no ye don't! This is my room, recollect, not the main deck; here, I disown your authority, as I defy your power!"

"Look here, carpenter, if you don't rue this, for the rest of this voyage, then my name aint Sam Evans." And shaking his clenched fist in impotent rage, at his antagonist, he retreated, leaving the latter to allay the apprehension of his protege, in which task he had not succeeded when the captain entered, followed by his two subordinates, the former exclaiming:

"How's this, carpenter? Mr. Evans charges you with violent resistance of his authority."

"Of his inhuman cruelty, sir! Why, Captain Hardy, had you been in my place, you too, would have resisted. He made use of language to me, in this room, which I deemed an insult, and as such resented. And he attempted to remove from that berth by brute force, a dying boy. I prevented him, and will to the utmost of my power, all who may make a like attempt. Captain Hardy, you are human—you have a heart—will you permit your officers to pursue even to the grave, with their brutal cruelty, a homeless, friendless orphan, whatever may be his crime?"

"Carpenter, my officers execute my orders in spite of all opposition, and woe to him who raises his fingers to resist! Mr. Evans, put that man in irons!"

"Irons, Captain Hardy?"

"Yes, irons, carpenter! O, you need not look a threat, much less speak it; I will take the responsibility."

"To which you are welcome, sir," said the carpenter, presenting his wrists to receive the steel ruffles which the mate was engaged in unhooking; adding, "Let me warn you, Captain Hardy, to be very careful how you proceed with regard to that boy. 'Twere much better to remove him to the cabin, and afford him such care as his case demands—"

"O, yes, I'll remove him, cuss him!" hissed the captain, bursting with rage, and grasping the terror-stricken youth by the shirt collar, he hauled or dragged him violently from the berth, exclaiming, "Come out, you wolf's whelp! You confounded storm breeder, you thought to create a mutiny in your favor, did ye? Come, stand on your feet, cuss you! I'll stand no more o' your nonsense!" he continued, as the boy made a feeble and vain effort to stand alone and reeling backward, sunk faint and half senseless on the carpenter's chest.

"Would you murder him, Captain Hardy?" demanded the carpenter, thrusting the mate aside, and interposing his person between the tyrant and his victim, while with outstretched arm he barred the former's advance.

"I shall be tempted to murder you, mutineer! Beware, I say, if you value your life—beware!" he hissed in tones of anger.

A violent fit of coughing now attracted the attention of all to the boy, whose frame was convulsed, and features dreadfully contorted, with the effort to raise the impediment to his respiration. At length it came! and his friend dropped kneeling by his side, uttering a cry of deep commiseration, while Captain Hardy and his mates fell back aghast, as they witnessed the torrent of blood which burst from his mouth, and quickly drenched his person. The two latter quickly sought the main deck, leaving their superior a horror-stricken and spell-bound witness of the scene; while the carpenter supported the dying boy on his manly bosom, and engaged in a vain effort to stay the effusion of blood. He might as easily have stemmed the falls of Niagara; the ensanguined stream still flowed on, and in a few brief minutes Willard Marvin had ceased to breathe.

"Dead!" ejaculated Captain Hardy, horrified, when convinced that all was over.

"Ay, inhuman monster! Thanks to you, he has kept his last watch; but I hope to be present when you and the inhuman instruments of your cruelty are arraigned at the bar of your country, and held to answer for the murder!"

"Murder! Beware, carpenter; you are in my power, and shall answer to the charge of mutiny, ere I have done with you! For the present I leave you free; but beware!" So saying, Captain Hardy retired, leaving the carpenter to dispose of the remains of his victim as he chose for the present. But he went not alone; henceforth an accusing angel was ever at his elbow, breathing in his ear the appalling term—murderer.

On the evening of that day, as the sun was about disappearing beneath the western horizon, the ship's main-yards were hove aback, and the body of the boy, shrouded in cotton duck, and heavily loaded with ballast, was brought to the gangway, where Captain Hardy explained to the crew the cause of his death, giving such color to the explanation as was necessary to shield himself and officers from blame, and causing a minute of the same to be entered in the logbook, to which he obtained the names of several of the crew as witnesses. This being done, the body was arranged for burial, and the burial service commenced, at the proper portion of which the body descended with a splash, and the ocean closed over the remains of the murdered cabin boy.

Does the reader ask, were ever his murderers brought to justice? No. But his only friend in that vessel paid the penalty of his friendship by serving the State seven years in Charlestown prison, to which he was sentenced on a charge of mutiny, sworn to by both mates and the steward, while the counter charge of murder against them, in connection with the captain, was quashed by the evidence of those men whose names were appended to the captain's explanation of the boy's death.

Not long ago, a dying man confessed to the theft for which that boy was punished, and which led to his subsequent death; explaining the measures adopted to free himself from, and fasten suspicion on another. And on that confession, joined to a knowledge of the leading incidents in the victim's previous career, is the foregoing narrative founded.

Stealing never makes a man rich, alms never make a man poor, and prayer never hinders a man's business.

A PICTURE.

BY WILLIE E. FAVOR.

The sweet face of a little child,
Madonna-like, because so mild,
So saintlike and so undeffiled.

Within her tiny little hands
She holds confined in loving bands
A little bird from other lands.

But never more that bird shall sing,
And never prune its yellow wing,
Or hurtle in its little swing.

She knows the little bird is dead;
No more by her may it be fed,
Or in her bosom shield its head.

And as she lifts her meek brown eyes
Towards the blue unclouded skies,
What sweet thought on her heart doth rise?

Perchance she wonders (she has heard
Of such things by some chance-spoken word),
If heaven has room for her dear bird.

Surely there must be greener bowers,
And sunnier skies and balmy hours
Somewhere above this world of ours.

And unto her it seems no wrong
To think her bird joins in the song
They sing in yonder ransomed throng.

This is the picture; and my eyes
Rest on it with a pleased surprise;
For in it many a lesson lies.

STORY OF A MAGDALEN.

TOLD BY HERSELF.

BY MRS. MARY A. DENISON.

"O, you little beauty!"

Such was the oft-repeated exclamation that fell upon my ear when I was a child.

"Give me a kiss, you handsome creature! What a perfect little foot! What a fairy little hand!"

My fond mother! I remember how her face lighted up, at these injudicious expressions of admiration, and how I, babe as I was, begun to expect flattery and pull my curls, when visitors came, that they might speak of their gloss and luxuriance. Nothing displeased my mother more than a soil upon one of my delicate frocks. I early began the petty tricks of vanity, and strove to profit by my fond mother's teachings. My little heart swelled even at the glance of admiration from the passing stranger, and I prized above all earthly things a dress of bright blue, in which I had once been said to look like a little angel. I placed a high estimate, also, upon my white tucked frocks, and practised my prettiest smiles to put on with them. All this while my years still told less than five. Nothing grieved my mother more than an injury done my dresses—she took so much time to make and embroider them! My parents were not rich. My father was a schoolmaster who had married one of his pupils, a very lovely, but not an intellectual girl. I was their only child, and truly did they worship me. I believe in after years, when it was seen how incongruous were their tastes, I was their bond of union. I loved them dearly, but I loved myself better; they taught me to. When I saw how all their calculations, savings, toil of one kind or another, struggles, etc., were directed with a view to my pleasure, my benefit, my interest, I began to consider myself of much importance.

The remark, "she will make many a man's heart ache," had been uttered so often in my hearing, that I think I could not have been much over five, when I began to ponder upon its meaning, and at ten I was a practical flirt among the boys where I went to school. Many a fight was entered into on my account, and I gloried in it. Every year, they told me I grew more lovely. My hair was of a beautiful auburn that sometimes sparkled like gold, sometimes seemed dark as the wing of the raven. My eyes must have been a luminous gray that appeared to take all tints, so that for a long time some of my intimate friends declared them black.

I speak of myself as I was; for I am altered now, God be thanked—yes, even for the personal transformation I have undergone. But I will not anticipate. In my fifteenth year, I began to have acknowledged suitors—some passionate, some capricious, some wise, old and sagacious, some wild, rakish, gay and rich. My head was turned with the number of my admirers. I did not relish school, for I was all the time thinking of conquests. My father was disappointed at my slow progress, and as his pride was touched, he aided me with his experience in a way that took from my own independence and taught me the lesson of deceit. He did not mean to do harm, poor man! but he was thoughtless and fond—as how many too indulgent parents are to-day! I found that by a little coaxing, the difficult sum would find its way on my slate, or by some secret sign, the right word would be indicated at the right time. And so, alas! I grew indifferent to study.

Among my most cherished friends, were three of the worst girls in the town. I did not know how thoroughly wicked they were; for persons of impulsive temperament, and strong imitative faculties, are slow to perceive the evil lurking under a specious manner, the poison that breaks out so rarely, that it excites but a momentary repulsion, yet leaves a secret and indelible mark. They were, in the strongest sense of the words, plotters and intriguers against virtue. Often, after I have been thought safe in my chamber, asleep, have I been present in some wild revel with these girls and their admirers; and as I always made a sensation, and received my fill of attentions and flattery, I soon became intoxicated with these stolen pleasures, and would peril even my peace of mind to enjoy them.

I knew I was truly loved by many. One young man, in particular, a graduate of Harvard University, talented, handsome and good—too good for me—did almost win his way to my heart. Indeed, I am sure I loved him in a way that would soon have developed itself in a strong passionate sentiment, that neither poverty nor ridicule could have dampened. But I was jeered about him, called "Mrs. Parson," pictured in a country parsonage, in calico gowns, or feeding hungry beggars with a soup-spoon, till he began to seem quite ridiculous to me; and after I had given him much hope, and lured him into a declaration, I flippantly rejected him, and laughed at the agony his face expressed. He had a brain fever in consequence, and came very near dying; but, thank God, he lived to fulfil a high and holy mission, and lives yet, blessed with more devoted love than I could have given him.

My father wished me to marry a merchant who was extremely wealthy. He was tolerably good looking, spent freely, and lived dashingly, had a great income, and was ready to dress me in gold, if I required it. This suited me. To be sure, I did not love him; but I liked him well enough to live with him, I thought, and promised to become his wife. What lavish presents he gave me! There was no end to the splendid jewelry, the flashing silks, costly laces, fine embroidery. My poor weak mother was all joy, and never seemed to adore me so much as then. Every word I said was wise or witty. I was more beautiful than ever. She made me put on my diamonds as often as she could, then kissed my hand and called me a queen.

"Not even Cleopatra could have looked more lovely than you, my Maggie!" she would fondly say. I of course believed it.

At last, the wedding-night drew near. In one week I should be a bride—the rich, elegant and beautiful Mrs. Perry. My heart throbbed with anticipation of the year of my triumph just ahead. My three girl-friends appeared to rejoice with me. One of them was called Mary Conolly. She was a tall, dashing brunette, and as I now know, utterly devoid of principle. She came to me just three days before my marriage was to take place. Her first exclamation was:

"O, Maggie! you know that splendid fellow, Lieutenant Moody, whose picture I shew you last week? Well, he is to be at the assembly to-night. Do go just this once, and wear your diamonds! nobody will tell. The circle is private, you know, and its members pledged to secrecy. I do so want you to see him. He says he has heard great reports of your beauty, and believes your charms are very much exaggerated. Do—do go, and convince him how mistaken he is!"

"But of what use will it be? You know I am very soon to be married, and I am sure if Perry became aware that I had ever been to such places, he would be repelled from me; for he has very strict notions of female delicacy—and you know there are both dishonorable men and women there."

"O, pshaw! I know there are some people there, who are not quite as fastidious and prudish as you have suddenly become; but I want to see you in your splendid dress just once. I know you will go; it will be the last time. You can plead an engagement of some kind with a friend; your mother never questions you, and you can easily keep your old merchant away. Pshaw! before I'd be tied to his whims! It will be soon enough, after you are married. There! don't say anything—either yes or no! I will be round in a carriage at half-past eight, up the alley. You will be sure to be there, I am certain. Good morning—it will be the last time, you know!" And her dashing face disappeared from my view.

I thought it over, and—concluded to go. I would let Lieutenant Moody see whether I was as handsome as report said, and he should eat his own words. It would indeed be the last time, for henceforth I should be under the eyes of my husband, and have, of course, no chance to deceive him as I so frequently had my parents. Besides, I wished to see if Lieutenant Moody was such a paragon as he had been represented, and I grew feverish with anticipation. I put my lover off, easily enough; I complained of indisposition—and intimated a wish to be left alone, to my parents. They would as soon have intruded upon the privacy of Queen Victoria, as upon mine when I expressed a wish otherwise.

I attired myself in a dazzling robe, and wore a full set of diamonds. I know I looked surpassingly beautiful, for my mirror told me so without flattery. I was ready at the appointed time, and from a back entrance took my way to the carriage which was in waiting for me.

Many people know nothing of these peculiar assemblies, only that they do or may exist. The members are pledged to secrecy; and a man may see the wife of his own brother there, in company with some depraved celebrity, and yet have no power to make it manifest. I have seen a father meet his daughter; and, though both were filled with shame, neither acknowledged the relationship. Open immoralities are not practised at these assemblies, but they are the stepping-stones to crime, disease, and every evil that undermines virtue.

Behold me, then, standing under the blaze of a hundred jets of flame, the centre of admiration unblushingly received. Ah, that fatal night! that awful night! How little I knew over what an abyss I stood! My blood runs cold at the thought of what ensued. Lieutenant Moody was there. Without exception, he was the finest model of manly beauty I had ever seen. He seemed captivated at first sight with my appearance—enslaved. O, that such workmanship of the Great Creator should hold so much depravity! "Corrupt! corrupt!" should be written on the brows of such men. We had wine; I believe mine was drugged, for after I had taken the first glass, I had such emotions as I cannot describe. I seemed placed upon the top of some pinnacle, with the world at my feet, worshipping; and beside me stood Lieutenant Moody, whom I passionately loved.

Yes, that night I sold myself. I forgot mother and father, the honorable man who was to wed me—forgot God, and even self, and consented to fly from that infamous house and become the wife of that bad man. For days, I did not come out of that delirium. I knew we were travelling—whirling through air, as it seemed. I received every kind attention from the man beside me, and felt like a slave willingly sold into bondage. Whatever he suggested, was readily acceded to; I deferred to him like an unreasoning child, feeling interest in nothing else beside in the wide world. It was a kind of fascination which I pray God few may experience, and for which I paid—O, how dearly!

Gradually I appeared to myself to awaken out of a dream—to emerge from the powerful spell which had been put upon me. I began to see people and scenes as they were. I began to realize, what I thought was the truth, that I was married to an adventurer—that I was a wife—that I had deserted my home; and there loomed up beside me the shadow of some great evil.

As the days and weeks sped, I saw the hollow heart and false character of the man who had ruined me, and I began to experience a kind of despair that had nearly resulted in madness. The newspapers had been kept out of my way, purposely; but one day I found one in my husband's coat, much worn and creased where it had been long folded. Opening it, with trembling hands, I was horrified in discovering a long description of myself, as missing from my home. It was headed "Mysterious Disappearance;" and, among other things, said that my mother was nearly crazed, and my father not expected to live, in consequence of his distress and anxiety having terminated in a brain fever. O, what feelings did this personal give me. I felt like a blood-stained murderer, condemned. I fell upon my knees before Lieutenant Moody, and besought him to let me go home to my mother. His reply was like a thunderbolt:

"Go as quickly as you like; you are free. I have no claims upon you."

For a moment, I stood petrified.

"No claims upon me?" I cried. "No claims upon me?—and I your wife, your wedded wife?"

He laughed—O, that fiendish laugh! It rang through and through the chambers of my soul. I caught him, as he attempted to pass me, and holding him with almost a death grasp, I asked him, in pity's name, what he meant—whether he loved me?

"I like you tolerably," he said, coolly; "but I like some others better."

"And I—your wife?"

"Not a bit of it," was his reply.

Was not this cruel? Was not this bitter, deep deception, most cruel? I fell fainting at his feet. When I awoke, I was in a strange room, and by my side sat a pale woman. I looked at her eagerly, inquiringly.

"Your brother went away some days ago," she said, softly. "Business of life and death was the cause of his abrupt departure. He seemed very sorry, but left money with me, and said you would know where to go if you recovered before he returned."

Base as I knew him to be, I thanked him in my heart for sparing me.

"He did feel dreadfully," resumed the old lady, pityingly. "How much you look alike!"

I had but strength to ask—"how came I here?"

"He brought you in a carriage, dear; said you were taken ill at the hotel, but hearing that I was a nurse, and fearing you would not get the right kind of attention, he brought you here."

I was three weeks convalescing, and even, then I looked like a spectre. I felt hopeless, homeless, heart-broken. I hardly know how that time passed, but I do know that I took what little gold I could collect, my jewels, that he had spared, and seated myself in the cars to go to the city of New York. My mind was in a whirl, but one thing was settled—nobody should know me. I chose another name, stifled all thoughts of home and my parents, tried to care nothing whether they lived or died, and began to plan for the future. I had no trade—what should I do? Chance must decide.

We had not gone far, before a man, gentlemanly and well-dressed, took the opposite seat to mine. After a while, he spoke; and I, endeavoring to quell the hatred that sprang instinctively in my heart against all of his sex, answered. Before we had arrived in the city, he divined that I was in trouble, and some way, I don't know why, I told him as much. Another wolf in sheep's clothing! How sympathizing he was! How he did profess to pity me, all the time planning to my injury!

Well—a record of the next thirteen months, I leave out of this short history. I don't think it would do any one any good, and I don't like to think of it. It was—O, a most horrible dream! And my descent was so rapid, hating and abhorring my life as I did, I did not feel human; I lost all womanly instinct in an incredibly short space of time, and I loathed the whole race as if it were one man.

One night—it was very late—I accosted a rapid traveller. He turned quickly, and stopped, throwing upon me such a look! and from such a face! It was as if a gleam of heaven had suddenly flashed on the gloom of hell. I could see his features distinctly; he could not see mine—at least very plainly. His voice thrilled me.

"My poor girl," he said, "would to God I could save you!"

That was all—only another pitying glance—and he was gone. O, I knew I should never, never forget that face—never! As in one clear blaze, the whiteness of purity gleamed for a moment before my eyes; and I realized wholly, truly, sincerely, the depth and degradation of my course. But I saw no help. All night I staid out upon the street, knowing that it would not do for me to enter the house where I boarded, alone. In the morning, I seemed to hear a voice. It said to me: "Go home and kill yourself—go home and kill yourself!"

So being desperate, I did turn my course homeward. Home! May you never speak that word when it shall be but a mockery—but an empty sound! We who lead such miserable lives, always carry or keep poison by us—though many, through fear of the future, and knowing their great wickedness, dare not use it, unless they must die in a more lingering way.

I found my room stealthily, and taking the paper of colorless powder, I sat down by the window and looked at it. I reviewed my whole life. I glanced forward, also, to the probable future. I saw my own funeral—a pine coffin, a shallow grave, a rude heap—no mourners! Slowly, calmly, I prepared to swallow death, when the same voice I had heard before, whispered in my ears:

"Go take a farewell look at the sunshine—at familiar scenes! Go contrast again the smiling crowd, gaily moving along, with your wretchedness, and then come back and kill yourself!"

Very calmly I arose, secreted the poison, and gained the street. O, how I did walk that day! I looked in every face, in every shop window; I took in the full splendor of the sunshine, and breathed the air in large draughts. I did not seem to feel in the least hungry—no, not once; I was filled to repletion, and my food was—anguish, misery! And amid all, came often and again that holy face of the preceding night. I longed to see it again. I looked for it; I prayed to encounter it. It was the only countenance that had not inspired disgust and hatred—that had made me feel that there might be virtue in the world.

It was nearing night, and growing rapidly dark. The gleams in shop-windows feebly contested with the dim daylight for supremacy. The air was changing; I felt cold; a mysterious shudder passed through my frame. A little girl turned the corner with a pitcher in her hand, and a loaf of bread in a basket. Some unaccountable impulse led me to stop her, and in a low voice, I cried:

"O, child—child! have you got a mother?"

Some children would have run. She stood with her sweet, brown eyes uplifted, looking wonderingly in mine, as she answered:

"O, yes'm—I've got a mother!"

"Love her—love her, then," I cried, the tears falling; for a little human feeling had returned to my hard heart. "So had I a mother once; but I went away from her. O, child—never let anybody lead you from your dear mother!"

"Haven't you got a mother now?" she asked, her face growing very pitiful.

"Alas no, child—neither mother nor home! O, God in his mercy grant that you may be kept sinless!"

"What! haven't you got any home to go to? Why, what will you do for some supper? and where will you sleep?"

"Heaven only knows," I replied, suppressing my sobs, for they came up, almost choking me.

"Went you come home with me? My mother will take you in; she always pities the poor."

"What! such as I go home with you, little, innocent girl? You don't know what you ask. Your mother would hate me—would turn me out of her house."

"My mother never did such a thing in her life," replied the child, gravely. "She often says that she knows she is poor, but she was never the poorer for helping the—the other poor people—any one that hasn't any home, like you. O, I am sure she would let you come! You ought to have some supper."

Still I shrank back, till the child shifted the pitcher to the hand on whose arm the basket hung, caught at my dress, and pulled me gently along. I yielded—though a sickening sensation came over me as I thought of my probable rejection, and before this child. We reached the house, a small building, brown with age, on a by-street. Its entry divided the tenement into space enough for two or more families. I stood within the door of a neat parlor. Such a sensation as came over me! I cannot describe it. I could feel the very atmosphere of home, though it might never be mine.

"Why, who have you brought now, child?" was the astonished query of a middle-aged woman who appeared at the door leading to the other room.

I shrank against the wall.

"O, mother, she's poor and she's hungry, and she's been crying! Do please give her some supper, mother—do please let her stay here to-night, for she hasn't any where to go."

The woman frowned a little, and spoke impatiently.

"I don't know, Elly. You tax me pretty hard, child."

"O, madam, could I speak with you alone, a few moments?"

The cry seemed wrung from me, in spite of myself. She said "certainly," however, and taking a candle, led the way up stairs into a little chamber. There, with a broken spirit, contrition, tears and sobs, I told her all. O, how I pleaded that she would let me stay with her in any capacity. I was eloquent that night, and when I had finished, there were tears in her eyes, and she said, gently:

"Poor child! Stay to-night, at least, and we will see what can be done."

I did stay that night, and the next. Gradually her unwillingness faded away, for she saw how much I wanted to be good, and how hard I tried. If she had said "no," on that eventful night, the next day I should have been—where? God alone knows. I was then to remain with her, and the little angel Elly. O, the change seemed like a heaven to me! The mother stipulated that I should sew for her, and always leave the room when gentlemen came in, which I was willing and glad to do. She made shirts for a great many of the first-class shops, and the clerks often brought or came for her work.

I had been there nearly three months, and had grown peaceful—happy I never expected to be. My altered circumstances changed the worn and haggard look that had before settled upon my face, and my olden good looks were returning. But I was cured of vanity. I often saw the mother of little Elly gazing at me with an expression I could not mistake, and the child herself sometimes said, "O, Agnes!"—the name I had assumed—"you are handsome!" But my heart never throbbed or beat swifter or stronger.

I grew to love Mrs. Mosely, the mother of Elly. She was a widow, and had seen sad reverses; but she was contented with her present lot. She never spoke of my going away. I had become an expert sewer, and my aid brought her in sufficient to defray the extra expense of my living.

One day I was sitting sewing, as usual, but deeply buried in thought, when hearing a step, I looked up hastily, and there stood the man whose face, whose solemn words had saved me. I knew that for one second I was deadly pale, for I felt the blood recede from my cheeks; the next, the crimson rushed back again, and I longed to throw myself at his feet—to tell him what he had done—to bless him—to pray for him—to call him my saviour.

He gazed at me, perhaps wondering at the excitement which must have been apparent, then inquired for Mrs. Mosely. In a few moments she came, and I hurried from the room to thank God that he had given me but once more, even if it should be the last, a glimpse of that noble face.

I thought Mrs. Mosely looked very grave when I returned, after the stranger was gone, and her first question frightened me—"had I ever seen him before?"

With a trembling voice, I told her of that interview. She scarcely replied; and for a long time there was silence, broken only by the steady click of the needles as they passed in and out of our work. I began to fear that she was at last tired of me—that she feared risking her reputation by keeping me longer in the house—and the old troubles and doubts, and dark, desperate feelings now got the better of me, so that I exclaimed :

"I did not hear any one coming, Mrs. Mosely—indeed, you must believe me! I would not have been seen for worlds."

She gave me a mild, motherly look over her spectacles, as if astonished at my vehemence, as she said :

"Certainly I believe you. Why should I doubt?"

"O, I feel such trouble, at times, for fear all this peace and quiet must vanish and leave me to some dark fate. Indeed, to escape that, I would be kept behind iron bars and never see the face of mortal man."

"You are not feeling right, now," she said, very gently. "Christ came to save that which was lost, and he has sent you to me, that you also might be saved. Never fear that I shall turn you away, my child; you have become dear, and in fact necessary to me."

This was so sudden, so overwhelming, that I arose before I knew what I did, and throwing my arms about her neck, I sobbed on her bosom. Then remembering myself, I sprang back, crying humbly :

"O, forgive me! I forgot myself."

"Forgive you! why forgive you, my child? Never fear to lay your head on my bosom, for I will be as a mother to you."

She was weeping quietly, and a blessed, blessed love was warming my heart, my whole being. From that moment, I seemed to feel that God's smile rested upon me—me, the outcast, the sinner as it seemed above all others.

It was very strange that several times, after that day, I saw this man who seemed to me so holy, and who, when I was steeped in wretchedness, uttered that benediction over me. At last Mrs. Mosely said that I need never leave the room, when the gentleman came; and then—my heart throbs wildly, even now, at the recollection of that moment—she told me that he loved me, that he wanted to marry me! Think of it! O, it humbled me to feel myself even thought of by one like him! I trembled from head to foot.

"Did he know all, he never would have dreamed of making me his wife!"

"But he does know all," said my more than mother, gently; "and he knows, too, how you have been striving, for the past nine months, to redeem yourself. That you are worthy to become his wife, I verily believe, in the sight of heaven; and he loves you—has loved you from the first time he saw you in this house."

Yes, he loved me. I heard it from his own lips. But in the midst of my almost overwhelming joy, I could quietly resist his entreaties that we should be married. One year—I told him—one year he must wait; he must try his love, for it might be that he would repent. And if he did, I said, dear as he had become to me, I would bless him and live on the sweet thought that he had stooped to regard me in any light.

At last he consented, and slowly the year passed along. A terrible scourge broke out, and my beloved lay near to the gates of death with the sickness. I was his nurse. The doctor said again and again that he owed his life to me—and, indeed, I came near giving my own, for I took the dread malady, and bear its marks to this day.

But O, I am blessed!—am I not blessed? My husband, my children, my mother, my darling Elly living with me as a sister—I ask you, am I not blessed?

*My own mother sits at my beautiful fireside,
My own father blessed me before he died.*

INCREASE OF A POTATO.

Some years ago, a gentleman visiting a farmer in Tolland, Connecticut, took from his pocket a small potato, which somehow had got in there at home. It was thrown out with a smile, and the farmer taking it in his hand to look at it, a curious little boy of twelve, standing at his elbow, asked him what it was? "O," said he, "nothing but a potato, my boy; take and plant it, and you shall have all you can raise from it till you are of age." The lad took it, and the farmer thought no more about it at the time. The boy, however, not despising small potatoes, carefully divided it into as many pieces as he could find eyes, and put them into the ground. The product was carefully put aside in the fall, and planted in the spring, and so on till the fourth year, when the yield being good, the actual product was four hundred bushels! The farmer seeing the prospect that the potato field would, by another year, cover his whole farm, asked to be released from his promise.—Genesee Farmer.

LONDON DAILY PAPERS.

London has at least four daily penny papers, the Morning News, Standard, Telegraph and Star. Some of these have a circulation only limited to the capacity of their mechanical means of working off the impressions. The Standard and Telegraph are supposed to publish from 40,000 to 60,000 copies. They are printed on double sheets of large size, with eight pages as large as the twelve or sixteen of the Times. The Star is on a single sheet, and has, probably, a larger evening and morning circulation. These papers are well edited, the Standard particularly so, giving two or three leaders scarcely inferior to the lucubrations of the Times.—New York Times.

THE WAG'S PHILOSOPHY.

BY DON QUINERBAUG, JR.

An honest artist, Stokes by name,
 Who had acquired a moderate fame
 In the ability "the gift to gle us
 To see ourselves as others see us,"
 Was found, one summer's afternoon,
 Upon the street, quite out of tune;
 Dispensing imprecations dread
 Upon some erring mortal's head,
 Who had been led, for what, unknowing,
 Said Stokes's own likeness to perdition;
 A most magnificent affair,
 He'd just produced with student's care;
 Which, scarcely half an hour before,
 He'd proudly hung at the street door.
 While in the midst of his harangue,
 A waggish wight, named Lorenzo Lang,
 Renowned for getting off odd jokes,
 Steps up, and thus addresses Stokes:
 "My friend, with you I sympathize
 Sincerely; but 'tis with surprise
 I see you act so indiscreet,
 And to the wretch such measure mete;
 That he did wrong, 'tis very true,
 And should be brought his course to rue;
 But it's no more criminal, I'm sure,
 For him to take your miniature,
 Than 'tis for you, my good friend Stokes,
 Thus daily to treat other folks."

THE STORY OF RACHEL FELIX.

BY MARY W. JANVEIN.

It was at the sunset of a long, bright, spring day, in early March, 1821, that a strolling Jewish hawker, accompanied by his wife, and two or three little ones, paused from the day's toilsome journey through the Tyrol, in the quiet little Swiss village of Munf.

All that day, and for many preceding ones, had the little train wound its way along through fertile valleys and country roads, past smiling vineyards and broad wheat fields just showing a faint green, the dark-eyed, swarthy-skinned son of Israel crying his wares with shrill voice, and hoarding his gains with all his nation's fondness—the pale, patient wife, like Rebekah of old, "fair to look upon," but now silent and weary-looking, who had forborne to utter a word of fatigue through all the long day's journey—and the dark-eyed dusky-haired children, who, less patient than their gentle mother, began to make complaint, as children are wont, of "being so tired," and welcomed gladly the sunset hour that would bring them rest.

"Thou art worn and ill," said the hawker, bestowing a glance on his wife, and apparently noticing for the first time her pale, tired face, and air of suppressed suffering, as they drew near the village which slept in the lap of a smiling valley. "Sarah, take from thy mother the package of stuff—and, wife, we will not travel again till thou art stronger. I fear we have come on too fast this day; but the fruit of our day's work has been no meagre one," and the Israelite displayed his leathern pouch, filled with the coin he had taken in barter for goods from the pack on his shoulders.

"Yea, Felix, I am tired, and would fain rest," replied the dark-eyed Jewess, mildly. "We will lay by at the village till I am strong again. Mayhap these folk will buy all your stuffs; at least, we have the means to pay for lodging for ourselves and our children during our sojourn. 'Tis a long day's journey we have walked through the Tyrol."

And so, while the sunset shadows stretched away over wheatfield and vineyard, gilding the hoary crests of the distant Alps, darkening the chasms, and broad lakes, muffling some wayside cross in darker gloom, and deepening along the country track the travellers had left behind them—their feet trod the streets of quiet Munf, and the kind-hearted Swiss peasants welcomed the weary family to their hearths and homes. Days passed, in which the dark-eyed Jewess abode in the cottage of a generous vine-grower, whose wife sewed and chatted with her guest, while the children of the two played together among the vines and early blooming flowers without the cottage door; nor was the hawker idle, for, from morning till sundown, he displayed his wares at every door of the little hamlet, till his shrunken pack and swelling purse gave token of his thrifty calling, and scarce a good housewife or maiden in that Swiss village but displayed on her person some gay stuff or tinselled ornament he had urged upon her.

And there, too, came the hour of trial for the worn and weary Jewish mother; for on the night of March 24th, she gave birth to a daughter, thus consecrating to that humble, wayside, Swiss hamlet the honor which all the future cannot wrest from it—the honor that will bring thither pilgrims from every land and clime—to look upon the birthplace of the humble Jewish hawker's child, and yet the greatest artiste whom the world afterward saw—the incarnation of passion, power, genius and tragedy—Rachel!

"Now, good wife, we must be moving again," said the hawker, when his infant had gained a few weeks of its little life; "already we have made a long rest; and since I have replenished my pack at Berne, I will journey northward, into the mountainous Cantons, and there dispose my wares. And I will buy a stout mule to carry my pack, and when you grow weary, will transfer the goods to my own stout shoulders, and you, with the infant Rachel, shall ride over the rough ways. The little ones can trudge along easily, for children's hearts are light, and children's feet are not soon weary; and since our little Sarah has been blessed with such a gift for singing, I have a mind that she should earn us a few coin by trolling ballads in the streets of hamlets and towns through which we may pass. What think ye of it, wife?"

"Yea, Felix, our Lord God of Israel hath bestowed upon the child a marvellous voice. I bethink me of 'the sweet singers of Israel' when I listen; and it is surely pleasant to hear children carol light, happy songs," replied the Jewess.

And so the family wound on throughout Switzerland, the hawker crying and selling his wares, the children skipping and playing along their journey—now pausing to pull the wild flowers, or to rest at the foot of some wayside cross, too innocent to reck who slept there, "unwept, unhonored, and unsung"—while the little Sarah carolled in the streets of towns and villages, adding her mite to her father's stores, and the mother trudged wearily along beside her husband, and the great black eyes of the infant in her arms gradually learned to rove from her mother's face, to the new and strange objects constantly presented to her.

A few years went by, and we behold the family of the Jewish hawker settled down at Lyons, a more congenial home to the mother with her growing family, since it afforded her rest from the wandering life she had hitherto led; and the father became the lessee of a small dingy shop, underneath the apartments occupied by his wife and children, where were collected the various goods, articles of jewelry, etc., usually found in a Jew's shop, by the sale of which he contrived to add daily to his little stores.

And in this city, also, the eldest child, Sarah, again took up her life of singer, daily going forth into the streets and various cafes, and this time accompanied by the little Rachel, who, at the close of her sister's songs, collected in her tambourine money from admiring connoisseurs. At day-break the mother's hands clothed these little ones, smoothed their coal black hair, taught them the formula of that Hebrew faith in which she had been born, and to which her children always clung; then busied herself all day with her younger brood, while their childish feet sought the thronged streets, cafes and pleasure-grounds of the city—the sweet voice of the elder carolling blithe French songs, and the large black eyes of the tiny Rachel smiling thanks to the kind monsieur or madame, who dropped a sou into her tambourine.

Who, then, of the throng who bestowed their coin upon this pale, thin, meagre, ill clad, little wanderer, saw trace of her, who, years afterwards, on the boards of the Theatre Royale, moved all the Parisian world? Who, then, pausing a moment to look into the lambent eyes of the Jewish child, read therein their wondrous prophecy?

In 1830, the Felix family removed to Paris—a new and untried field of action. Here again the mother pursued her household cares, and the Jew his employment, and the little girl Sarah her role of singer at the cafes and on the Boulevards, but the little Rachel was promoted from the financial department to join her sister in her songs and ballads.

"What is your name, my child?" asked a grave, benevolent looking man, one morning, attracted by the child's clear, liquid voice, as he was sauntering along the gay Boulevards.

"Rachel Felix, monsieur," replied the sweet voice, while she dropped a graceful courtesy, as monsieur slid a golden coin into her thin little hand.

"And why do you sing all day in the streets, my child?"

"Ah, bon monsieur, it is to earn a sou, and sometimes a kind gentleman bestows upon me a franc, but Sarah and I carry it home to our mere," and the girl's lustrous eyes glistened her thanks.

"And how should you like to accompany me to the great church Notre Dame, and hear the grand organ play?" he asked smilingly.

"Eh, bien—tres bien, bon monsieur!" exclaimed the eager child.

"You love to sing, mon enfant?"

"Oui, monsieur!" and she broke forth into a joyous carol.

"Where do you live, petite une?"

"In de Rue — Viendres tu et vois ma chere mere, monsieur?"

The result of that visit to the apartments of the Jewish hawker and his wife has been seen by those who are familiar with the career of Rachel. The visitor, who was no other than M. Charon, founder of the royal institution for the study of sacred music, obtaining the consent of her parents by representing the advantages of such a career for their wonderfully endowed child, at once took charge of her fortunes. She remained under his tuition for some months, but at length discovering that her vocal developments suited her more for the dramatic than the musical profession, her patron accordingly placed her under the tuition of M. St. Aulaire. Here, in l'ecole dramatique, her true home was found, and her true career first began. For months she studied under the best masters of elocution, and in 1836 was admitted as a pupil at the Conservatoire. For another year she remained at her studies—committing those wonderful tragedies of Racine and Corneille, the perusal of which not only stereotyped them into her memory, but enforced their soul and spirit into her life, till tragedy was Rachel and Rachel was tragedy! In April, 1837, the artiste made her debut at Gymnase, in a play entitled “La Vendéenne.” Her performance was good, unexceptionable, but giving no token of her particular talent, Rachel made no particular sensation. But on the 24th of June, 1838, at the Theatre Francaise, Rachel burst like a comet on the dramatic world. She played Camille to an audience which almost went mad with enthusiasm—to an excited people, whose applause was not only that of shout, and stamp, and bravo, but who gave the fitter tribute of hushed breath and tearful silence. From that hour, there was a new meteor of unrivalled brilliancy in the dramatic sky, and from that night her European reputation was dated. Various were the pieces in which this tragedienne gave token of her wonderful genius—in “Adrienne” and many others, she was pre-eminent; but in Camille she was unsurpassable, and must continue so, till a greater star than hers, now set, shall flash across the dramatic sky—and that shall be—ah! when? Camille always remained the most celebrated character in her repertoire.

During these bright years, these sunny years of triumphant success, began the love-dream of Rachel's life. Whose pen shall chronicle the first wild, thrilling bliss of the woman who hears from ardent lips the story of passion—alas, a guilty passion, unhallowed by churchly rite!—and that woman, her with the heart of fire—Rachel?

Not mine.

We know that her life had many temptations; and the code of woman's honor in lax, gay, la belle France, is lighter held than in colder climes; but more's the pity, that a great soul yielded up its woman's virtue! It is said that Rachel might have married the father of her first child, the Count Walewski, and thus have become the sister-in-law of the emperor of the French, for Walewski was the son of the great Napoleon; and the reason assigned for his rejection was, that such a union would not have conduced to her happiness, since the noble count, though of so royal lineage, was poor in purse, and would have squandered the earnings of her profession— which, with the natural instinct of her Israelitish race, she was said to be fond of hoarding. This we cannot believe; we do not believe that the great tragedienne preferred her gold to her honor. It may be that the fire of her ardent love had grown cold, for a nature like Rachel's was capable of loving or hating with an equal degree of intensity. Hers was a strong, deep, passionate nature, and as her loves were cherished with all the abandon of her orient race—so her resolves and antipathies may have been as firm and determined. But who can lift the veil from woman's heart in the matter of her loves, the children of her soul?

In the early autumn of 1855, Rachel set foot in America. Here, too, she set the dramatic world in a furore. In New York, Boston and Charleston, S. C., she held audiences enthralled by the grace and tragic abandon of her attitudes, and by the terrible flashes of her fierce black eyes.

Said one who encountered her at her private hotel, and caught the full expression of her gaze, “I would not like to incur that woman's hate!” Another who saw her in “Adrienne,” said to me, “Rachel was on the stage, and I trembled. The mere glance of her eye had a fiendish fascination—it made me shiver from head to foot. She spoke, and her voice was like nothing I ever heard, ever imagined; but it was the glance of her terrible eye, the mobility of her features, their passion, wildness, pallor, which thrilled me. Her thin lips worked convulsively, her hollow lips were pale as marble—the very spirit of tragedy seemed essenced in her terrible voice—but burning, burning, beneath the dome-like forehead which rises above the classic structure of her face, were those luminous eyes. The eyes were Rachel!”

Rachel's career in the new world was a triumph. Every night the impersonations of her genius electrified the world of play-goers. Men and women grew pale as death beneath the tragic splendor of her genius. Sometimes storms of applause beat the air; sometimes a rain of flowers fell at her feet. Although few comparatively among her audiences could interpret much beside what was told in the universal language of expression and gesture, still, so perfectly were the emotions which filled the soul of Rachel conveyed to them by the varying shades of expression, and the play of her hands and arms, that but few, and very obtuse were they, who did not comprehend all. She gave us the last flashes of her brilliant genius—but it seems a melancholy, but accredited fact, which is confirmed by her own letters, that here she first caught the cold, which finally terminated in that dreaded destroyer, consumption. She writes to a friend in New York: "I am really tired out—perfectly tired out. If laurels ward off the thunder, they don't keep me from growing rusty. The fact is, I took cold in the train, and ever since I have been in Boston, have been coughing like a consumptive, which I am not, I beg you to believe, in spite of my pale complexion and seeming thinness."

Poor Rachel! the seeds of disease were already sown, and our harsh, New England climate may have ripened them. The transition to the sunny South, to the warmer clime of Cuba, to France—to Egypt—could not save her. Nor airs laden with orange blossom or pomegranate fragrance, could bring the easier breath to the laboring lungs; nor France, with Provence roses and luxuriant vines, restore the bloom to her cheek, or dimming splendor to her eye; nor lotus-flowers of Egypt recall the faded dreams of youth and passion; nor triumphal passage adown the Nile in a barge of Cleopatra-like magnificence, rescue her from the thralldom of a conqueror more potent, and, alas, more terrible, than imperial Roman Cæsar—even Death!

There came a time when it was said Rachel was dying! And then, Rachel went home—home to the land of her childhood, if not of her birth, to the land of her struggles, her loves, and her splendid triumphs. That sad, mournful prophecy, written at Havana just two years previous, was literally fulfilled: "I have carried my name as far as I could, and I shall take my heart back to those who love me." It is said that in her last hours, the tragedienne desired her stage dresses, ornaments, and jewelry, to be spread out on the bed before her; and, fingering them over with her diaphanous, emaciated hands, she mournfully exclaimed, "Must I, then, part with you?" Some would pronounce this but an exemplification of "the ruling passion strong in death"—an Israelitish fondness for her gains; rather let us recognize the association which existed in her mind between these gaudy emblems and her brilliant successes. And yet, it is a mournful token of the influence earthly honors and distinctions can wield, even in the valley of shadows, over the soul just ready for its launch into that vast unknown sea, whose waters lave the shores of the silent land. Sad, mournful evidence—may it also prove a monitor to some other soul, craving wholly earthly goods and distinctions. There came a later hour, when a hushed whisper circled outwardly from Cannes throughout France—"Rachel is dead!" And from thence, the waves of the Atlantic washed it to our shores—the mournful tidings—"Rachel is dead!" They said she clung to the Hebrew faith of her fathers in her dying moments; they said her heart beat slowly, lingeringly, pulsating even when the embalmers came to do their office, ere they laid her away in the beautiful cemetery of Père la Chaise. Strange, wonderful tenacity of life, and yet, not wonderful, since the heart can remain young, even after the foam has long been kissed from life's mantling goblet, and the very dregs been exhausted. Not "strange"—not "wonderful"—for the heart of the mother lingered with her children. And she was so young to die—only thirty-seven. Rachel Felix, the hawker's child of the humble Switzer village, the musician and singer of the cafés and Boulevards of Paris, the queen of the Parisian stage, the empress of the drama, the incarnation of tragedy—only thirty-seven!

HINTS TO LADIES.

A very sensible matron once remarked: "Men of sense—I speak not of boys of eighteen to five-and-twenty, during their age of detestability—men who are worth the trouble of falling in love with, and the fuss and inconvenience of being married to, and to whom one might, after some inward conflicts, and a course, perhaps, of fasting and self-humiliation, submit to fulfil those ill-contrived vows of obedience which are extracted at the altar—such men want not dolls for their companions; and women who would suit such men are just as capable of loving fervently, deeply, as the ringletina, full of song and sentiment—who cannot walk—cannot rise in the morning—cannot tie her bonnet strings—faints if she has to lace her boots—never in her life brushed out her beautiful hair—would not, for the world, prick her delicate finger with plain sewing; but who can work harder than a factory girl upon a lamb's-wool shepherdess—dance like a dervise—ride like a fox-hunter—and, whilst every breath of air gives her cold in her father's gloomy country house, and she cannot think how people can endure this climate, she can go out to dinner parties in February and March, with an inch of sleeve and half-a-quarter of boddice."

THE SOUL.

One thinks the soul is air; another, fire;
Another, blood diffused about the heart;
Another saith the elements conspire,
And to her essence each doth give a part.

But, as the sharpest eye discerneth nought,
Except the sunbeam in the air do shiue,
So the best soul with her reflecting thought,
Sees not herself without some light divine.

DAVIES.

TIME AND LIFE.

BY F. L. HOSMER.

A dewy morning smiled
Upon the opening flowers,
In purest innocence a child
Was whiling the soft hours;
His brow was like the whitest snow,
His cheek as red as morning's glow.

The flowerets were alone
Companions of the child;
With them he talked in gentle tone,
And joyously he smiled,
Till tired at length, he laid his head
Upon a little floweret bed.

But there came an aged man,
With stern and wrinkled face;
He held a reaper in his hand,
And walked an even pace;
He caught the boy unto his side,
And walked along with even stride.

The ever-changing view
Was pleasing to the child,
He longed for each scene new,
With a yearning strong and wild;
And he bade the old man haste his gait,
But still he strode at a measured rate.

He bore the little boy
Through manhood's sterner field;
Through scenes of woe, of pain, of joy,
Till his gentle heart was steeled!
Then he bade the old man snick his gait;
But he ever strode at that measured rate.

He bore him through the scenes
Of sorrowing old age;
On through the shadowy vale of death,
Through life's last lingering stage;
Till the old man fell in a deep abyss,
But the spirit he bore moved on in bliss!

That aged man was Time,
With stern and wrinkled face;
And the child he caught unto his side,
And walked an even pace,
Was one of the children of this earth,
Whom the old man caught at the moment of birth.

THE MYSTERIOUS STRANGER.

BY CARRIE E. FAIRFIELD.

"She is certainly handsome," rejoined Mrs. Dr. West.

"Handsome! how can you say so?" rejoined Mrs. Sawyer Pendleton. "Why, I consider her very plain-looking."

"The doctor saw her in church yesterday, and he pronounced her the most striking looking person he had seen in an age."

"She is sufficiently singular in her appearance to be sure," said Mrs. Pendleton; "but how any person can pretend to call her large, singular features handsome, I don't see. For my part, if I looked like her, I should consider myself a perfect fright."

"Well, at any rate she was elegantly dressed; and in such perfect taste, too. And she has the air of a queen. I am certain she is a lady born and bred; and I am determined to make her acquaintance."

"You certainly don't think of calling on her?"

"I do. I am going there this very day."

"What, call on the guest of a common seamstress! Absurd! I knew you were romantic, Isabel, but I did not think you would carry your whims so far as that."

"Nevertheless, I am just so absurd. Mrs. Green is a respectable woman, if she is poor; and although I know nothing of her antecedents, I have always been of the opinion that she has been well-bred, and has, to use the vulgar phrase, 'seen better days.' I like what little I have seen of her very much, and am determined to take this opportunity of making a further acquaintance with her."

"Well, I must say, I have some curiosity about this singular relative of hers. She dresses like a queen, and carries herself with as much dignity; and though I have not a doubt but she will turn out to be some city dress-maker or milliner come out into the country to make a display of her fine clothing, and impose upon her superiors, yet if you will be so ridiculous as to patronize her, why I think I'll go too, just out of curiosity."

Mrs. West bit her lip, and after a moment's pause, replied. "Certainly, Sarah, I should be happy to have you accompany me; though I am sorry you are actuated only by a vulgar curiosity in making the call. I am afraid if the young lady could see your heart, she would not feel very highly honored by the attention."

"O, nonsense, Isabel; what a bore you are with all your prating about sincerity. Come hurry on your things, and we'll go right away to Mrs. Green's." And the elegantly dressed little lady consulted her jewelled watch, and added: "Fred will be home for dinner in a couple of hours, and I believe he mentioned that he was to bring guests with him, so I must hurry."

Mrs. West was soon ready. Her plain but handsome dress contrasted somewhat with her sister's more elegant and showy attire, and the latter noticed it.

"Why didn't you put on your robe silk," said she, "and, show this young chit that we can dress here in Centreville, if we do live a hundred miles out of town? For my part, I am going to put on all the airs I can, and awe her down into her proper sphere."

Mrs. West smiled, and had scarcely time for a reply, before they reached the little brown house where Mrs. Green resided.

"Do you knock, Isabel; of course there is no bell, not even a knocker; and I shall soil my gloves."

Mrs. Green soon answered their summons. Her apron was wet, and her hands moist and red, and it was very evident that she had just left the washing-tub. She blushed slightly, as she recognized her aristocratic visitors, and making some slight apologies for the appearance of her room, which was somewhat disordered, invited them to a seat.

"We noticed a lady at church with you yesterday," said Mrs. West, after a few remarks, "and as she appeared to be a stranger, we have taken the liberty of calling to make her acquaintance."

Mrs. Green was too well-bred to betray the surprise which she might have felt; and sent her daughter Augusta to call Candace. It was ten or fifteen minutes perhaps, before the young lady made her appearance.

"My cousin, Candace Iron," was Mrs. Green's brief introduction.

Candace was tall and slightly built; with very dark hair, whose glossy abundance, constituted, but for her dark, lustrous eyes, her chief beauty. She was very pale, and her features, though large and irregular were very expressive. She was dressed in a simple white wrapper, edged, however, with exquisite and costly lace, and a heavy, old-fashioned pearl brooch confined its folds at her throat. Her only other ornament was a black enamelled ring, set with a very large and brilliant diamond, and a heavy plain one above it. She received the salutations of her lady guests with the most perfect ease and dignity, apologized for the delay which the necessity of preparing certain letters for the mail had occasioned them, and seated herself upon the hard deal chair, with as much grace as if it had been a velvet fauteuil.

If the ladies were both surprised and delighted with her dress and appearance, they were not less charmed with the chasteness and elegance of her conversational powers. She was evidently a person of fine natural endowments and rich culture. As her very appearance made the place in which she dwelt a palace, so the ineffable charm of her mind threw a halo over every subject which she discussed. That she was possessed of the most acute discrimination also was apparent to both ladies, as at the end of an hour—for the fascinating stranger had beguiled them into an unfashionably long call—they arose to take their leave. Mrs. Pendleton's resolve of "awing the young woman into her proper sphere," had vanished into thin air, before the high-bred girl had set her dainty foot upon the threshold; and she had felt every moment she had lingered in her presence the paucity of her own intellectual stores, and envied the self-possession of her more accomplished and amiable sister. At parting, therefore, she felt very keenly the difference in Candace's manner, toward her, and Mrs. West, although so delicately was the distinction made that the most exquisite breeding could not take the slightest exception to it.

Mrs. Pendleton, who was a woman of more surface than depth of character, immediately went into ecstasies over the stranger, and trumpeted her perfections in the most exaggerated way all over Centreville; while her sister, more quietly, but with better effect, bestowed upon Candace such attentions as would render her visit in town agreeable; thus bringing her into notice, and allowing her native graces to win their own way. Thus it came about, that the cousin of honorable Mrs. Green became in a fortnight's time, the lion of Centreville society. Parties were given for her, rides and picnics followed for her especial pleasure, and all the varied hospitalities of our unusually hospitable town were freely lavished upon her. In short, Candace narrowly escaped becoming popular in Centreville. There was, however, in her nature, despite the exquisite refinement which made her strive to be agreeable to all, a thin ice of reserve, a delicate trace of hauteur, which sometimes seriously threatened her popularity. No one could ever feel that Miss Iron was receiving a favor at their hands. Whatever the circumstances, the obligation was reversed; it was she who honored Centreville and the Centrevillians, by suffering herself to be drawn from her self imposed obscurity, to shed her native lustre upon their society.

Not that she ever by word or deed intimated this, but there were few who did not experience the consciousness while in her presence. All inquiries too, in regard to her family or circumstances, were quietly eluded. She was from New York; she intended to remain in Centreville for a few weeks, possibly longer—it was quite uncertain how long. While there, the humble abode of Mrs. Green would be her home, and the delicate intimations of some of her aristocratic friends of the pleasure which her society would give them in their own homes, were silently disregarded. Of course, under these circumstances there were not wanting those who could hint at disagreeable things in connection with the interesting stranger; but our best society, with one accord, frowned down every calumnious insinuation, and the croakers were forced from very self-respect to be silent.

It could not be supposed that a woman like Candace Iron could be thus generally received in society without attracting attention, and inspiring admiration among the gentlemen. In fact, she was universally admired, though there were few who could claim an intimate acquaintance. There were several among them whose hearts seemed really touched; and conspicuous among these was Frank Perkins, a young physician recently settled in the village. He was a handsome, open-hearted, enthusiastic young man, much respected in the community, and a great favorite among the ladies. He was a cousin of my mother, and a dear and intimate friend of my own, and it was when he first confessed to me his interest in Miss Iron, that I determined to cultivate my slight acquaintance with her, that I might form some better idea in regard to the wisdom of Frank's choice, and his prospects of success. As Mrs. Green was our next neighbor, our houses being separated only by a sloping field and an orchard, and as, moreover, she had been in the habit of doing a good deal of our family sewing, there was no difficulty in doing this.

As my acquaintance with Candace ripened into friendship, I began to experience the wonderful power of her fascinations, and I no longer wondered at the intensity of Frank's passion. Yet the more I studied her, the more enigmatical she seemed. Singularly retiring and unobtrusive in her manners, seeming rather to shun than to court remark, it was yet almost impossible to remain an hour in her presence without being drawn out in love and confidence towards her, while the most perfect respect was what she commanded from all. Sitting one evening in her room, which was a small attic chamber, furnished with the utmost plainness, yet beautiful by the nice touch of her artistic fingers, I observed for the first time a guitar standing in the corner.

"Are you musical, Candace?" I said. "I thought you never sang."

She was unusually pensive that evening, and I shall never forget the singularly mournful smile with which she replied:

"I do not often sing in company, for the only music which has any meaning for me, accords but ill with gay assemblies. If you can listen to one of my songs without being saddened by it, I will sing for you."

"O, do," I replied, "I am passionately fond of old ballads."

She strung the blue ribbon of her guitar over her shoulder, and after a wild, yet tender and mournful prelude, commenced singing a song which I had never heard before. The power and pathos of her voice, which was not loud, but deep and rich, transcended anything I had ever before heard, while her touch was masterly. She seemed fingering one's very heart-strings, so perfect was the unison of her harmonious voice and instrument with the tones which the heart-chords give out when swept by any wild emotion. I was like one in a trance, while she, sitting there in the twilight obscurity of the room, her delicate white robes softly defining themselves against the shadows, with her rich dark eyes and cloudy masses of hair, and her pale, sweet features which the indistinct light softened into perfect harmony and beauty, seemed to my rapt gaze like some pure angel from a brighter realm, half veiled from my vision by the dusky shadows of earth, yet sadly singing the divinest melody of sympathy which the sorrows of humanity ever evoked from angel harps. It was a full minute after she ceased singing, before the transfiguration ceased, and I regained my powers of speech.

"Candace," I exclaimed, "where did you learn that song?"

"From my own heart," was the low, sad reply.

I paused a moment. "Do you mean that it is original?"

"Yes; I have a peculiar feeling towards music—perhaps a selfish one; but any sentiment which I cannot feel with sufficient depth to be able myself to clothe it in language and song, I have no pleasure in enjoying. Music is a divine gift—it is properly the harmonious expression of the soul's highest affections—and therefore one's songs should be a part of himself. Such cannot always be the case on earth, but so it will be in heaven."

I began to wonder whether, after all, my vision was not true, and she an angel, or at least a Peri, she spoke with so much assurance of heavenly things.

"Candace," I said, with a boldness I had never dared to assume before, "you are a singular creature. Are your idiosyncrasies a mere freak of nature, or are they the result of strange experiences?"

She was not affronted at my plainness. "Perhaps," she said, "both causes are combined. Mine was a strange birth, Lizzie—a strange fortune." She paused a moment, a pause which I could no more have interrupted than I could have jarred with my feeble note of discord the harmonies of celestial spheres; and then continued, "I am strange; I suppose I seem peculiar and eccentric to my fellow-mortals, one and all. There are no exceptions, are there? Your cousin, Frank Perkins, for instance, he thinks me as strange and peculiar as all the rest."

I was astounded at this allusion, for never before had I heard her mention his name, save in the most common-place accents; and I had been thoroughly mystified in all my endeavors to fathom her mind on the subject. For an instant I scarcely knew how to reply.

"Frank certainly considers you very far removed from young ladies whom one ordinarily meets in society; but your peculiarities excite his highest admiration, and I am afraid"—I emphasized the word—"awaken too deep an interest for his own peace of mind."

"Afraid!" she said, captiously, "why afraid?"

"Because, Candace," I replied, speaking right to the point, "I don't think you ever intend to marry him."

Another pause. "You are right," she said, at length, "I do not intend to marry him. Will you tell him so from me? Tell him gently, delicately, as you can—for you are a true woman, Lizzie—but pointedly, settle the matter at once—for—he must never speak of love to me."

"Candace," I asked, because I could not refrain from asking, "do you not love him? I have been certain of it sometimes when I marked the softening of your voice, the melting of your eye toward him."

"When did you notice all this?" she demanded, with an eagerness that startled me. "When, and who else saw it? Did he ever notice it, think you?"

I did not know how to answer, and she continued:

"Love him? No, I would not for worlds curse him with my love. It would scathe him like the lightning. No, he must never, never crave the boon. "Lizzie, Lizzie," she said, looking at me with wild, tearless eyes that were almost fierce, "Lizzie, go home, my child. I am not a fit companion for you now; in another half hour I might tell you things which would scorch and scathe your pure soul, as they have mine. Go home, I say, do the errand I bade you; but never allude to the scene to any one—never think of it again."

I bade her good-night, and wished her pleasant slumbers that should dispel this wild mood, which was so unlike her usual quiet self. She only smiled in reply; but it was a smile eloquent with the same proud yet mournful significance which had marked her manner. At the door I met Augusta Green, with a letter for her cousin.

The next day it was known all through Centreville that Miss Iron had been unexpectedly recalled to New York, and had been obliged to leave without ceremony. When she would return, if ever, Mrs. Green could not tell, neither could she give any clue to her address, as she said her cousin might be obliged to travel, and there would be no certainty of letters reaching her. People thought it rather singular, but when six weeks passed, and nothing was heard from her, either directly or through Mrs. Green, inquiries ceased, and Miss Iron was in a fair way to be peacefully forgotten, at least by most. Cousin Frank and myself certainly formed two exceptions. I had delivered to him her message, and it set him almost wild. With the full strength of a generous, manly being, he loved her, and he vowed he would search her out if any part of creation still held her; he would know with certainty whether she loved him; and if so, what barrier existed that could not be overcome by love like his. It was impossible to leave his patients just then, but at Christmas, if no news came, he would go to New York, and search until he found her, if it were a year. Time was nothing to a love like his.

He was saved the trouble; for one quiet day in November, a carriage drove up to Mrs. Green's door, and Candace Iron alighted from it, and passed up the walk, leading by the hand a little boy of three years. I happened to be standing by the window at the time, and saw all this; and as soon as etiquette permitted, I donned a bonnet and shawl, and tripped across the fields to welcome her.

"I am very, very glad to see you back again, Candace," I said, as I kissed her, "we have missed you very much; but it seems to me you are thinner than you used to be. I hope you have not been ill."

"No," she replied, quietly, "I have been in my usual health; but I have been travelling, and am very much fatigued."

"What a sweet little boy you have found in your journeyings; what is his name, and whose is it?"

"His name is Henry—he is my child."

It was said calmly, in a low voice; but a faint color rose to her cheek.

"Yours!" I exclaimed, "yours by adoption, then; the child of some relative I presume?"

"No, mine by birth; I am his mother."

I was speechless for a moment, but her ready tact relieved me.

"When I first came to Centreville, I was taken for a young lady, and as I desired to avoid questions, I allowed the mistake to pass uncorrected. I am a widow."

I scrutinized her closely, and tried, as I had often done before, to form some estimate in regard to her age. At first glance, you would have said she was no more than nineteen; her form and features were certainly youthful; yet the soul which animated her countenance, and looked out at her dark eyes, was certainly old in experiences. As always before, I was baffled. She must have been widowed for some time, for she wore no mourning garments. I longed to question her, but she had signified that it would be an intrusion, so I forbore. On my way home I met Cousin Frank.

"Have you seen Candace?" was my first question.

He had not even heard of her arrival. "I am on my way to the cars," he said, "for a week's absence. I cannot see her now, but you must give her my hearty welcome back, and assure her that my first call when I return, will be at her door. And then," he added, "I will know the worst."

Great was the consternation in Centreville when the circumstances of Candace's return were known. Her best friends were surprised into silence, and the croakers, whose mouths had before been shut, repaid themselves richly for their enforced silence. They always knew it would turn out so in the end; they were always certain she was an impostor, and no better than she should be. Some people always were so taken by outside show; they had seen the end from the beginning; but they charitably forbore their evil prophecies. Amongst this sapient set was Mrs. Pendleton, who was certain from the first that there was something wrong; but then Mrs. West was so blinded by the artful creature, and she felt it her duty to stand by her sister.

The tide having once turned, it was not long in running its downward course, and Candace's popularity had soon reached its lowest ebb. A few there were among those who knew her best, who trusted her, and although even to them she still, as before, refused all explanations in regard to her own private affairs, there was that in her truthfulness of character and conduct, from which they could not withhold their confidence. In answer to all expressions of sympathy in regard to her present unenviable position in society, her quiet reply was:

"It is only what I have expected. I came here for retirement and privacy. The attentions which I received were never solicited, and although in consideration of my own health which then needed the stimulus of activity, I did not feel at liberty to decline them, I knew it could last but for a season; I am, therefore, not disappointed, and need no sympathy on that score."

When Frank returned, little Harry was quite ill, and his first professional call was at Mrs. Green's. It was at the twilight of a wild, tempestuous day that I saw his carriage stop there. An hour or two later I ran over to inquire after the sick child. He was sleeping quietly upon Mrs. Green's bed, and Candace and the doctor, I was informed, were closeted in her own room. It was nine o'clock when I left. From my chamber I could watch the light which burned from Candace's window. I counted the clock stroke at ten, eleven, twelve, and still through the trees of the orchard I discerned the twinkling ray. Half an hour later I heard the click of Mrs. Green's gate, and the roll of carriage wheels. Then I fell asleep; but waking again near morning, I looked out, and the light still burned on.

After breakfast I called with some little delicacies for the sick child. Candace sat by his bedside, with deep traces of her last night's vigil upon her face. Her eyes were dim and sunken, her cheeks, always pale, were now sallow, and seemed fairly emaciated by the intensity of her suffering. She was holding her moaning boy close pressed in her arms; patting his rosy cheeks, threading her thin, delicate fingers through the soft ringlets of his hair, and anon pressing passionate kisses upon his brow and fevered lips.

"He is better this morning," she said, in answer to my inquiries. "Thank God, he has not been seriously ill; I think it would kill me to lose him."

O, how I longed to take her to my arms, poor stricken, sorrowing dove! and comfort and caress her, as she petted her boy; but I dared not. I did lay my hand upon her burning brow, and print a kiss softly upon it, as I left, and the glance of tender, heartfelt gratitude which repaid me, brought tears to my eyes. I saw Frank that afternoon.

"How is it?" was my first question. "Is there any hope?"

"None, save one which it is a sin to cherish. Yet, O, Lizzie! she loves me. I know it. She forbade her lips to murmur the sound; yet in the intensity of her sorrow and my sympathy I caught her wildly in my arms, and she lay for one moment sobbing upon my bosom. It was only an instant, but as she raised her head, she murmured, 'This must not be; even this drop of sweetness is denied to me—I must drink my bitter cup to the very dregs—but I will go down to my grave with untainted honor, and an unsullied conscience.' O, Lizzie, she is an angel. Let the world say what they will of her, she is too pure to breathe its air."

Poor Frank! I pitied him. I knew the hope of his manhood had perished, and I felt keenly all the peculiar trials of his lot; but he seemed to have caught something of her heroic spirit, and I saw that he asked for no sympathy, so I only pressed his hands in my own, and received in silence his cousinly kiss, and then we parted.

A year passed, and still Candace remained our neighbor. Among all who had at first overwhelmed her with attentions, scarce one true friend remained to cheer her solitude. Frank had removed to a neighboring town; he had been an altered being since that sad night of vigils. He was the same manly, upright, noble-hearted man as ever; but his buoyancy and cheerfulness were gone. He came frequently to see me, and never left without calling on Candace; but he never saw her save in the presence of the family. Usually I accompanied him in his calls; and his manner, though always touched with a saddened tenderness, was still that of the utmost deference and respect. He seldom took her hand, even at parting, and although I could occasionally discern a gleam of tenderness in his glance toward her, her smile to him was always calm and friendly, never more. One day as I received my own mail from the post office, the clerk said to me:

"Miss Lizzie, here is a letter in mourning for Miss Iron; it is marked 'in haste,' and as you pass her door in going home, may I trouble you to call with it?"

I took the letter joyfully. I do not know why, but a thrill of hope ran through my heart, as I looked at the black seal and the heavy line of mourning which encircled the envelope. I flew, rather than ran, my feet scarcely touched the sidewalk; it seemed to me an age, yet it was scarcely three minutes till I had placed the epistle in her hands. Her color rose, and she uttered a faint cry, as she glanced at the superscription. An instant sufficed to reveal its intelligence to her quick eye. She drew one long, shuddering breath; I thought she would faint, but she only buried her face in her hands, and trembled from head to foot.

"O, God!" she murmured, at length, "am I at last free? After these long, weary years, Heaven forgive me if it be sinful, but—I am thankful."

Three minutes elapsed, and she did not speak again. At last she arose, and kneeling by her bedside, seemed for some minutes to be engaged in fervent prayer—after that she wrote and despatched a hasty note—then she came and sat by my side again, and laying her hands confidently in mine, and smiling upon me with one of those radiant smiles which I never saw on any other countenance, she said:

"Lizzie, if I have seemed ungrateful in withholding my confidence from your pure and priceless friendship, the hour has come when I can ask, and I trust receive your pardon."

And then briefly, but impressively, she told me her story.

"My father was a young English nobleman, who in his first visit to the continent, fell in love with and espoused an Italian opera singer of some note. He died, however, before I was born, and his widow, with a proud shrinking from all the trials which she must undergo in establishing her claim to a legal marriage, and a recognition by his family, preferred emigrating to America. She had scarcely been a month in this country, when I first saw the light. She was not then destitute, but her resources were not sufficient to support her without labor. So that notwithstanding her desire to live for her child's sake a private life, she was forced by her ignorance of the ways of procuring a livelihood in this country, to go again upon the stage. She resolutely avoided all introductions to society, however, and lived in quiet lodgings in the most retired part of the city, devoting all her leisure and resources to my education. When I was fifteen she died, and I mourned her loss as it became the child of so much love, and patient toil and self-denial to do. With her dying breath, she committed me to the care of her only friend, an honest stage-manager whom she had long known, and he was faithful to his charge. At the end of a year, however, by accident I was brought to the notice of a young man of wealth and standing, the heir indeed of one of the wealthiest merchants of New York. He fell in love with what he used to term my 'gipsyish charms.' And as he proposed an honorable marriage to my guardian, the latter thought it his duty to counsel my acceptance. I was but sixteen, and had been bred in utter retirement. I had a keen sense of my obligations to Mr. Richards, and my dependence upon him. What was more natural than that I should accept this flattering offer? I did so; and we were married. I have reason to believe that Robert Iron never intended that the ceremony should be legal; but thanks to the watchfulness of Mr. Richards, it was so, as I have now the blessed satisfaction of knowing, although with childish carelessness I was persuaded to entrust my marriage certificate to his care, and have therefore had no certain proof of its validity since the death of Mr. Richards, which occurred shortly after our marriage.

"For three years I lived with my husband. At first I was perfectly happy. We travelled constantly; Robert said because he preferred it, and because it would give me a style and finish of manner which he much desired I should attain before being presented to his family. We stopped at first class hotels, and mingled freely in the best society of all the principal cities of the Union. Six months had not passed, however, before he grew jealous of me. He soon found that I did not love him, and after that he made my life miserable by his suspicions and his taunts. For the last two years that I lived with him, my sufferings were terrible. I cannot now recall them without shuddering. Yet I think he loved me more truly than he ever loved anything else; but his nature was naturally selfish. The birth of our child gave him pleasure, and for a time he softened towards me; but it did not last long. Yet he was my only protector, and I clung to him; he was moreover the father of my child, and I could not leave him. Judge then of my horror and consternation when he one day proposed that I should free both him and myself from the galling chains with which we were bound, by an elopement. At first I refused unconditionally, and with the utmost indignation; offering, however, to separate myself from him, publicly and honorably. This made him outrageous. He would submit to no such scandal, he said; his fair fame should never be tarnished in that way; as for me, what was I, but the base-born daughter of a base-born mother. My father's blood boiled in my veins, and for an instant I could have stabbed him to the heart. He insisted, however, on his infamous proposal, offering me but one alternative: I might pretend an elopement and live in retirement in some out-of-the-way place where I should not be known, or he would reject me as a cast-off mistress, and I, having no proof of our marriage, and neither money nor friends, should stand before the world as such. You, my dear child, cannot picture the sufferings of that night. God grant you may never experience ought to remind you of what I have endured. The next day I put the whole case into the hands of a lawyer, who was a tried friend; and in view of all the circumstances, he advised me to the quietest course, which I at last pursued. At first Robert would not give me my child. This nearly killed me; it seemed the last drop which was wanting to make my cup overflow. But soon after I left he was taken ill at a southern city, and wrote me that if I would come for the child, or send a trusty messenger, I might have him. Of course I flew to him, and regained my precious boy.

"Mrs. Green is no relative, only an acquaintance whom my mother befriended while living in New York—I knew her to be a tried friend, and I had not many such—to her therefore I applied for a home; my success you know. All these weary months I have lived on, striving for calmness, yet on the verge of despair, struggling not only with past memories, but with living, throbbing, burning emotions, for, Lizzie, I love your cousin as I never loved before, as no woman can love twice; and yet true always, as far as I might be, to those bonds which bound me to Robert Iron—for I bore his name still, and I could not forget that I was yet a wife. To-day, deliverance has come—Robert Iron is no more—and—I am free!"

As she spoke the last words, she bowed her head, and seemed struggling with a tide of memories and hopes. There was no need that I should reply, for the door had opened quietly as she uttered those heart-felt words, "I am free," a quick but noiseless tread passed over the carpet, and before she was aware of his presence, Frank Perkins knelt at her side, and wound his strong arms around her yielding form. I felt myself Madame De Trop, and left. There was a wedding in the Widow Green's humble parlor, six months after, and though Centreville never quite forgot the chagrin which the announcement cost them, Dr. Frank Perkins and his lady lived very happily together, and gave themselves little uneasiness about what the croakers might say.

FRUIT TREES.

There is a practice among the Swiss and Germans of boring into the ground among the roots of fruit trees (with an instrument made for the purpose), and pouring in liquid manure to force the tree forward, and also, to enable it to resist the drouth of dry weather. I have practised this for some four years with some fine Seckel pears, in dry land, with good success. Avoid this after the first of September, as it will induce a second growth late in the fall, which will be quite irregular, and very liable to be winter-killed. The instrument I use is the common iron bar, which can be driven in among the roots without injury. Take for a wash (as I buy no "special" manures), to three fourths of a barrel of water, four quarts of ashes, two quarts of lime, two shovels full of light soil—stir up well, and pour into holes made as above, what the tree requires. Soap suds are capital for this purpose.—Rural New Yorker.

RAINY DAYS AND FARM-HOUSES.

BY EVA BELFORD.

Who hasn't spent a rainy day in some quaint, old-fashioned farm-house?—a farm-house with brown or red walls, and a mossy, clever-looking roof—with low chambers, where the ceaseless, never-weary footsteps of the rain sounded through them all the day, as they pattered and slid adown the roof? Who hasn't spent hour after hour under the low eaves, pulling from their quiet rest, old, antiquated newspapers, which were as carefully preserved as though they were worth thousands of dollars to the owner—newspapers that were dated away back among the eighteen hundred and twenties, and piled away sacredly before your busy, bustling hands, and inquiring face had blessed the world with their presence. And who hasn't grown weary, too, and thrown with a sacrilegious haste, these old relics of by-gone days, back into their resting-places in barrels or boxes, as they chanced to belong? Who hasn't turned to the small chamber window with a sigh, and looked out upon the bending, dripping grass,—the sober-looking barns, with their drenched yards—the awkward hens, twisting and shaking perseveringly along through the rain, talking, cheerfully in spite of the soiled and defaced appearance of their glossy coats, and their uncomfortable feelings generally,—for I know that hens can't feel comfortable when they look so shockingly;—little paths running out from the house, like brown pieces of insertion set in the green garments of grass that sloped gently away across the sombre-looking fields? Ah, and who hasn't looked out farther, and watched the ribbon-y roads stretching away up over the hills in the distance, like caressing arms—away up, until they seemed lost in the heart of some giant growth of woodland, or to have met secretly the very trailing robes of the gray sky itself? Who hasn't watched the smoke curl up from the neighboring houses, listened attentively to the sound of every voice that came across the fields, looked anxiously out to the scowling west, to catch a smile of pleasant weather upon its dark face, until wearied out the wandering heart has turned home upon itself?

And then—and then, there was a new "path across the hills." The path that one's own feet should break through the future. Then there was a wrenching from out fate's hands all her closely-held secrets. The low alto of the rain was forgotten; the crabbed eastern wind was no longer heard; everything was dumb in the presence of that wild, youthful imagination.

What a life was seen from that low window! What a life of brilliant conquests, of pure deeds, of love and joy was pictured out; there were storms ahead, to be sure, but none so dark but what they carried within their bosoms a little torch of heaven's sunshine. There were trials to be met, but they would be conquered bravely and resolutely. There were disappointments to be endured, but they would be borne with heroic fortitude, such as few could summon to their aid. How the bright, glad eyes sent their light, and the happy heart its joy into the stern future, so that its darkness gave way before them. And how restlessly the young feet tarried in the still places of youth, and the childish hands brushed the sweets from the flowers, and the heart kept its freshness in the dewy morning of life, so eagerly was the bustling, active noonday looked forward to.

Ah, but the coming days when the ears shall be deafened by the world's tumult that no longer may be heard the songs of birds; when the heart is so buried in the dusts of selfishness and intrigue, that every dear influence of early life slumbers as if dead; when the eyes have gathered upon themselves a mist of iniquity which spreads over everything on which they fall—what, O, what shall then bring back the hearing, the sight and the heart of youth?

Dear, dear old farm-houses! Who does not love them—who?

RUSTIC WIT.

At a north country inn, the Boots being called, a shrimp of a lad in rustic attire presented himself. "Well, are you the Boots?" The youth supposing, no doubt, that the gentleman was up to a joke, replied, "no, I'm stockings, sur." The traveller, not exactly pleased with the answer, asked him what he meant by such a reply. "Wha," repeated the boy, in a sort of simple laugh, "I'm the stockings, sur." "Stockings! What do you mean by stockings, you impertinent snapper, you?" "Wha, sur," said the boy, with an unaltered countenance, "I'm Under-boots, so, ha must be stockings, sur."—Scottish Guardian.

COLORED ARTICHOKE.

St. Aubyn, the retired actor of the Theatre Francais, is living at Nice, where he has just purchased a charming villa on the sea. He has just made a discovery which they say is destined to create quite a revolution in horticulture. By placing caps of different colored linen over the head of the artichoke, he has succeeded in producing them of different colors. At the table of the Tuilleries the other day, was served a dish of this vegetable, red, light green, green, blue and yellow, much to the diversion of the company. May not this be of service to those who are in quest of the long sought blue dahlia?—Court Journal.

AN ANCIENT INSTITUTION.

The Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts in June celebrated its two hundred and twentieth anniversary. The existence of this military body for a period of nearly two centuries and a quarter, is a most interesting subject of contemplation, in the history of our country. What, it may be asked, has caused this company to be kept up in full vigor, through war and peace, through colonial and independent state governments, for seven generations of men, and brought it down to our day in a condition abundantly flourishing, and full of promise for the future? There must be something more than the mere pride and pomp of military array, to produce a result like this; for many military organizations, involving greater display, higher distinctions, and more valuable emoluments than this, have lived, flourished, died, and been forgotten, during the period which marks the age of the "Ancients." The secret of the perpetuity of the company is to be found in the symbolic significance of its organization, that symbolism being direct and expressive in its bearing upon the nature of American institutions. The right of self-defence, free election of rulers, and religious dependence, are the three prominent characteristics which have ever marked civil society in this country. They stamped the Puritan character which founded the early colonies, and which in process of time has diffused its influence across the continent, and built up a free, united, and independent nation. The Bayonet, the Ballot-box and the Bible are the insignia of American liberty; and these three are combined in the organization of this ancient institution.

The capacity and ability of a free people to defend themselves, is symbolized in the nature of the Ancients' organization, as a company bearing arms; the right of a free people to choose their own rulers from among themselves, is symbolized in the annual election of its officers from the ranks; and the necessity of humble dependence upon Divine Providence, to the security of a people's freedom and prosperity, is further symbolized by the public worship of the Almighty, which precedes the annual election. The annual observances of the company have therefore spoken to the heart and judgment of the people, by constantly reminding them of what their fathers did for free institutions, and upon what they themselves must rely for their preservation and improvement. There has always been a fresh and living soul in the organization, which could appeal to the liveliest sympathies of the people; and it is this soul of Americanism in its truest sense, which has kept the body alive, through all changes and vicissitudes, and brought it down to us, hale, hearty and strong, revered for its antiquity, honored for its perennial youth, and loved for its vivid interpretation of the hopes and duties of freemen.

The charter of the company bears date March 17th, 1638, and was granted by John Winthrop, Governor, by the advice of Council, and by order of the General Court. The original name was "The Military Company of the Massachusetts," which in process of time became changed to the "Honorable Artillery Company," and later still, to its present title of the "Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company," by which it has been recognized, for years past, in various executive documents.

The first commander of the company was Robert Keine, mentioned in the charter. The officers were commissioned by the Governor on the first Monday in June, in great state; and ever since that time, with very few exceptions, the annual elections of officers, the attendance upon public worship with the Governor and suite, and the commissioning of the new officers, have taken place, down to the present year. During the period of the Revolutionary contest, the company did not assemble, the members being mostly engaged in the strife for independence. But at the close of the war, the meetings were renewed, and have continued without interruption ever since. At the present time, the company is composed mainly of past and present officers and members of the Volunteer Militia. Besides these, there are other public-spirited gentlemen who are enrolled as members, either upon the honorary or active list, and the several governors of the State are made ex-officio, honorary members. The present roll consists of about 350 members, of whom 80 are honorary, and the rest are classed as active.

We have thus given a meagre sketch of the history and condition of this ancient institution, the oldest military organization in the nation, and the germ of that military power which has rendered our country invincible in every contest in which she has been engaged. It had its birth in the same year with Harvard University, and the two have walked hand in hand down the pathway of centuries, the one dispensing the light of learning and piety, and the other the fire of patriotism. May they both continue to move on in harmony and prosperity!

We suppose there are some virtues that may exist in the worst hearts, even as there are some kinds of fire that will burn under water.

Curious Matters.

A wonderful Creature.

A curious looking native of the briny deep was lately fished up near Fisher's Island. It is of a bright red color, nearly round in form, and perhaps three inches in diameter, and of a pulpy consistency, rather more solid than the "jellies" common in these waters. It is attached to a stone, to which it adheres as firmly as if it and the stone were a pair of marine Siamese twins. On the top of this leathery looking customer is an orifice which varies in size from about two inches in diameter to almost nothing, opening and shutting according to the sovereign will and pleasure of the animal, if a "sea rose" can be called an animal. A very curious operation to witness is its mode of taking refreshment. Little scraps of raw fish put into the creature's mouth, or whatever the orifice above mentioned should be called, are seized by numerous little fibres or feelers and drawn in out of sight after which the "sea rose" is ready for more. This singular creature was fished up by a smack-man. It is said to be a very rare article, seldom caught and exhibited to the inspection of curious members of the human race.

A queer Trick.

A glaring imposture has been detected in a performance at the circus at Paris, which has for months been drawing crowds of spectators. A man who called himself "L'homme canon" professed to sustain on his shoulder, as on a gun-carriage, what seemed to be a piece of ordnance of the calibre of a ten-pounder, which, loaded with a full charge of powder, was discharged within a few inches of his ear. The shouts of applause at the explosion were instantaneous, but to the professional ear there was a want of sufficient simultaneity between the flash and the report. To the professional eye there was also an absence of recoil which a full charge must create. It now appears that a mere Roman candle was shot from the gun, while immediately under the stage a tin box, crammed with powder, was made to explode among sand-bags, while the smoke circled round the intrepid performer.

A wonderful Machine.

The Dudley Observatory, recently established at Albany under the auspices of the Dudley munificence, and the eloquence of Edward Everett, has been presented with a calculating engine, the operation of which is one of the marvels of modern science. This extraordinary invention is the work of a Swedish mechanician, and the labor of twenty years. It was built at Stockholm, and, to aid in its completion, the Swedish government has given more than ten thousand dollars. With a few prepared formulae, it will do the work of four computers. It will not only calculate almost every description of mathematical tables, but will print and stereotype them.

A Curiosity.

An English paper publishes a sketch of the life of a prisoner, composed by himself in Winchester jail. The original is in the shape of a printed book; the letters and words having all been cut out of waste paper by the man with his finger nails, as no knife or scissors were allowed. After cutting out the words suitable to his purpose, he carefully pasted them in proper order to form a small book, comprising twenty-two pages. A piece of poetry addressed to the prisoner's wife, is included in this singular literary curiosity.

Superstitions.

In many parts of England, where the fairies still maintain their ground, the milkmaids sprinkle water—the true descendant of holy water—about their dairy, to prevent the little people from dipping their whiskers in the milk pans during the night. The same persons are also persuaded that witches often prefer fine, handsome horses to broom-sticks, and accordingly take them from the stable, and ride them over earth and water all night, though they are always very careful to bring them back before the morning. To prevent this, the grooms studiously stop up every aperture in walls and doors, by which a witch might be supposed to effect an entrance. Still, the members of this sisterhood are so ingenious and powerful, that they get into the stables nevertheless, and ride the horses so furiously that they are found in the morning trampling all over, and covered with sweat. It seems never to occur to the worthy grooms that locking out the wholesome air may produce this effect.

The obedient Watch.

Borrow a watch from a person in company, and request the whole to stand around you. Hold the watch up to the ear of the first in the circle, and command it to go; then demand his testimony to the fact. Remove it to the ear of the next, and enjoin it to stop; make the same request of that person, and so on, throughout the entire party. You must take care that the watch is a good one. Conceal in your hand a piece of leadstone which, so soon as you apply it to the watch, will occasion a suspension of the movements, which a subsequent shaking and withdrawing of the magnet will restore. For the sake of shifting the watch from one hand to the other, apply it when in the right hand to the left ear of the person, and when in the left hand to the right ear.

Death from a Parasol.

A young woman, while hurrying across the road to the London Bridge station to catch a train, tripped and fell. When raised, she stated that her parasol had wounded her in the breast. It was noticed that the parasol handle, which had been broken, was quite sharp at the end. In a minute or two, blood flowed from her mouth, and she was taken as quickly as possible to St. Thomas's Hospital, on reaching which she was found to be dead. The surgeon found that the parasol handle had pierced through the right lung.

Destructive Invention.

A Frenchman, named Gaultier, gave an exhibition a few years at Red Bank opposite Philadelphia, of a machine for burning up a hostile fleet approaching a city. The experiment which was on a small scale, consisted of pouring into the Delaware a composition somewhat similar to burning fluid, and then setting fire by casting upon it burning material from a small hand pump. The fire burned for a short time with great intensity, at the same time throwing off volumes of black smoke.

An Anomaly in Nature.

Captain Richard Johnson, on High street, Newburyport, had a hen hatch eleven chickens from thirteen eggs, not long since, and one of the chickens is supplied with an extra pair of legs. It is a well, healthy chicken, and runs about as chipper as any of them, but does not appear to use its hind legs at all though they are as large as the others.

What will a Glass of Water hold?

It is generally thought that when a vessel is full of water, any solid substance immersed in it will cause it to overflow, and such will be the case if the substance is not soluble in water; but the philosophic truth that, in dissolving a body, you do not increase the volume of the solvent, may be proved by a simple and interesting experiment. Saturate a certain quantity of water, at a moderate heat, with three ounces of sugar; and when it will no longer receive that, there is room for two ounces of salt of tartar, and after that for an ounce and a drachm of green vitriol, nearly six drachms of nitre, the same quantity of sal ammoniac or smelling salts, two drachms and a scruple of alum, and a drachm and a half of borax, —when all these are dissolved in it, it will not have increased in volume.

A monster Grape Vine.

A Los Angeles correspondent of the Alta California writes as follows: "At Montecito, four miles from Santa Barbara, there is a grape vine, probably the largest in the world. Its dimensions and yield would be incredible, were it not that my informant is a man of veracity, and he spoke from personal observation. It is a single vine, the main stock being ten feet in diameter. It is trained upon a trellis 60 feet in diameter. My informant, with another person, counted 7000 bunches, and the estimate yield was 18,000 pounds of fruit. Can this be beaten? The only thing that surprised me in the relation of my friend was that any person in Santa Barbara should have displayed the energy necessary to build the trellis for this noble vine."

Important Discovery.

An experiment has lately been tried in Paris, after a new system, by which hides and skins of all descriptions may be dried in a few minutes, without any machinery, and in all latitudes. Skins so dried are preserved without any unpleasant smell or diminution of weight or quality. They are dried at the small expense of four sous the ox hide, and are said to be superior to those dried in the sun. South America supplies more than 12,000,000 pounds weight of green hides, which arrive in France in bad condition, sometimes in a state of decomposition, with considerable loss to the owners. This new process will, it is said, preserve them completely.

The "Madstone."

The madstone, reputed to cure hydrophobia, is generally considered a myth, but Seth T. Stanton, of Cincinnati, whose credibility has good vouchers, states that he was bitten by a mad cat recently, and was completely cured by a madstone, in the possession of Samuel Treble, of Macoupin County, Ill. The terrible disease was well developed before he reached Illinois, but the madstone, on being applied to the wound, sucked itself full of the poison, when it dropped off and was cleaned, and seven applications effected a cure.

Poison-spitting Snakes.

Says the author of Sporting Scenes amongst the Kaffirs of South Africa: "I have heard from both Dutchmen and Kaffirs, that there is a snake which spits out its poison at any one who may approach, and makes capital shots. Blindness often follows if the victim is struck in the eyes, and a horrible disease of the skin if the face or hands are touched by the poisonous secretion. I am not aware of the appearance or name of this reptile."

Use of Poisons.

Dr. Taylor, in his evidence before the select committee of the English parliament on the "sale of poisons bill," after pointing out that arsenic was much used in several manufactures, such as in the manufacture of glass, especially opal glass, of shot, in the steeping of grain, and other purposes, states that the largest quantity of arsenic is used in the manufacture of paper for covering walls, and is very dangerous, both to those living in houses papered with the article, as well as to those employed in the manufacture. An instance was sometime since published in one of the medical journals, of some cases of illness occurring to persons living in a room papered with this paper, and the effects were described as those arising from arsenic.

Strange Custom.

A most extraordinary custom prevails among the Virees, a powerful tribe occupying an extensive district in Caubul, among the mountains between Persia and India. It is, in fact, a female prerogative that has no parallel among any other people upon the earth, and that reverses what we are in the habit of considering the natural order of things—the women choose their husbands, and not the husbands their wives. If a woman be pleased with a man, she sends the drummer of the camp to pin a handkerchief to his cap, with a pin she has used to fasten her hair. The drummer watches his opportunity, and does this in public, naming the woman, and the man is obliged to marry her, if he can pay her price to her father.

A Hermit.

Bucks county, New York, is alive with excitement at the discovery of a hermit, who, it is said, has occupied a cave at Wolf Rocks for the last eighteen years, who has a beard a yard long, and whose apartments are said to be wonderful cozy. The Democrat, at Doylestown, says about one thousand persons visited the cave on Sunday. Wonderful stories are told about the Hermit of the Mountain. Certain unexplained ghost stories which have baffled the people of the neighborhood, have all at once been solved. What has induced this strange piece of mortality to have secluded himself from society, nobody can tell. The particular locality of Wolf Rocks is in the upper end of the county.

Extraordinary Occurrence.

The following, from the Colombo Observer, gives an account of an extraordinary accident to Major Milman, Royal Artillery:—"It seems that an elephant charged him, and was within a few feet of him, when Mr Tyndall, determined to save his friend's life, fired. The bullet went through Major Milman's left shoulder, splintering a small portion of the bone. But the end was answered: the bullet which had thus disabled Major Milman killed the elephant, which fell within a few feet of him. So narrow an escape, and under such circumstances, is unprecedented."

A remarkable Otter.

Some years ago the other hounds of Mr. Coleman, of Leominster, killed, in Monkland Millpond, an otter of remarkable size; it measured from the nose to the end of the tail, four feet ten inches, and weighed 34 1-2 lbs. The animal was supposed to be eight years old, and to have destroyed for the last five years a ton of fish annually.

The Florist.

How gaily shines the early dew,
Loading the grass with its silver hue!
And freshly comes the fragrant breeze,
Dancing among the cherry-trees;
The bees are humming all so gay;
Humming anthems for the sunny day.—HARRIS.

Culture of Violets.

The cultivation of the violet is very simple. It may easily be increased by dividing the roots in the spring or fall, and also by layers and pipings. To obtain new varieties, the seeds from the best sorts should be gathered as they become ripe, and sown directly. The plants will appear in about fourteen days. Those of the spring sowing will bloom in autumn, and autumn plants in the spring; and if they are protected from the summer's sun after ten o'clock in the forenoon, they will continue to bloom until the frost becomes severe. Indeed, this lovely little flower possesses the quality of blooming while the coming frosts of later autumn have put most other plants to sleep for the winter, and it is sometimes seen in a moderate winter, partially covered with snow, with its buds ready formed to usher in young spring.

Watering.

Watering appears an extremely simple operation, yet nevertheless there are several points relating to it that are necessary to attend to. One of these, never to saturate the soil. Water, to be in the best state for being taken up by the plants, should be kept in detached globules by the admixture of air; and it should be only slightly impregnated with nourishing matter from decaying animal or vegetable substances. Rain water is the best for plants. Avoid the common mistake, of pouring water close around the stem. Water, if poured profusely on the collar of the plant, which is the point of junction between the root and stem, is likely to rot, or otherwise seriously injure that vital plant; while the spongioses, which alone absorb the water, are left without nourishment.

Grapes as House Plants.

Somebody has recommended to cultivate dwarf grape vines as parlor window plants. There are certain utilitarians who cannot consent to grow anything which does not furnish food for the stomach, or money for the pocket; as for "cluttering up" their rooms with geraniums, roses, and lilies, that is all folly! Now, let such persons try a grape vine at their south window. Plant in a large pot or neatly painted box, and train the vines on wires stretched across the window-frame. We can conceive that such a plant would satisfy the sense of beauty and utility at the same time, and that in a high degree. It would be the finest ornament of the house; and as for the fruit, why certainly that would be appreciated.

Myrtles.

Myrtles should be grown in a soil composed of a mixture of peat and loam, in which the former should predominate; they should be regularly watered and frequently syringed. Some persons nip off the tips of the young shoots, to make the plant grow bushy; and though it has that effect, it is a bad practice with the flowering kinds, as it prevent them from producing flowers. A better plan is to make cuttings, and as the plant increases in growth, change to a larger pot, till the plants have acquired a bushy habit of growth.

Arrangement of Garden Flowers.

The point to be observed in the selection and disposition of shrubs in the garden, is to produce an agreeable variety of flowers and foliage throughout the whole space, and during every month in the year. For this purpose certain evergreens, such as the lauristinus, and certain flowering shrubs, such as the China rose, are to be distributed throughout, the same variety of the species not being repeated, but different varieties. There are also shrubs for flowering at every season of the year, where the locality is favorable; and if judgment be exercised in their selection, there need not be a dozen duplicates in the garden—different varieties of each species being chosen.

Growing Ferns.

In England, the artificial growing of ferns is carried on to a considerable extent by floral amateurs, and with entire success. The method which is pursued would appear to be very simple. The ferns may be planted in boxes of any size or shape, furnished with glazed sides and glazed lid. The bottom of the box is filled with nearly equal portions of bog-moss, vegetable mold, and sand; and the ferns, after planting, are most copiously watered, the superfluous water being allowed to drain off through a plug-hole in the bottom of the box—after which the plug is put in tight, the glazed lid applied, and no further care is required, than that of keeping the box in the light.

Choice of Plants.

To select the most desirable plants for the garden, and to arrange them with good taste, requires considerable knowledge of the floral kingdom. The time of flowering must be known, the height, hardiness, habits, etc.; also the effect of the combination of different colors, so that the plants may be arranged in such a manner as to produce the happiest effect. Some persons, anxious for a great variety, crowd too many plants into a small space, consequently have nothing in perfection. It is much better to be confined to a few varieties, and cultivate them well, than to pursue the careless step so frequently seen in the flower garden.

Climbing Roses.

This is the month best calculated for setting out shrubs of all kinds, and especially the climbing rose. When trained against a wall, it should have a north or eastern exposure, rather than a southern one, and the shoots should never be cut. In fact, the rose does not require much pruning, except what is necessary to remove the dead wood, or to train the plant in shape, though the latter should be avoided as much as possible, as all wounds are apt to produce canker.

Eucallonia.

Beautiful shrubs, natives of South America, which are nearly hardy in the climate of London. They grow best in peaty soil, or in very sandy loam. E. rubra is generally trained against a wall, but E. Monte Videnis, which produces large clusters of white flowers, is grown as a bush. Both kinds require protection from severe frosts.

Dorycnium.

A genus of little hardy plants, separated by Tournefort from the Lotus, or Bird's-foot Trefol, and growing freely in any common soil. They are most suitable for rock-work.

Ranunculuses.

When it is desired to cultivate the ranunculus in much extent, and in the most thorough and successful manner, remove twelve inches of the surface earth from the beds, then have the earth at bottom well dug, or broken up, eighteen inches. Over this, lay in manure seven inches in thickness, composed of three parts of cowdung six months old, and a fourth part of sand or mud, obtained, if possible, from the bank of a river, well mixed together.

If this manure be prepared a few months before it is used, and occasionally turned, the better; and, over this, place a compost of five inches, of very old cowdung mold, one-sixth; sea-weed, one-eighth; turf mold, one-eighth; leaf mold, well reduced, one-eighth; fresh, sound earth, one-third. When the beds are in a proper state, make impressions or drills across them, with the handle of a hoe, by pressure, about one and one-fourth inches deep, and five inches asunder, and plant the roots at four inches distance from the other, filling up the drills with the same compost. The ranunculus should never be planted deeper than one inch under the surface, as light and air are very essential to their thrift. They should also never be planted within several feet of a well.

Sweet Peas.

This truly sweet and fragrant ornament of the garden is of very easy cultivation. The peas may be put into the ground quite early, as they will bear the wind and weather. Make a circle round a pole, or some object to which they may cling as they rise; and put the peas an inch deep, having soaked them previously in water well saturated with arsenic, to guard them from the depredations of birds and mice. Add an outer circle of peas every month, so that a continual bloom may appear; the circle first sown will ripen and pod for seed in the centre, while the outer vines will continue flowering till late in the autumn. When a sufficient number of ripe pods have been gathered, all the pods which may afterwards form should be cut away, as this will strengthen the vines, and throw all their vigor into repeated blooms.

To rear a Myrtle from a Slip.

Cuttings of the myrtle may be struck in a little bottom heat during the months of June, July, and August; but with more certainty in July. As soon as they have taken root freely, put off into thumb-pots, and keep repotting them as fast as those they occupy become filled with fibres. Give them air whenever the weather will permit of it, and water as often as requisite—that is to say, when you do water them, do it in earnest. In all other respects, they will require precisely the same treatment as that recommended for window plants in general.

Protecting Seeds.

The shoots of annuals are very apt when they first appear above ground, to be scorched and withered by the hot sun, and the plants thus destroyed. As a remedy against this, pieces of moss or thin matting may be laid over the ground where they are planted, staked down, and there allowed to remain until the seeds have been sprouted some days, or a week, and when removed, let it be at night or early in the morning; the morning is the best time.

Lablavias.

The Egyptian Bean. A half-hardy annual climbing plant, or hardy biennial plant, which only requires the usual treatment of similar plants. It has a very showy purple flower.

The Camellia.

To grow the camellia to perfection, Wilder recommends that the plants have a good compost and complete drainage provided, and at all seasons of the year a regular supply of air and water—due regard being had to time and temperature. When not in a growing or flowering state, they need only be moderately watered, but on no account should they be suffered to become dry, under the erroneous supposition that starving them for water will produce a plentiful supply of flower-buds. At the time of flowering and making new wood, the plants should be abundantly supplied with water, and, when the young shoots are changing color and becoming hard, a heat of seventy to eighty degrees will cause the formation of a much greater profusion of blossom-buds.

Moral of the Garden.

Nothing teaches patience like a garden. All have to wait for the fruits of the earth. You may go round and watch the opening bud from day to day; but it takes its own time, and you cannot urge it on faster than it will. If forced, it is only torn to pieces. All the best results of a garden, like those of life, are slowly but regularly progressive. Each year does a work that nothing but a year can do. "Learn to labor and to wait," is one of the best lessons of a garden. All that is good takes time, and comes only by growth.

Suckers.

Sending up suckers, forming offsets, and throwing out runners, are all natural ways of propagation that require very little aid from the hand of man. If there is no desire to increase the number of plants, but to render the main stalk vigorous and stout, let the suckers be removed as soon as they appear, thus all the strength of the sap goes to the parent stalk. Offsets are young bulbs which form beside the old ones, and only require to be broken off and planted in rich light soil.

Climbing Roses.

When climbing roses fail to run, which is often the case, the remedy is to cut away all but three or four of the strongest shoots, and permit none but those to grow the first season. Give the plant plenty of manure—liquid manure—manure of almost any kind or description. By this means you can cause your climbing roses to grow to almost any extent desired.

Grass around Fruit Trees.

No one who has the least knowledge of the cultivation of fruit, will allow grass to grow around his young trees. It is a great drawback upon their growth and health. For several years, at least—and we would recommend it at all times—the soil should be kept pulverized around the trunks of fruit trees.

Colutea.

The Bladder Senna. Large, deciduous, hardy shrubs, growing and flowering freely in any common garden soil. Colutea cruenta is the smallest and handsomest of the species. All the species are propagated very easily by layers or cuttings.

L. E., West Harwich.—The peach-blossom signifies, "I am your captive;" the dandelion, "rustic oracle;" the daffodil, "regard;" and the butter-cup (king-cup), "ingratitude" and "childishness." We know no way of preserving the color in pressing flowers.

The Housewife.

Stewed Lettuces.

Strip off the outer leaves, and cut away the stalks; wash the lettuces with exceeding nicety, and throw them into water salted as for all green vegetables. When they are quite tender, which will be in from twenty to thirty minutes, according to their age, lift them out, and press the water thoroughly from them, chop them a little, and heat them in a clean saucepan, with a seasoning of pepper and salt, and a small slice of butter; then dredge in a little flour, and stir them well; add next a small cup of broth or gravy, boil them quickly until they are tolerably dry, then stir in a little pale vinegar or lemon-juice, and serve them as hot as possible.

To Bleach a faded Dress.

If you find that a colored muslin or ohints with a white ground, has faded very much in washing, you may discharge the color entirely, and wear it as a white dress, provided it has not been sewed with colored silk. For this purpose, having first well washed it in hot suds, boil it till the color seems to be gone; then wash it out of the boil, rinse it, and dry it in the sun. Then, if not white, lay it on the grass when the sun is very hot, and bleach it for several days. If still not quite white, repeat the boiling.

Gentlemen's White Leather Gloves.

A gentleman may clean his white leather gloves to look very well by putting them one at a time on his hands, after he has done shaving, and going over them thoroughly with his shave-brush and lather; then wiping them off with a soft clean handkerchief or sponge, and drying them on his hands by the fire, or hanging them before the fire, or in the hot sun, and while still damp, putting them on his hands till quite dry, to prevent their shrinking.

Fried Potatoes.

The long kidney potato is the best for this purpose; they should be washed and peeled, and cut into very thin slices, and thrown into boiling fat, until they are a nice light brown color; dish up very hot, throwing a little salt over. The remains of cold ones may be cut into slices and fried in the same way, or they may be dipped into batter, and fried like fritters.

Rich Gingerbread.

Melt together three-quarters of a pound of treacle, and half a pound of fresh butter; pour these hot on a pound of flour mixed with half a pound of sugar and three-quarters of an ounce of ginger. When the paste is quite cold, roll it out with as much flour as will prevent its adhering to the board; bake the cakes in a gentle oven.

To take fresh Paint out of a Coat.

Take immediately a piece of cloth and rub the wrong side of it on the paint-spot. If no other cloth is at hand, part of the inside of the coat-skirt will do. This simple application will generally remove the paint when fresh. Otherwise, rub some ether on the spot with your finger.

Common Ground-Rice Pudding.

One pint and a half of milk, three ounces and a half of rice, three of Lisbon sugar, one and a half of butter, some nutmeg, or lemon grated, and four eggs, baked slowly for half an hour, or more, if not quite firm.

To restore the Color to Mahogany.

Wash well with soap and water, and then polish daily with the following oil: take half an ounce of alumroot, cut small, and add to a pint of linseed oil; when this has stood for a week, add half an ounce of powdered gum arabic, and an ounce of shellac varnish; let these stand in a bottle by the fire for a week, then strain. Rub well in.

Giblet Pie.

For goose giblets, you must boil them a short time; when cold, chop them in small pieces, and cut the gizzard, heart, and liver in slices; stew them for a quarter of an hour in some good stock; when cold, line your dish with veal cutlets, or rump steaks; use hard boiled eggs to this pie; then season; if to go into an imitation raised pie, thicken the giblets—if in a dish, garnish.

Herrings boiled.

Boil six herrings about twenty minutes in plenty of salt and water, but only just to simmer; then have ready the following sauce; put half a gill of cream upon the fire in a stewpan; when it boils, add eight spoonful of melted butter, an ounce of fresh butter, a little pepper, salt, and the juice of half a lemon; dress the fish upon a dish without a napkin, sauce over and serve.

Pomatum for the growth of the Hair.

Melt together four ounces each of beef marrow and oil of mace, and having strained through a fine sieve, stir in (previously dissolved in half an ounce of tincture of tolu) two drachms of balsam of tolu, and one drachm each of oil of cloves, and the same of camphor. A piece the size of a pea only to be well rubbed in night and morning.

Blackberry Syrup.

To two quarts of juice take one pound of loaf sugar, half an ounce of nutmeg, half an ounce of cinnamon—pulverised—a quarter of an ounce of cloves, half an ounce of allspice. Boil all together for a short time, and when cold, add one pint of fourth proof brandy.

Tapioca Pudding.

Boil a pint and a half of new milk with four spoonful of tapioca, lemon-peel, cinnamon, and nutmeg; sweeten to taste; then mix with it four eggs; put a paste round the dish, and bake slowly.

Beef Steak Pie.

Take some good steaks, beat them with a rolling-pin, and season them with pepper and salt; fill a dish with them, adding as much water as will half fill it, then cover it with a good crust, and bake it well.

To prevent Lock-jaw.

Immerse the part injured in strong lye, as warm as can be borne. But first, as in all cases of wounds, apply spirits of turpentine on lint.

Butter.

In churning cream, add a lump of butter to the cream before commencing, and the butter will come in two-thirds the time it would without.

For Indigestion.

Peach meats are excellent for indigestion; eat slowly from one to six.

Whim Wham.

Sweeten a quart of cream, and mix with it a teacupful of white wine, and the grated peel of a lemon; whisk it to a froth, which drain upon the back of a sieve, and put part into a deep glass dish; cut some Naples biscuit as thin as possible, and put a layer lightly over the froth, and one of red currant jelly, then a layer of the froth, and one of the biscuit and jelly; finish with the froth, and pour the remainder of the cream into the dish, and garnish with citron and candied orange-peel cut into straws.

Cabbage-Water to be thrown away.

Always remember that green water, that is, water in which cabbage, or any other vegetable is boiled, should be thrown down the sink the moment the vegetables are out of it, while it is quite hot, and then a pailful of cold water thrown after it, will prevent the unhealthy smell arising from green water; but if it be left till it is cold, or nearly cold before you throw it away, twenty pails of water thrown after it will not prevent the smell.

Vegetable Essences.

The flavor of the various sweet and savory herbs may be obtained by combining their essential oils with rectified spirit of wine, in the proportion of one drachm of the former to two ounces of the latter, or by picking the leaves, and laying them for a couple of hours in a warm place to dry, and then filling a large-mouthed bottle with them, and pouring on them wine, brandy, proof spirit, or vinegar, and letting them steep for fourteen days.

Vinegar Honey.

Half a pound of honey must be put to a pint of water, and the honey well dissolved. This mixture is then exposed to the greatest heat of the sun, without closing wholly the bung-hole of the cask, which must be merely covered with coarse linen, to prevent the admission of insects. In about six weeks, the liquor becomes acid, and changes to a very strong vinegar, and of excellent quality.

Cleaning Dish-Covers.

Dish-covers should always be wiped and polished as soon as they are removed from the table. If this is done whilst they are warm, it will be but little trouble; but, if the steam be allowed to dry on them, you will find much difficulty in getting the tarnish off from the inside. When they are wiped and polished, hang them up in their places immediately.

Essence of Beef.

Put into a porter bottle a sufficient quantity of lean beef, sliced, to fill up its body, cork it with a paper stopple, and place it in a pot of cold water, attaching the neck, by means of a string, to the handle of the vessel. Boil this for three-quarters of an hour, then pour off the liquor, and skim it. To this preparation may be added spices and salt.

Poison of Rattlesnakes.

It has been discovered that this poison is a most powerful sedative, and that stimulants are its antidotes. Alcohol is designated. In two instances in which this remedy has been applied, the persons have been cured. Brandy was freely given to them until relieved from the usual symptoms, and continued in smaller doses until the third day, when they went about as usual.

Mackerel boiled.

This fish loses its life as soon as it leaves the sea, and the fresher it is the better. Wash and clean them thoroughly (the fishmongers seldom do this sufficiently), put them into cold water with a handful of salt in it; let them rather simmer than boil; a small mackerel will be done enough in about a quarter of an hour; when the eye starts and the tail splits, they are done; do not let them stand in the water a moment after; they are so delicate that the heat of the water will break them.

To prevent Moths.

There is no remedy so effectual for the prevention of moths as the seeds of the bitter apple. If these are placed between the blankets not in use, among woolen clothes, or other articles which are liable to this great evil, they will never make their destructive approaches. It is imported from Turkey, resembles a poppy-head, is entirely filled with seeds, and can be purchased at any good chemist's.

Snow Rice Cream.

Put into a saucepan four ounces of ground rice, two ounces of loaf-sugar, six or eight drops of essence of almonds, two ounces of fresh or salt butter; add a quart of new milk. Boil fifteen or twenty minutes, until smooth. Pour it into a mould previously greased with Florence oil; turn it out when quite cold, and serve with preserves round it.

Swiss Cream.

Take half a pint of cream and the same quantity of new milk, and boil it with a piece of lemon-rind and sufficient loaf-sugar to sweeten it. Thicken this with a teaspoonful of flour, and, when nearly cold, add the juice of the lemon to it; this will thicken it; then put it into a glass dish, and stick macaroon cakes into it.

Nim's Puffs.

Boil one pint of milk with one-half pound of butter; after boiling, add three-quarters of a pound of flour; stir the milk and butter into the flour; stir it until it does not stick to the pot; let it cool; then add the yolks of nine eggs; beat the whites to a high froth, and put them in last; grease your tin cups, and fill them half full.

Common Loaf-Cake.

Two pounds of flour, half a pound of sugar, a quarter of a pound of butter, two eggs, one gill of sweet yeast, half an ounce of cinnamon or cloves, and a large spoonful of rose-water. If it is too hard, add a wine-glassful of milk. These ingredients will make a common-sized loaf. Bake about three-quarters of an hour.

Substitute for Coffee.

Scrape clean three or four good parsnips, cut them into thin slices, bake till well brown, grind or crush, and use in the same manner as coffee, from which it is scarcely distinguishable. This is not only a beverage equally good as coffee, but is likewise a cure for asthma.

Colds.

A daily exposure to the outward air is absolutely necessary to secure us against the injurious influence of our variable climate. For cure of catarrh, reduce the amount of food, take exercise, keep the bowels open, and bathe the feet in warm water at bed time.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

THE GULF SQUADRON.

The following is a list of the vessels of war of the home squadron ordered to the West Indies: The Colorado, flag ship of the home squadron, recently sailed from Norfolk, is one of the six new steam frigates, and according to the last navy register is of 3400 tons burthen, and mounts 40 heavy guns; the Wabash, another of those large steam frigates, and is of 3200 tons, and also mounts 40 heavy cannon; the brigantine Dolphin, a small vessel of 224 tons, and carries 6 light thirty-two pounders; the steamer Arctic, of 235 tons, was built by the Treasury Department for a light ship, but was purchased, equipped and manned with special regard to the search for Dr. Kane's expedition in 1855—has since been used as a despatch vessel, and is armed with three guns; the steamer Water-Witch, a side-wheel steamer of 378 tons, of light draft and light build, and was constructed in 1845 for the survey of the Paraguay—of late she has been used to convey ordnance, stores, etc., from Washington to the several naval stations; the Fulton, built in 1837, and the first steam frigate in our navy, is a heavily timbered vessel of 693 tons—she was razed in 1852, and is reported one of the fastest side-wheel sea steamers afloat—she is an efficient vessel, and carries five guns.

"MIRALDA: or, The Justice of Tacon."—This new three act play, written by M. M. Ballou, and just performed at the Howard Athenæum of this city, is published and for sale by WM. V. Spencer, 128 Washington Street, Boston. Any person enclosing four postage stamps (twelve cents) to Mr. Spencer, will receive a copy by return of mail.

OUR DOLLAR MAGAZINE.—Let our subscribers review the back numbers of this Magazine, since January, and realize what we are sending to them for one dollar a year!

PERSONAL.—The Russian bride of Mr. Hume, the great American medium, is not rich in the circulating medium.

JUST SO.—It may seem right to a man to keep borrowing from his neighbors, but the end thereof is—very cross neighbors.

THE BRITISH WEST INDIA FLEET.

The British already have on their West India station a fleet of ships of twice and a half the number of guns of the American squadron, even including the vessels now under orders for the Gulf. They have seventeen vessels in all, twelve of which are steamers, carrying in the aggregate 357 guns, as follows: Avalanche, 18 guns; Atalanta, 16; Basilisk, steamer, 6; Buzzard, steamer, 6; Cumberland, 70; Devastation, steamer, 6; Forward, steam gunboat, 2; Harrier, steamer, 17; Imaum, 72; Indus, 78; Jasseur, steam gunboat, 1; Jasper, steam gunboat, 1; Leopard, steamer, 18; Skipjack, steam gunboat, 2; Styx, steamer, 6; Tartar, steamer, 21; Terror, steamer, 16. Total, 357.

The British steamer Styx, of which so much has been heard of late, is rated a steam paddle wheel sloop on the royal navy list, and is 1400 tons burden, 280 horse power, and carries six heavy cannon. She draws about fourteen feet of water. The Buzzard is a paddle wheel sloop, with engines of 800 horse power, and mounts six guns. The Basilisk is a paddle wheel steam sloop of 400 horse power, and six guns. The steam gunboats are screw steamers of about 600 tons, and mount one or two guns. They are of light draft and rigged as three-masted schooners.

DOMESTIC EMBELLISHMENTS.—There is nothing inside a home that so much adds to its value as books, magazines and newspapers. Where they are to be had so cheaply there is no excuse in being without them.

A BRIGHT IDEA.—That was a bright idea of a man who had a light five dollar piece and got rid of it by putting it between two cents and paying it to a tollman.

LAW AND GRAMMAR.—"Is that law, your honor?" asked a Kentucky attorney of a judge. "If the court understand herself, and she think she do, it are," replied the dignified official.

RAILROADS.—The New Haven Register says the season for getting killed on railroads is just commencing again.

THE TEA WE DRINK.

Probably about one half of the human family refresh themselves with the Chinese herb. A large portion of Asia, all Europe, and all civilized America, imbibe the steaming potion, with or without sugar and cream, varying the ingredient sometimes with butter and oatmeal, as in the case of the Thibetians, alluded to by us some time ago. It is estimated that the total product of the tea plant, in China alone, is one million of tons, and of this enormous quantity the civilized world probably consumes about two hundred and fifty million pounds, leaving the balance to be steeped or stewed by the semi-barbarians of Asia. The prominent and distinctive characteristic of the tea plant, is a volatile oil, with an aroma highly acceptable to most people, though occasionally persons are found to whom it is very offensive. Another constituent of tea is called by chemists theine; the same is found in coffee, and is hence sometimes called caffeine. This substance is remarkable for the large proportion of nitrogen which it contains, it being twenty-seven per cent., and larger than that of any other vegetable substance, so far as known to science. Theine is said to have the effect of lessening the necessity for food, or of preventing in some degree the natural waste of the body. Hence, probably, the reviving and sustaining effects which are observed in the use of tea and coffee. Tea also contains, in moderate proportion, tannin, the distinguishing substance of nutgalls, and is therefore slightly astringent. There is also a large proportion, say about twenty per cent., of that nutritious ingredient, gluten. Our readers can easily see from this brief analysis, why tea sustains and nourishes patients, when too low to take any ordinary food.

The Chinese have used tea as a beverage from a very remote period; tradition tracing tea drinking back to the third century of our era. In the year 600, it was in more general use among them, and in the course of four hundred years more, its virtues were resorted to by the Japanese, the nations of Hindoostan, and other Asiatic countries bordering upon China. The Dutch first introduced it into Europe, from India, in 1610. It found its way from Holland to England in 1646, Lords Ossory and Arlington conveying it there as a great luxury. A Dutch physician, named Bontekae, having written a treatise highly extolling its medicinal virtues, the article became quite popular among the wealthy classes in England, and was imported from Holland, and sold at the rate of sixty shillings per pound. The British East India Company subsequently took up the tea traffic with China, and enjoyed the monopoly of the English market in the importation of this article for a period of more than a hundred and fifty years, down to 1833, when parliament threw open the China trade for free competition. Tea was a staple article of trade in the American colonies from a very early period in their history, and the destruction of three hundred and forty chests in Boston Harbor, in 1773, has given to the herb an historical application which will ever be remembered so long as the records of American Independence shall endure. A phial of the Boston Harbor tea is now preserved in the cabinet of Harvard University as a precious relic of Revolutionary times. The portion thus preserved was taken from his shoes by Thomas Melville, of Boston, one of that celebrated tea party, and treasured by him as a memento of the daring exploit until the period of his death. His heirs placed it in the cabinet at Cambridge for future preservation. The action of time has reduced the tea to a fine powder, and destroyed its flavor; but there is an odor of patriotism about it, that grows stronger and stronger as time rolls on, and the magnificent destiny of our country unfolds itself.

Botanists recognize several varieties, but only one species of the tea plant, and it is said to bear a strong resemblance to the well-known camellia japonica of the conservatory. The plant is raised from seed, and when a year old is transplanted, and kept close cropped, so as to increase the leaves. The gathering of the leaves is begun when the bushes are four years old, and continued for seven or eight years, when the bushes getting coarse and woody, are dug up and replaced by new plants. The harvest season in China is in May and June; the leaves being picked by hand, and chiefly by women. The green leaves exhibit little of the odor or flavor which is recognized in tea, these being developed by the subsequent process of roasting or drying. The two varieties known as green and black tea, may be produced from the same plant; the difference between them being caused by the manner in which the leaves are cured; the former being the result of rapid curing over fire, and the latter of a slower process of drying in the open air. In practice, however, these varieties are usually made in different districts, for the sake of convenience or custom. The plant thrives well in the cooler parts of the tropics, or in the southerly portion of the northern temperate zone. It could not, however, become a profitable object of culture in this country, owing to the amount of manual labor requisite for its preparation for commerce, and the high price of labor here.

HUGH MILLER THE GEOLOGIST.

One of the most remarkable men that Scotland has ever produced, was Hugh Miller the geologist, whose sad and singular death about a year and a half ago, was mourned throughout the civilized world as a great loss to the cause of science. Mr. Miller was a North Scotchman, and possessed the peculiar mental traits of that sturdy race, in a remarkable degree. With a keen perception of the beautiful in nature, and reverence for the mysterious and supernatural, was blended a fervid poetic feeling; and for a basis of this superstructure, he possessed great powers of application, strong reasoning faculties, and thorough independence of thought. His success in life was due to his natural abilities and the circumstances by which he was surrounded, and not to early education or subsequent patronage. He was born at Cromarty, a seaport town on Maray Frith, in the northeast part of Scotland, and was the son of a humble sea-faring man, who ran his own square-rigged sloop in the coasting trade. His father was cast away and lost at sea when Hugh was only five years old. The tendency to the supernatural developed itself in the boy's nature, even at this early age; for the death of his father was foreboded to him by the vision of a dis severed hand and arm, seen at the self-opened door of his mother's cottage, in the early evening twilight. On the evening previous to this apparition, the family had received a letter from the father, written just before the fatal storm, but the vessel never returned.

The young Hugh was left much to the care of his Uncle Sandy, a master quarry-man, and in his rambles with him, acquired a strong taste for natural history. At the age of seventeen he worked in the quarries of Cromarty, and then began to discover the fossil wonders of the Old Red Sandstone, which he has since made world-famous by his writings. Here commenced his practical and theoretical knowledge of geology—a study well calculated by its marvellous revelations of past ages, and its close and exact reasoning, to fill and satisfy a mind constituted like his. His subsequent works upon the subject of geology, while they have commanded the respect and admiration of the most scientific minds of Europe, for their profound research and strength of argument, have, by the charm of their style, and their rich blending of poetry with philosophy, rendered the subject plain and deeply interesting to the general reader, and perfectly enchanting to the young. No writer of any country has done so much as Miller to popularise the science; and not by any shallow treatment thereof has this great result been accomplished; but by giving to its otherwise dry details an interest which appeals to the observation and reflection of every active mind. The past, the mysterious past, has a charm for all; and Hugh Miller, as though recognizing the truth of Daniel Webster's brief and comprehensive definition of the word, geology, as "the earth's history, written by itself," has displayed page after page of that history in a manner to win the attention of all, and gratify their strong desire to know something of the past of our globe.

The principal works of Miller bearing upon his favorite science are, "Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland," "The Old Red Sandstone," "The Footprints of the Creator," "First Impressions of England," and "The Testimony of the Rocks." He had also purposed writing a more general and comprehensive work, to be called "The Geology of Scotland;" but the over-wrought brain swerved from its axis of intelligence, ere this work was entered upon, and closed his earthly life. Mr. Miller's mind had the deep religious tone which distinguishes his countrymen, and early in life became deeply interested in the controversies which have rent the church of Scotland. Taking the independent side, he was the champion of the freedom of the church; and in the year 1839, in a pamphlet addressed to Lord Brougham, upon the occasion of his speech against the popular side of the question in the appeal before the House of Lords, he exhibited such a talent and power that he was at once called by the liberal party to take the post of leader, and to edit their new organ, called the "Witness." The letter to Brougham was distinguished by a strength, freshness and force that compare favorably with the best productions of Junius. It inspires the reader with a very high idea of the controversial ability of Miller. The cause of the free church was advocated by him with great energy and strength, and at the disruption of the church establishment in 1843, which set the free church upon an independent basis, Miller obtained a victory which filled his heart with satisfaction, and crowned his career with honor. During all this polemical war, he constantly pursued his geological investigations, and published the results thereof to the world. When that war was closed, he gave all his talents to the cause of science till the war of life was closed. In fact, his last work, "The Testimony of the Rocks," so tasked his mind, that the latent tendency of his nature to superstition became active and dominant; and at its completion, the over-strained brain gave forth alarming signs of mental discord.

He complained of occasional sharp pains, as though a dagger were thrust through the brain, and was affected with aberration of mind, visions of assassins in pursuit of him, and the most distressing phantasms. In one of these dreadful attacks, he laid violent hands upon his life, and shot himself through the heart, with a pistol. Thus perished one whose pure and upright life might well have promised greater length of days, had not his zeal for science rent in twain the seat of reason, and dethroned the kingly intellect. Shall that monarch perish in oblivion, or will it reign again where earthly fetters cannot bind the spirit?

THE COOLEST YET.

A good anecdote is told of a man named Bently, a most confirmed drinker, who would never drink with a friend or in public, and always bitterly denied, when a little too steep, ever tasting liquor. One day some bad witnesses had concealed themselves in his room, and when the liquor was running down his throat, seized him with his arm crooked and his mouth open, and holding him fast, asked him with an air of triumph, "Ah, Bently, have we caught you at last? You never drink, ha!" Now one would have supposed that Bently would have acknowledged the corn. Not he; with the most grave and inexpressible face, he calmly, and in a dignified manner said, "Gentlemen, my name is not Bently!"

CONSEQUENCE OF EXTRAVAGANCE.—Women of fashion in Paris are carrying extravagance in dress to a terrible extent; but when was it otherwise? One fair dame, after running herself deeply into debt, has become the inmate of a nunnery, and left her many creditors in the lurch.

THE LAST OF EARTH.—The final slab has been placed over the remains of the late Duke of Wellington, in the crypt at Paul's Cathedral, London. The sarcophagus was then hermetically sealed, probably never again to be opened. The tomb is constructed of the purest porphyry.

REGISTER YOUR JOKES.—An ironmonger had to send in an account, lately, for a new register stove, to an author, and thought that he must necessarily be facetious; so he headed the bill—"A memorial of the departed grata."

METAPHYSICS.—Metaphysics resemble a French dinner; you may enjoy the results, but should never seek to dive into the processes by which they have been attained.

THE VALUE OF TIME.

It is said that "time is money;" but that does not tell the whole story, for time may be more than money, and it may be less. Ask the ardent lover, about to be separated from his adored mistress for long, long years, how much money would express the balance of the last hours he is to pass with her. What would his answer be, expressed in dollars and cents? Ask the squalid miser, as he draws his last breath, and his dim eye closes on his heaps of shining gold, at what price he would value a few more hours to enjoy the sight of his worshipped hoard? Ask the affectionate son, as he stands beside the death-bed of a beloved parent, whether another hour of that precious life could be expressed in money? They will tell you that no amount of money could represent the value of the time they covet. On the other hand, the long, weary days of the suffering poor, the dreary, heavy hours of the listless idler, have no money value. Either would barter all the irksome time that lingers on their hands, for a single coin that would give to one the bread of hunger, or escape from self to the other. Furthermore, there are various kinds of money; hard money and paper money, current and uncurrent, counterfeit and genuine; and before we settle down content with the axiom that "time is money," let us see for ourselves what kind of money our time may be; whether it be of intrinsic value, or only assumed; whether it will pass readily in exchange for others' property or service, or only at a discount; whether, in short, it be worth what it pretends to be, or is only a base imitation of the genuine article. By scrutinizing thus the value of time, each for himself, every man will find that time is money, only when it is wisely and well employed. To make time real money, we must improve it by labor of the body, mind and soul. When we have thus made our time valuable to ourselves, it will be of value to others, and not till then; and then alone shall we be able to realize by sweet experience, that "time is money."

MECHANICS' HOME.—Mr. Hayes, late of the Philadelphia firm of Hayes & Dreer, has bequeathed $50,000 for the foundation of an asylum for aged mechanics in Philadelphia. The institution is to receive the title of "Hayes's Mechanics' Home."

REALITIES OF LIFE.—A person being asked what was meant by the realities of life, answered, "Real estate, real money, and a real good dinner, none of which could be realized without real hard work."

THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

Among the Western States of the Union, there is no one that stands forth more prominent than Illinois, for its solid growth, substantial wealth, and commanding influence. Its soil and climate presented strong attractions to the earlier western emigrants, while its admirable frontage on the Mississippi, made it readily accessible to the hardy pioneers of American civilization. The consequence that naturally followed from these advantages, was the rapid settlement of the State by a body of sturdy men, whose chief purpose was to build up for themselves and their posterity, a prosperous and happy home under the flag of the American Union. Emigrating largely from New England, these men, composed of the best stock of this section of the country, were deeply imbued with the established moral and religious sentiment thereof, and a full measure of its liberal ideas of public policy. Conjoined with these requisite elements of an upright and happy commonwealth, was a due portion of that love of industry and spirit of enterprise which have made New England a thriving and prosperous country, under all circumstances, even the most adverse, and against the severe obstacles of a niggardly soil and capricious climate. Emigration, at the time of the settlement of Illinois, was wisely left to follow its natural impulse, instead of being stimulated and enforced by artificial aids; and this freedom of action gave to that emigration an average of New England character, instead of a heterogeneous compound of propagandism, speculation and inefficiency. Zealots, sharpers, and useless idlers, had no temptation presented to them through the facilities of associated aid, to people the new State. Every man was left free to act for himself, and the result was that the emigration to Illinois was composed of men who were able to go, and able to stay when they got there.

This characteristic of unbiassed individuality in the early settlers of Illinois, has made in the brief period of her existence, the strong, influential and prosperous State that we find her to-day, and its indelible stamp will give her a powerful influence upon the Great West for a long time to come. She is now the nursery of western habits and western sentiment; and her opinions and example are doing for the young West, what New England did for her, forty years ago. Everything connected with the circumstances, condition, and prospects of this State, becomes therefore of far greater interest to our whole country than it would be from its bearing upon her prosperity alone. Her thought and opinion is to be the index of the West, and from her are to go forth the missionaries who are to build up the physical and moral prosperity of the new States and Territories beyond. By no fact is this view of the destiny of Illinois more clearly illustrated than by the record of her present prosperous physical condition, the result, mainly, of the New England virtues which have been exemplified in her growth. The official documents of the State valuation for the year 1857, show the present wealth of the State amounts to over four hundred millions of dollars, and this is available, productive property. Such a result, in a new State, scarcely a generation old, is almost incredible, did we not have the figures of the State auditor to establish its truth; and it cannot fail to confirm the impression which her early history makes upon the mind, that she is destined to be in time to come, the centre of wealth and influence for the western section of our Union.

MODEST ADVERTISEMENTS.

A gentlemanly assurance is manifested in some of the advertisements we find in the New York papers. For instance, one specimen of Young America informs the feminine public that "The handsomest young gentleman in this city, or elsewhere, desires to marry the most beautiful young lady he can find." And we are also told by another advertiser, that "Any passable lady, of good morals and a fair degree of accomplishments, wishing a kind and noble-hearted husband, who would adore a wife as an angel, can obtain one by addressing, in confidence, G. Woodbine, Post Office." Queer things—these advertisements! Fanny world we live in!

AN EDITORIAL HINT.—The editor of a Buckeye paper has been threatened with a flogging. He very quietly insinuates that he may be found up stairs, and that it is "but forty feet to the bottom."

BOTTLING SODA.—Five hundred to a thousand dozen of soda are bottled daily in New York, which indicates a tolerably steep consumption of the "ardent."

OLD KENTUCKY.—A Kentuckian being asked how much corn he raised, answered, "About ten barrels of whiskey, besides what we waste for bread."

SUPERSTITION.—In 1690 a dog in the town of Andover was charged with witchcraft and put to death.

ABOUT ELEPHANTS.

Among elephants, may be found as vicious brutes as ever walked upon four legs, or two either, and also as generous, noble-tempered animals, as good men ever delighted to their will by kindness. When Bishop Heber was travelling in Oude, three elephants were in his train. One was described by his mohout as a fine-tempered beast, but the other two as great rascals. Between a good elephant and its attendants, there seems to be the most perfect understanding. The man who walks by its side is talking to it all the time they are jogging on, and very often in a jargon which no one else can understand, but which is perfectly intelligible to the elephant. "My dove?" "Take care?" "Well done, my dear!" "My son!" "My wife!" If a fault is committed, "How could you do that?" If it is often repeated, "What can you be thinking of?" accompanied by a dig with the sharp iron hawkuss or ankush inflicted by the mohout.

But great as is the attachment of these animals to their keepers, and obedient as they are, generally, even to a tyrannical mohout, it is dangerous to try their tempers too far. Keepers who have needlessly mingled their caresses with blows, have felt the fatal effects of their wanton conduct. When the Vizier of Oude sent his embassy to meet Lord Cornwallis at Calcutta, there was among the elephants that carried the baggage a male, with a number of people on his back. This elephant, suddenly irritated by a violent, and, as far as we know, an undeserved stroke with the penetrating hawkuss, snatched the unhappy driver from his seat, held him up in his trunk so as to render escape or aid impossible, and, after suspending him, as if in warning to others, for a few moments, during which the trembling victim must have endured the very extremity of agonizing fear, deliberately dashed him to pieces. Not long ago, an unhappy keeper was killed on the spot by the elephant placed under his charge; he had provoked the vengeance of the long-suffering creature by his persecutions, and paid the deadly penalty.

But numerous as are the stories told of the stern vengeance of the elephant, there are not wanting instances where the punishment inflicted by the injured beast has been of a degrading and even ludicrous character—as if scorn and contempt were the predominant feelings that dictated the retribution. The dirty water-spout that overwhelmed the treacherous Delhi tailor, who had treated the elephant to a prick with his needle, instead of an apple, and the muddy shower bestowed on Lieutenant Shipp (who had irritated another by giving him a large quantity of Cayenne pepper between two pieces of bread), six weeks after the commission of the offence, and as a termination to the caresses and fondling of the lieutenant, are of this character, as well as the delayed vengeance of the elephant mentioned by Williamson under the name of the Paugul, or fool. The Paugul, who had most likely been put upon, like other butts, till he could stand it no longer, had refused to bear a greater weight upon a march than he liked, and the angry quarter-master threw a tent-pin at the head of the obstinate beast. Some days afterwards, as the elephant was going to water, he came suddenly upon the quarter-master, seized him with his trunk, and lifting him among the branches of a large tamarind tree, there left him between heaven and earth, as being unworthy of either, to hold on if he were able, and get down if he could.

WHAT NEXT?—A sailor once went to see a juggler exhibit his tricks; there happened to be a quantity of gun-powder in the apartment underneath, which took fire and blew up the house. The sailor was thrown into the garden behind, where he fell without being hurt. He stretched his arms and legs, got up, shook himself, rubbed his eyes, and cried out—conceiving what had happened to be only part of the performance, and perfectly willing to go through the whole—"Well, I wonder what the fellow intends to do next!"

GENUINE POLITENESS.—A gentleman once conversing in the company of ladies, and criticising rather severely the want of personal beauty in other ladies of their acquaintance, remarked: "They are the ugliest women I know;" and then, with extraordinary politeness, added—"present company always excepted."

DENTISTIC.—Philosophers have asserted that the reason why ladies' teeth decay sooner than men's, is because of the friction of the tongue and the sweetness of the lips!

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.—A tenant who owes one quarter, and knows if he stays another, he must pay double before he can be quits, generally quits first.

CHURCHES.—There are one hundred and six churches in the good city of Boston, and one or two more are contracted for.

INDIA.—England is paying too dear for the whistle in the Far East, we fear.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT WASHINGTON.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTE.

THE public buildings at Washington are of a magnitude and interest sufficient to fulfil the expectations of the stranger who visits the Federal City, how much soever he may be disappointed in finding how far short it falls of the realization of the splendid plans of the founders of the metropolis. First in the series of our present illustrations we have placed the Smithsonian Institution, which stands on a gently rising ground, south of Pennsylvania Avenue, and west of the capitol. The edifice is 450 feet long by 140 wide, and is built of red sandstone, in the Romanesque or Norman style, and is embellished by nine towers of from 75 to 150 feet in height, and when viewed from Capitol Hill, has an imposing effect. In the building is a lecture-room large enough to seat from 1200 to 2000 persons, a museum 200 feet long for objects of natural history, one of the best supplied laboratories in the United States, a gallery 120 feet long for paintings and statuary, and a room capable of containing a library of 100,000 volumes, and actually numbering about 40,000.

The Smithsonian Institution derives its name and endowment from James Smithson, Esq., of England. Mr. Smithson was a son of the first Duke of Northumberland, and was educated at Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his scientific attainments. He was an associate of most of the eminent men of science of the last generation in England. He had no fixed residence, and formed no family ties. He died at Genoa, June 27, 1829. From the property which he received from his mother, and the ample annuity allowed him by his father, his frugality enabled him to accumulate a fortune, which at the time of his death, amounted to about £120,000 sterling. By his will, he directed that the income of the property should be paid to a nephew during his life, and that the property itself should descend to his children, if he had any, absolutely and forever. "In case of the death of my said nephew without leaving a child, or children, or of the death of the child or children he may have had under the age of 21 years, I then bequeath the whole of my property to the United States of America, to found at Washington, under the name of the Smithsonian Institution, an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men." Such are the words of the will, and the only words of Smithson which have come to us relating to this remarkable bequest. Of the reasons which led him to make this disposal of his fortune, we know nothing except by inference. He was never in America, had no friends or acquaintances here, and is supposed to have had no particular fondness for republican institutions. The event having occurred, in which the claim of the United States attached, the particulars of the bequest were communicated to our government, and both Houses of Congress passed a bill, which was approved on the first of July, 1836, authorizing the president to appoint an agent to prosecute, in the Court of Chancery in England, the right of the United States to the bequest, and pledging the faith of the United States to the application of the fund to the purposes designed by the donor. It was paid into the treasury of the United States in sovereigns, during the month of September, 1838. The amount of the fund at this time was $515,169. It was not till eight years after this period that the act establishing the Smithsonian Institution was finally passed. This act creates an establishment, to be called the Smithsonian Institution, composed of the President and Vice President of the United States, the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy, the Postmaster General, Attorney General, and Mayor of Washington, with such others as they may elect honorary members. It devolves the immediate government of the Institution upon a board of regents, of fifteen members, viz., the Vice President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and the Mayor of Washington, ex officio; three members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President thereof; three members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker; and six persons to be chosen from the citizens at large, by joint resolution of the Senate and House, two of whom shall be members of the National Institute, and the other four inhabitants of States, and no two from the same State. The act establishes a permanent loan of the original fund ($515,169) to the United States, at 6 per cent. interest; appropriates the accumulated interest, then amounting to $24,129, or so much as might be needed, together with so much of the accruing income as might be expended in any year, to the erection of a building; provides for the establishment of a library, museum, chemical laboratory, etc., and left most of the details of the organization to the board of regents. The cost of the building was limited (with furniture, grading the grounds, etc.) to $250,000. This was taken mostly from the income of the original and building funds, so as to save $150,000 of the building fund, which added to the original fund, makes a permanent fund of $675,000, yielding nearly $40,000 per annum. This income, with all sums received from other sources, is to be permanently and equally divided between two great methods of increasing and diffusing knowledge—the first by publications, researches and lectures—the second by collections of literature, science and art. The first two volumes of a series entitled “Smithsonian Contributions to Knowledge,” in 4to., have been issued; also several works in a series of a more popular character, and in 8vo. form, entitled “Smithsonian Reports.” It is proposed, also, to publish, for still wider circulation, a monthly “Bulletin.” Researches in various departments of science have been instituted or aided by the Institution, and several courses of free lectures have been delivered.

The War Department is one of the four buildings erected on the four corners of the President's Square, at a time when the business of the nation was trifling compared with its present extent. It has a large and well selected library, collected for the use of officers of the army. In one room are several trophies captured from different enemies, and worthy of more care. The commander-in-chief used to reside in Washington, but has recently removed his head-quarters to New York. In the yard is the immense mass of native copper, weighing some five tons, brought from the shores of Lake Superior.

The National Observatory, under the care of Lieutenant Maury, U. S. N., is only surpassed by that of Russia, and is the depot of all the chronometers, maps and instruments used by the navy. The largest telescope is a fourteen inch refractor, with an object-glass of nine inches. It is mounted in a revolving dome on the summit of the main building, and is so arranged with clock-work and machinery, that when directed to a star in the morning, and adjusted, it so follows the heavenly luminary in its path, that at night, on looking through the glass, the star is visible. There are many other instruments—some so rarely adjusted, that their only variation is caused by the heat of the person of those who approach them; but the most curious is the electric clock. This is so connected with magnetic apparatus that, when necessary, its ticks are distinctly heard at Boston, Cincinnati, New Orleans, and other remote spots. Every day at ten minutes before twelve, a large black ball is hoisted to the summit of a staff on the Observatory, and exactly at noon it drops, giving the whole city and its environs a chance to regulate their watches.

The Arsenal, with its curious machinery propelled by steam, is used for the manufacture of cannon, small arms, bullets, percussion caps, etc. In the store-houses are every variety of arms and equipments—from the heavy “Columbus” cannon used in fortresses, to the mountain howitzer, carried on the back of a mule, and so down to holster pistols. In the model room is a curious collection of ancient and modern weapons, while outside are cannon captured at Yorktown, Saratoga, Niagara and Vera Cruz, with the guns of Duncan's noted battery. There are also complicated apparatus for testing the force of gunpowder, and for experiments with artillery.

The Post-Office is an extensive marble building, with two wings, adorned in front and at the ends with fluted columns.

The Pension Office occupies a portion of the large edifice represented by our artist, the property of Mr. Winder, who leases it to government at a good percentage on the cost. It also contains the pay department of the army, and other branches of the army and navy clerical force. The Treasury Department is a new stone building, 340 feet long, and 170 wide, but when completed it will be 457 feet in length, and will occupy the entire eastern front of the President's Square. Its front is an imposing colonnade, in the Grecian style of architecture, but ill-adapted to the building, as it occupies a deal of room, and keeps the offices darkly shaded. There are upwards of one hundred, and fifty rooms, where all the government financial business is transacted with an accuracy and simplicity of method certainly wonderful. The secretary of the treasury, who directs this immense system of accounts, has under his direction, 1 assistant secretary, 2 comptrollers, 6 auditors, 2 treasurers, 1 register, 1 solicitor, 1 commissioner, 323 clerks, 15 messengers and 12 watchmen—quite an army. The Attorney-General's Department is opposite the treasury, and occupies a spacious house, neatly fitted up when Gen. Cushing came into office. There is an excellent legal library, and every facility for promptly forming legal opinions upon matters referred by the president or his secretaries. The Department of the Interior, comprising the patent office, is the most interesting of the departments. The building which it is destined to occupy is yet unfinished. When the new wings are ready for use the building will contain the land office, patent office, Indian office, and pension office. The chief attraction of the building now is the spacious hall up stairs, in which are deposited the collection of the national institute and of the exploring expedition, and many other articles presented to our government by foreign powers. Among these are many relics of Washington, including his uniform, camp-chest, sword, etc., the original Declaration of Independence, Franklin's printing-press, a treaty signed by Napoleon, and other objects of priceless value. The rare collection brought home by the United States Exploring Expedition embraces almost every object used on those wonderful islands of the southern seas, and already has a box been received from Japan, containing specimens of the manufactures of that terra incognita. The models of articles patented are now on the lower floor, but will soon be arranged and classified in handsome iron cases. To such of our readers as purpose visiting Washington the following general description of it may prove interesting:

Though not a seven-hilled city, Washington has, as well as Rome, its Capitoline Hill, commanding views scarcely less striking than those of the Eternal City. It is situated on the left bank of the Potomac River, between two small tributaries, the one on the east called the East Branch, and the one on the west called Rock Creek. The latter separates it from Georgetown. The general altitude of the city plot is forty feet above the river, but this is diversified by irregular elevations, which serve to give variety and commanding sites for the public buildings. The plot is slightly amphitheatrical, the President's House on the west standing on one of the sides, and the Capitol on the other, while the space between verges towards a point near the river. The President's House and the Capitol stand centrally with regard to the whole, though situated at the distance of one mile from each other, the former forty-four feet above the Potomac, and the latter seventy-two feet. The summit of the hill on which the Capitol stands is the commencement of a plain, stretching east, while that to the north of the President's House tends westward. Perhaps no better commendation can be given to the locality of Washington than that of its having been chosen by him whose name it bears. When the streets shall have been lined with buildings, few cities can ever have presented a grander view than that which will be offered to the spectator from the western steps of the Capitol, looking towards the President's House, with Pennsylvania Avenue stretching before him for more than a mile, with a breadth of 160 feet, the view terminated on the west by the colonnade of the treasury buildings and the palatial residence of the nation's chief magistrate. On his left, towards the river (itself more than a mile in width), is an extensive park, enclosing the Smithsonian Institute, with its picturesque towers, and the lofty column reared to the memory of Washington. On the right he will have beneath him the General Post-Office, the Patent Office, the City Hall, and doubtless still more splendid public and many sumptuous private dwellings, which may have been erected ere another generation passes away. Nor would Washington lack commercial facilities, but for the still greater advantages possessed by its older sister cities. The natural commercial advantages of Washington are probably not surpassed by any capital in Europe; but our country so abounds in fine localities for commercial towns that those of Washington are thrown into the background. The plan of the city is unique, and everything is laid out on a scale that shows an anticipation of a great metropolis; and though these anticipations have not as yet been realized, they are entirely within the probabilities of the future. The city plot, which lies on the west border of the sixty square miles which now constitute the District of Columbia, extends four and a half miles in a northwest and northeast, and about two and a half in a northeast and southwest direction, covering an area of nearly eleven square miles. A very small portion of this, however, is as yet built upon. The whole site is traversed by streets running east and west and north and south, crossing each other at right angles. The streets that run north and south are numbered east and west from North and South Capitol Street (whose name will indicate its position), and are called, for example, East and West Second or Third Streets; while those running east and west are numbered from East Capitol Street, and are named alphabetically, north or south, A, B, or C Street, etc. The plot is again subdivided by wide avenues, named from the fifteen States existing when the site of the capital was chosen. These avenues run in a southeast and northwest, or in a southwest and northeast direction, often, but not always parallel to each other, and their points of section forming large open spaces. Four of these avenues, and North and South and East and West Capitol Streets, intersect each other at the Capitol grounds, and five avenues and a number of streets at the Park around the President's House. It will be readily seen, if this plan should be filled up, that, combined with its undulating grounds, surrounding hills, public buildings, park, monuments, etc., it will give a coup d'œil unequalled for magnificence in modern times. Pennsylvania Avenue, between the Capitol and President's House, is the only one that is densely built upon for any considerable extent. The streets are from 70 to 110 feet in width, and the avenues from 130 to 160 feet.

POST-OFFICE.

PENSION OFFICE.

The National Institute holds its meetings at the Patent Office, and has for its object the culture of science generally. It has a library of 4000 volumes, which is open to the public, besides a cabinet of medals and coins. Peter Force, Esq., has a private library of 50,000 volumes; a rare, if not the only, instance of so large a private collection of books in our country. Mr. Corcoran, the wealthy banker, has a fine gallery of paintings, which is open to the public on Tuesdays and Fridays. The National Medical College, established in 1823, is a flourishing institution, with a faculty of seven professors. The Columbia College is located on high ground, just without the city limits, and directly north of the President's House, commanding a magnificent view of the city, the Potomac, and the surrounding country. This college was incorporated in 1821, and had in 1850 for its faculty, besides the president, 12 professors and tutors, and 100 students on its lists. There were in Washington in 1850, 20 public schools, with 1989 pupils and $13,082 income; 35 academies, etc., with 1494 pupils and $41,620 income.

There were, in 1852, about forty churches in Washington, of which four were Baptists, four Catholic, five Episcopalian, one Friends' meeting-house, two Lutheran, seven Methodist, six Presbyterian, one Unitarian, and about six colored churches. Among the finest of the churches is Trinity; which is of mixed Gothic and Eastern orders, with a front of red sandstone, situated on West Third Street.

We condense the following from Miss Lynch's description of Washington:—The open waste lying between the Capitol, the President's House, and the Potomac, is about to be converted into a national park, upon a plan proposed by the lamented A. J. Downing. The area contains about 150 acres, and the principal entrance is to be through a superb marble gateway, in the form of a triumphal arch, which is to stand at the western side of Pennsylvania Avenue. From this gateway a series of carriage drives, forty feet wide, crossing the canal by a suspension bridge, will lead in gracefully curved lines beneath lofty shade-trees, forming a carriage drive between five and six miles in circuit. The grounds will include the Smithsonian Institute and Washington's monument. The parks round the President's House and the Capitol have already been mentioned. Lafayette Park, on the north side of Pennsylvania Avenue, in front of the executive mansion, is laid out and planted with shrubbery, etc., and contains, as we have elsewhere stated, a bronze equestrian statue of President Jackson. To avoid the unpleasant angularity, caused by the peculiar intersection of the streets, open spaces are to be left at these points, which are to be laid out and planted with trees, etc. There are extensive grounds around the City Hall called Judiciary Square.

Washington communicates with the south and southwest by steamboat to Acquia Creek, fifty-five miles below Washington, and thence by the Fredericksburg, Richmond and Potomac Railroad. A branch road running north to Baltimore connects with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Fifteen miles south of Washington, on the Potomac, is Mount Vernon, once the home, and now the tomb of Washington. Thirteen miles above Georgetown are the Great Falls of the Potomac, thought by many to equal, in wildness and picturesque interest, any in the country. The Little Falls, which have in all a descent of fifteen feet, are only three miles above Georgetown. An aqueduct is now being constructed to supply Washington with water from the Falls of the Potomac. Washington contains six banks, and about fourteen newspaper offices, five or six of which issue dailies.

The resident population of Washington in 1850, was 40,000; in 1855, about 55,000, and including Georgetown, 65,000. But this number is greatly increased during the sessions of Congress, by the accession not only of the members and their families, but of visitors and persons spending the winter or a portion of it here, for the purpose of enjoying the society and gayety of the capital. Though the growth of Washington has not been rapid, it has been steady, and the city has increased within the past few years in a considerably greater ratio than hitherto.

The site of the capital was selected at the original suggestion of President Washington, and by an act of Congress, July 16, 1790, the District of Columbia was formed. The cornerstone of the Capitol was laid by General Washington himself, September 18, 1793, and in 1800 the seat of government was removed hither from Philadelphia. The census of 1800 gave the population at 3210, which had increased to 8208 in 1810. In 1814, the city was taken by the British, when the Capitol, President's House, and the library of Congress were either wholly destroyed or greatly injured by fire, and other public work defaced. In 1820, the population was 13,247; 18,827 in 1830, and 23,364 in 1840. In 1846 was passed the act establishing the Smithsonian Institute; in 1850 the slave trade was abolished in the District of Columbia; and in 1851 the foundations were laid for the extension of the Capitol.

A most interesting and important paper was lately read before the New York Historical Society, by the librarian, Mr. George H. Moore, which proved beyond question, that Gen. Lee, of the Revolution, was a bold and well-nigh successful conspirator against Washington and the liberties of his country. The matter is left no longer in doubt, and that which has seemed strange and doubtful in his conduct is fully explained.

TREASURY.

NEW BEDFORD.

Among the most attractive cities of Massachusetts, is New Bedford, famed for its large participations in the whale fisheries. This city is beautifully located on the western bank of the Acushnet River, near to Buzzard's Bay. The land rises from the water with a gentle slope to the western limit of the city, displaying the buildings and gardens to great advantage to an observer on the water, or upon the opposite side of the river. It is a place of great prosperity, and much individual wealth, and a liberal and refined taste is exhibited in the public edifices. There are also many private residences that are built and furnished, without and within, with a solicity and magnificence quite unusual in American cities. These give an appearance of sub-from there to New Bedford, he was among the first settlers. He was largely instrumental in building up the new town, and giving to its commercial enterprise the direction and impetus which have since contributed so materially to its fame and prosperity. Mr. Rotch, by his straightforward manner and persuasive address, succeeded in securing the privilege of admission of his oil and sperm, duty free, into France, and subsequently into England, to the great benefit of himself and fellow-townsmen. His name for the new town did not stand, however, without amendment, as it was subsequently found necessary to prefix the word "New" to it, in order to distinguish it from the town of Bedford in Middlesex county, which was incorporated at an earlier period.

stantial prosperity to New Bedford, which is well borne out by the generally comfortable and tidy aspect of the city in all its details.

The ancient town of Dartmouth originally included the present site of New Bedford, the Indian name of which was Acchusnett. Dartmouth was incorporated by the colonial government in 1664. It is supposed that the first settlers on the part now occupied by New Bedford, were Friends, or Quakers. The town of New Bedford was incorporated in the year 1787. The land being owned by a man of the name of Russell, which was the family name of the Dukes of Bedford, in England, the name of Bedford was given to the new town at the instance of Mr. J. Rotch, a principal purchaser and settler. Mr. Rotch was a Quaker. He had carried on the whale fishery from Nantucket, and removing

During the Revolutionary War, the whale fisheries, the chief stay of New Bedford, were necessarily suspended. The hardy mariners of that town then turned their attention to privateering upon the enemy's vessels. They did such an extensive business in this hazardous and gallant pursuit, that the British were greatly annoyed, and determined to capture and destroy the place. A very large force under Gen. Gray, landed at Clark's Neck, and marched upon the town, which they captured; burning many buildings and vessels. The value of the property destroyed, was estimated at $326,266. At that time the population of the town was only about seven hundred. Since then it has gone on increasing with great rapidity, and now amounts to about twenty thousand. Within a few years a city government has been established.

SKETCHES OF JAVAN SCENES AND MANNERS.

On the succeeding pages we give several views illustrative of Javan life and customs, and the following geographical and historical details will add interest to the scenes. In 1847, Dr. W. R. Van Hoewell, a learned and scientific native of Holland, ten years resident at Batavia, undertook a journey through Java, and the adjacent Madura and Bali. The latter island has just been thrown open to the civilized world by the Dutch, their motive being the extermination of the pirates who made it a refuge. Java, it is well-known, belongs to the Dutch, and is a possession of vast commercial importance and wealth. Dr. Hoewell's expensive work, being the most recent authority, will be followed by us in our rapid sketches. Before falling into European hands, Java had had its revolutions and its wars, and a tumultuous and sometimes brilliant career. India, at a vague and distant epoch; Arabia, in times nearer to us, brought it their civil and religious institutions, and their half-civilization. At this time Islamism reigns there, under Dutch protection, over a population of 5,000,000 souls; but minds have preserved an Indian impress, and the soil is heaped with the wrecks of art from the shores of the Gangee, or the coast of Coromandel. When this civilization was expelled by the impetuosity of Mussulman fanaticism, it took refuge, towards the end of the fifteenth century, in the island of Bali. Our present sketches are confined to Java. Mr. Van Hoewell left Batavia on the 6th of May, 1847. This city, the capital of the Dutch East Indies, has about 120,000 inhabitants, communicates with the port of Anyer on the western coast, and with the other extremity of the island by a magnificent post-road nearly three hundred leagues long—a gigantic work, executed at the beginning of this century by Marshal Daendels, whose construction, like that of the Egyptian pyramids, but differing from them in utility, destroyed the lives of thousands of laborers. You have hardly quitted the city, when you see rising on the right two giant mountains, the Salak, 6670 feet high, and the Gede, whose ever-smoking crater attains an elevation of 9326 feet. But, before reaching it, you traverse Buitenzorg, which encloses the sumptuous palace of the Touan Bezar (in Malay, Grand Seigneur), the governor-general of the Dutch East Indies. Mr. Van Hoewell stopped here by invitation, and, being a Lutheran clergyman, performed divine service in a room of the palace—the church, built two hundred years ago, undergoing repairs—in presence of a few civilians, and the garrison composed of a half-company of European soldiers. He afterwards paid a visit to the Kampong, or Chinese quarter, where he was shown, in a wooden cabin, a batoutoulis, a stone covered with inscriptions, and two statues, the only remains of the empire of Padzadzaran, which fell under the blows of the Mussulman invaders. These wrecks, and those discovered further off, in the plain of Bandung, consist of a nandi and two statues; they are remarkable as being the only monuments of art existing in the western part of Java—whence the name of Sunda applied to the neighboring straits, and the archipelago of which Java forms a part—which, inhabited by a peculiar race, has only imperfectly felt the influence of Indian civilization. But Mr. Hoewell was assured that they were of the same style as the sculptures, spread in such vast numbers through the centre and east of the island. On leaving Buitenzorg, the road continued to rise, and the carriage-horses were changed for six vigorous buffaloes, and it was found necessary to scale on foot a portion of the slope of Megamendong (shrouded in clouds), which is not less than 4620 feet high. This is the culminating point of the road; a delightful coolness succeeds to the heat of the lower regions, forests nod overhead, and the eye ranges over a vast and beautiful prospect. Tjandjor, which Mr. Van Hoewell afterwards reached, is the chief place of one of the largest provinces or residences of Java, that of the Preanger Regents Chappen (Regencies of the Preanger or Prayhang), peopled by 800,000 inhabitants of the Sunda race, held in awe by a garrison of twenty men at the residence of Tomo. The description of this negri (the local name for an inhabited place of some importance), will give an idea of all the Javanese towns. "We enter the town through a sort of gate-way of stone or wood, and what do we see? Houses, of course, large and small, and palaces, is the answer. Nothing of the kind! You find broad and straight streets (lowourong) paved with river stones, and bordered on each side by palisades of bamboo seven or eight feet high. Beyond this kind of fortification, the eye reposes agreeably on the ever fresh verdure of trees loaded with fruit and flowers; but nowhere do you observe houses, or anything like them, for the houses of the natives are concealed behind this verdure." To this we must add a square in the European style, containing the hotel of the resident, or Dutch chief of the province, the lodging appropriated to travellers, and the houses of a few Christians; then the halon halon, a square plain, the south side of which is occupied by the dalam, or Javanese regent's house, and the west side by the massighit—a local corruption of the Arabic mesjid (mosque). After having been present at a soirée at the house of the resident, at which the regent and his lady figured in dresses much more rich than elegant; a party at which the chief amusement consisted in a representation of the bedoyos—female dancers in the pay of the regent—Mr. Van Hoewell pursued his journey, constantly busy with the physical and moral condition of the natives, and the means of advancing the civilization of the large population confided to the care of the Dutch government. The country abounds in natural objects of interest. Huge smoking craters in the midst of impenetrable forests which shelter the rhinoceros; rich plantations of tea or indigo, and fields of sugar cane, or thick jungles (the Javanese name is halang-halang), where the tiger watches for the brilliant-plumed and noisy peacock; huge warigins (the Ficus Indica), and fresh rivers glancing from cascade to cascade. Near Tjeribon, one of the oldest seats of the Dutch power at Java, is to be seen a pleasure-garden which belonged to one of the sultans of the country, a pensioner on the conquerors since 1819, and recently dead. The garden is entirely in the style of the celestial empire; and a native told Mr. Hoewell that it was laid out two hundred years ago by a Chinese, whose eyes were afterwards put out, that he might never construct one like it. There exist also in the environs the tombs of the Sheik Ibn Moulana, the first preacher of Islamism in the west of Java, and of the Sultan Togal Aroum, a sort of Javanese Nero. These are places of pilgrimage. A few miles beyond Tjeribon, you cross a bridge over the river (Tji) Parmali, which separates the two races, the Hendas and Javanese, and the eye embraces a vast plain terminated by the chain of Hamat, whose principal peak attains an elevation of eleven thousand feet. The sides of the mountain are covered with plantations of tea and coffee, one of the first of which is given in our first engraving. The residence of

HOUSE OF THE DUTCH RESIDENT AT SOURABAYA.

Tagal, where we now are, in 1846 produced 70,000 pounds of tea alone, to say nothing of sugar and coffee. We will not halt at Samarang and Sourabaya, considerable ports of an European appearance, and, with Batavia, the principal places of the island. We will only remark, that between these points Mr. Hoewell fixed, from popular tradition, the seat of the ancient kingdom of Menlang Kamoulau, of which the annals and poems of Java make frequent mention, but of which not even a wreck remains. The peasants point out only, with tokens of the most profound veneration, a wood which rises, according to them, on the site of the ancient kraton (palace of the sovereign). The spot is guarded, they say, by a contemporary tiger, so old that he cannot use his paws, and drags himself along upon his knees. At Simpang, two miles from Sourabaya, is the palace of the resident, represented in our second engraving. The population, comprising that of the neighboring island of Madura, reaches 1,230,000 souls. The resident, a political magistrate dependent on the governor-general, is commonly assisted, in each bordered by a fresh river, the Kalimas (golden river), and which has for perspective the cone of Ardjouna, 10,820 feet high, remind us that we are in the most historical part of Java; that where Volney would have had the amplest field for meditation, and whither we must go on the track of our zealous and intelligent guide, to visit the ruins of Modjopahit, the Javanese empire of Hindoo civilization, which had the most considerable political influence, and the most flourishing, if not the longest existence; for, founded in the year 1237 of the Javanese era, which began about 78 or 74 B.C., it fell in 1400. These ruins had met the fate of many ruins. They have served for stone or brick quarries; the road from Sourabaya to Modjokerta is paved with their spoils, and the materials for the greater part of the rich sugar establishments in the neighborhood have been taken from the same source. You reach it by a road shaded by large tamarind trees, which, through rice and sugar plantations, runs to the southwest towards the city of Kediri. The first monument you meet is only a few steps from the road; it is an almost formless mass, in which the eye at last distinguishes the remains of a gateway, doubtless that of a palace, as its fragments, as well as its ancient name, Gapuro Gapi (royal gate), seem to indicate. One of the piers is still forty-eight feet high, and the other is twenty-eight feet high; while the opening is twelve feet wide. Brick forms the principal material in all these ruins. Indeed, so frequently are what we usually deem only the results of modern art and labor brought to view in the explorations of this island, that one hardly realizes that they are the remains of a former state of civilized existence. Many monuments and ruins thus found, show that a people far in advance of most modern nations of the East once held dominion here, or that the ancestors of the present inhabitants had reached a point which their descendants have lost—a fact that the researches of most province, by a secretary and some European sub-residents. He acts on the native population only through the medium of a considerable number of chiefs, for the most part elective, who constitute a very ancient and strongly constructed hierarchy, an organization which Holland has carefully respected, with the view of sheltering itself behind it, and to soften the contact between the natives and their masters. The fragments of Hindoo sculptures, brought hither to ornament the park, discoverers in the East corroborate. In regard to the ruins now under consideration, we will briefly enumerate them in the order in which Mr. Van Hoewell visited them. After Tjandi Pasar, come the Tjandi Brawon, (temple of dust and ashes), a pyramidal mass seventy feet high, which presents in the interior a square hall 18 feet in diameter; the Danggar Pamalongan, a confused mass of stones with some fragments of sculpture; the Badjang Raton, a square building

30 feet high, surmounted by a pyramid of the same dimensions, on which we remarked numerous heads of Siva or Kalahooden, as well as a bas-relief; this building seems to have served as an entrance to a kraton; many tombs called Frang Woulan (light of the moon), and finally a souvenir, the little Moeteran temple pictured in our third engraving. This drawing was made in 1812, and given to Mr. Van Hoewell by the artist, Mr. Wardenaar, a Dutch official who, during the English occupation, made a complete plan of the ancient city of Modjopahit, and sketched its monuments. The whole was given to Sir W. Raffles for his great work on Java (history of Java), and it is much to be regretted that he did not make use of this precious collection, which it would be impossible to replace now—so active has the work of nature been since then—so many warings and climbing plants; glagahs and bamboos have struck their roots deeply into the foundations, and disjointed the walls, which are sinking and crumbling into shapeless masses of ruins. As has happened with the immense cities of Yutacan, a dense forest covers the site of the ancient Hindoo Javanese city, and prevents recognition of the different parts which composed it. Before quitting this melancholy site we must halt on the borders of the immense pond or sheet of water, a thousand feet long, six hundred broad, and eighteen feet deep. The sides and bottom are of brickwork. It does not appear that the Island of Madura, situated near the northeast coast of Java, and whose population has the same origin, and only differs in the changes incidental to a long separation, contains any monument of art. We will not follow Mr. Van Hoewell thither, but will start again with him from Sourabaya. To the south, at Trawas, the villa of the resident, situated at the height of 2500 feet, on the side of Pennanggoungang, in the midst of Persian and Dutch roses, he saw various remains of Hindoo sculptures, brought from the neighborhood, and belonging to the worship of Vishnoo and Buddha. Farther on he visited the monument of Djelok Toondo. We quote his own words: "Here again we find ourselves on classic ground. The Bottak, at the foot of which is situated the pasanggrahan (villa), and particularly the Pennanggoungang, whose crest, 5500 feet high, rises before you, bear yet innumerable vestiges of the worship which was practised during the Hindoo period. The slopes of this latter mountain are heaped with antique ruins—and, on the crest even, you see a kind of altar of dry stones, around which lie defaced sculptures. From six o'clock we had been on horseback, and were beginning to climb the slope of Pennanggoungang. At the foot of the mountain we took a road which led towards the south, and traversed vast coffee plantations. At the end of some time we were obliged to dismount and follow the road on foot, through a path obstructed by thorns, brush and bindweed, our Javanese guides preceding us, and cutting a passage with their knives. It was a painful tramp, which lasted more than half an hour, though we made but little progress in that time; but our trouble was amply recompensed when we suddenly discovered a masterpiece of Hindoo architecture, called in the country Djelok Toondo." (See engraving.) The entire monument consists of three basins formed in a square terrace, whose front border is furnished with a balustrade about two feet high. A wall 60 feet long and 16 high, backed on the mountain, juts over the basins, in which the water, brought from a distance in subterranean conduits, discharges through a serpent's head (naga). Mr. Van Hoewell also visited the ruins known by the natives under the name of Matzan Pontih (the white tiger), which seem to have formed a part of the town of Blambangan, formerly situated a little more to the southeast on the coast. The remains of walls seen at Matzan Pontih belonged, without doubt, to the general enclosure. The ruins are a complete wreck, and the process of restoration has been largely used in the engraving (No. 5), which represents a temple, the roof of which has disappeared, and of which the walls only remain. It presents four fronts, which the chisel of the sculptor has enriched with a profusion of flowers and other arabesques. The most remarkable part of this monument is the base on which it rests, and which is composed of a turtle entwined with two serpents, the whole in lava. The heads of the turtle and serpents unite on the western side, and form the entrance of the monument. The surrounding soil is strewn with mutilated statues, and the ruins occupy a considerable space. The history of the city of which these are the last remains, is truly a melancholy one. Founded towards the end of the 15th century, by the fugitive inhabitants of Modjopahit, who had just fallen under the arms of the Mussulmen, Blambangan became the seat of a little state, which, though Hindoo in religion and civilization, fell under the nominal sovereignty of the powerful sultans of Mataram, themselves vassals of the Dutch company of the East Indies; and it was in a war against the company that it fell in 1770, in consequence of an act of atrocious perfidy and cruelty, which forms one of the saddest episodes of the colonial history. It is a pity that the Dutch government takes no pains either to preserve the yet existing historical monuments of Java, or to publish at their expense a work containing correct representations of the more important and curious ruins. Aside from these more classic and romantic belongings of the island, the geographical features of Java present some interesting aspects. The island itself is divided nearly in its whole length by a range of mountains, running almost east and west, and rising to their greatest elevation towards the centre; but the range is much broken. In several hills of the great range of mountains are the craters of volcanoes, which formerly raged with fury, and poured forth torrents of lava; but, at present, none are known to be in activity, though many emit smoke after heavy rain. The most considerable rivers are the Joana and the Sedani, or Tangergang. On the bank or bar before Batavia the flood rises about six feet, and higher at spring-tides. High and low water occur only once in 24 hours. The island is traversed from east to west by a great military road, 700 miles in extent, constructed by General Daendels, a governor of the island, before it was taken by the English. The year, as is usual in tropical climates, is divided into the dry and the rainy seasons; or into the east, which is called the good monsoon, and the west, or the bad monsoon. Thunder storms are very frequent, especially towards the conclusions of the monsoons, when they occur almost every evening. The heat of the climate is various. Along the sea coast it is hot and sultry. At Batavia, from July to November, the thermometer generally stands, in the hottest part of the day, between 84 and 90 degrees, which it rarely exceeds; and, in the greatest degree of coolness in the morning it is seldom lower than 76 degrees. In some parts, particularly among feet. Fruits of all kinds are also abundant, many of them of exquisite delicacy and flavor. In the high ground in the interior they are found to dwindle and degenerate, in that equinoctial climate. The various kinds of plants and great abundance of herbs have afforded ample scope for the researches of the botanist, as flowers exhale their perfumes at all seasons of the year. Garden plants are produced in great variety, such as endives, cauliflowers, beans, cabbages, pompions, melons, patacas or water melons, yams, potatoes, etc. Maize or Indian corn is a favorite article of food with the natives, who eat it roasted. The natural fertility of the soil of Java supercedes the necessity of laborious tillage. The staple produce of the island is rice. Sugar, to the amount of ten millions pounds annually, is also made. Pepper is produced in great abundance and perfection; also indigo of a very superior quality. Cotton is cultivated in almost every part of the island; and the coffee plantations are extremely luxuriant. The soil is also very favorable to the growth of tobacco. There are many other herbs and plants, both medicinal and balsamic, that are but imperfectly known to Europeans. Wheat and barley are only grown in small quantities, on the hilly tracts, chiefly in the middle parts of the island, and would be produced in great abundance were due attention given to their culture. The tea plant is also indigenous here and is extensively cultivated. Some slight description of the method of culture may here be given. The plant is grown from seeds, which are sown in rows four or five feet asunder; and so many uncertainties are involved in their growth, that it is found necessary to sow as many as seven or eight seeds in every hole. The ground between the rows is kept free from weeds, and the plants are not allowed to attain a higher growth than admits of the leaves being conveniently gathered. The first crop of leaves is not collected until the third year after sowing;

the hills and in many of the inland towns, it is often so cold as to make a fire desirable. Java possesses a soil of extraordinary luxuriance and fertility. In the forests, especially in those on the northeast coast, is found an abundance of lofty trees, fit to be converted into masts, while forests of teak supply the place of oak for building ships, adapted to all purposes. Palms and cocoa trees are found in great variety, and are distinguished by their luxuriant growth, sometimes reaching to the astonishing height of 150

ing; and when the plants are six or seven years old, the produce becomes so inferior, that they are removed to make room for a fresh plantation. The leaves are gathered from one to four times during the year, according to the age of the tree; the most general number being three, the first of which takes place about April, the second about June, and the third about August. The earliest gathered leaves have the most delicate color, the most aromatic flavor, and the least bitterness; those of the second gathering have a dull green color, and less valuable qualities than the former ; while the third collection are of a darker green, and least valuable of the three. The quality is also affected by the age of the plant on which the leaves are borne, and by the degree of exposure to which they have become accustomed ; leaves from young plants, and those most exposed, being always the best. So particular are the Javanese to ensure the excellence of the finest sorts, that for two or three weeks before the harvest commences, the collectors, who are trained to this business from a very early age, are prohibited from eating fish or other kinds of food deemed unclean, lest by their breath they should contaminate the leaves. They are also made to take a bath two or three times a day, and are not allowed to gather the leaves with the naked fingers, but with gloves. These precautions, absurdly minute as they may to some appear, owe their origin to the evanescent nature of the finer qualities of the tea ; for the finest kind may be changed into an inferior tea in one night, if the proper attention be not paid to the gathering. Then ensue the processes whereby the green leaves assume the wrinkled form so familiar to us. As soon as gathered, they are put into wide shallow baskets, and placed in the wind or sunshine for a few hours. They are then transferred to a flat cast-iron pan, over a stove heated with charcoal, in quantity about half a pound of leaves at a time. The leaves are stirred briskly about with a kind of brush, and are then quickly swept off the pan into baskets. This done, the leaves are carefully rubbed and rolled between the hands, and are next put, in larger quantities, on the pan, and subjected again to heat ; but the heat on this occasion is lower than before, and only just sufficient to dry them effectually without risk of scorching. The tea is then spread out on a table and carefully examined ; every unsightly or imperfectly-dried leaf being removed from the rest. This is the usual manipulation for the larger bulk of teas ; but some of the finer kinds pass through a more elaborate series of processes. The distinctions of tea into Black and Green are distinctions rather of manufacture than of growth. The common names applied are derived in many instances from the districts where the tea is grown. Quite all of the tea used in other parts of the world comes, however, from China, and bears various Chinese names. Thus, Bohea is named from a particularly hilly spot covered with tea-plantations ; and Souchong, Pekoe, Congou, Hyson, &c., are all Chinese names (or rather English imitations of them), having a distinctive and efficient meaning among the natives, although rather vague with us. All teas, by a little variation of the processes, may be made either green or black at pleasure ; but in practice the preparation of the respective kinds is carried on in different parts of the Chinese Empire, and by different sets of arrangements. In the green teas the leaves only are taken, being nipped off above the foot-stalk or petiole ; while of the black tea the foot-stalk is also collected : from whence it happens that the black tea contains much of the woody fibre, while the green is exclusively the fleshy part of the leaf itself. The following is the mode of making black tea at Assam, adopted by the Chinese. The leaves being brought to the place where they are to be converted into tea, are thinly scattered in large circular open-worked bamboo baskets, and placed on a frame-work of bamboo. Here they are left exposed to the sun for about two hours, or until they have a slightly withered appearance ; the leaves in the mean time being occasionally turned by the hand. The baskets are taken into a covered building, and placed on another open frame, where they are left to cool for half an hour. Being next put into smaller baskets, and placed on a stand, the leaves are taken up between the hands with the fingers and thumb extended, and gently tossed up and down for a few minutes. This drying and handling is repeated two or three times, by which time the leaves feel something like soft leather. The leaves are next put into cast-iron pans fixed in a circular mud fireplace, and the pan being well heated by a straw or bamboo fire, about two pounds of leaves are spread equably on or in it. While on the fire, the leaves are frequently turned with the naked hand, to prevent their burning ; and as soon as they become inconveniently hot they are received by another man in a close-worked bamboo basket, and taken to a table having a narrow rim round it. The two pounds of hot leaves are divided amongst two or three men, and each forms a ball of the leaves allotted to him, which is grasped gently in the hand, a little force being used to express any juice which may remain in the leaves. The leaves, after being worked in this way and again separated, are spread out on hot pans, again turned about with the hands, and again rolled on the table. They are next put into a drying-basket, where they are spread three or four inches deep, and placed over a glowing charcoal fire free from smoke. As soon as they appear half-dried, and while still rather soft, the leaves are taken off the fire, placed in open baskets, and allowed to remain for some time on the frame. On the following day the leaves are sorted into "large," "midding," and "small," which form so many different varieties of tea ; and each sort is again put into the drying basket. When crisp by the action of the heat, the leaves are thrown into a large receiving-basket. Again they are heated, with another basket thrown over them to reflect back the heat. When the leaves have become so crisp as to break under the slightest pressure of the fingers, the process is finished, and the tea is packed in boxes, and is ready for the market.

The domestic animals in Java are buffaloes and cattle of every description, and sheep, goats and pigs. Game, however, does not abound here so much as in other countries, though hares and rabbits are pretty common ; and deer and antelopes are also plentiful. The horses, which are very numerous throughout the island, are small but active. Wild hogs and monkeys are found in all the jungles. The forests abound with tigers, as powerful and as large as in Bengal. A species of black tiger, which is often found, is very ferocious. The rhinoceros is sometimes met with. Snakes are found here, as in all other hot countries, in great numbers, and of various kinds. Some of these are from twenty-five to thirty feet in length. Lizards of all kinds, from the variable chameleon to the guana tribe, frequent the bushes, trees and roofs of the houses. Scorpions and mosquitoes abound in the marshes. There are, besides, various other sorts of dangerous and disgusting vermin. Of the numerous feathered tribes found in Java, we may remark the cassowary, a very large and powerful bird. White eagles have been seen here; and every kind of bird of prey is continually on the wing. The animals, undescribed in natural history, abound in these seas. The population of Java is composed almost entirely of natives, of a variety distinct from the Malays and other inhabitants of the neighboring islands. The Javanese are small, with a yellow complexion, flattened nose, aquatic tribe is equally diversified, and the extensive fisheries along this great line of coast are highly productive. At the mouths of the rivers numbers of alligators or caymans are continually lurking for their prey. In the several bays numerous sharks swim about the ships; and many high cheek bones, and thin beard. Their language is entirely different from the Malay; their religion Mohammedanism. Three quarters of Java are in the power of the Dutch, whose immediate authority and jurisdiction extend over three-fifths of the inhabitants.

THE SONG OF NATURE.

BY GEORGE W. CROWELL.

The morn has come, and the darkness
Has fled on wings of night;
While soft up o'er the blushing sky
Rush floods of golden light.

And into my window stealing,
Comes sweet, rich-scented air,
The breath of the passing summer,
From fields thyetan fair.

I hear the tuneful harmonies,
That wild and gushing song,
Which is ever swelling upward,
In blended chorus strong.

'Tis the song of nature's minstrels,
And wrought by hands divine,
'Tis the grand old pealing organ,
In God's vast temple, Time.

While its strain of lofty music
In thrilling cadence rings,
'Tis the voice of endless praises
From all created things.

It steals from the murmuring rill,
The songster's tuneful throat,
As mid the forests deep and wild,
He trills his cheering note.

It is the sighing, moaning wind,
With ocean's solemn roar,
Which sweeps with stern, restless strength,
Along the sounding shore.

From Nature, and her vast expanse,
Of earth, of air, and sea,
Steals forth the never-ceasing strain
Of mingled harmony.

As forever onward, upward,
Through corridors of time,
Rolls the grand and swelling anthem,
Eternal and sublime.

Still shall distant, coming ages,
In symphonies of song,
Down through time's far-reaching vista
Its lengthened notes prolong.

KATIE ALLISON.

BY MRS. AGNES L. CRUIKSHANK.

FARMER ALLISON's wife was dead—the little patient, industrious woman who for eight long years had been to her a faithful loving partner—and while he sorrowed with a violence that threatened to destroy his reason, our villagers no less sincerely lamented their departed friend and neighbor. He had found her in the city, a pale, pretty little seamstress, and when he brought her to his country home, many sneered at his choice and prophesied that he would repent before the year was out.

"What could she do on a farm, with those little white hands?" "What would become of John Allison's fine dairy now, when his timid little wife was really frightened at the sight of the twelve cows which nightly came into the yard to be milked?"

And so the gossips talked—each matron secretly thinking that one of her own rosy daughters would have better filled the bride's responsible place, while the girls themselves wondered at handsome John Allison's taste in choosing that "pale little thing," when so many in our own village would have jumped at the chance of taking him, with his new house and well-stocked farm. Perhaps they had made this too manifest.

It was long before Mrs. Allison became a favorite in our village. Perhaps had John made a household drudge of her (as many foretold he would), our ladies, old and young, might through compassion have visited her; but when two sturdy maids were installed at the farm-house, permanent assistants, and in addition to the little woman's other fanks, John purchased a horse and neat little chaise for her especial use, the dislike grew deeper than ever. Then her dress was another fearfully large item in the daily increasing account against her. Not that it was anybody's business, but it was so ridiculous that they should wear "such bonnets and such mantles!" Why, the daughters of the lord of the manor did not wear any better clothes—the ladies Julia and Caroline H—, whose yearly allowance would have bought half the farms in our parish. Yet truth to tell, nothing could have been neater than Catherine Allison's appearance that summer when she came among us a bride, for the white crape bonnet and dove-colored silk dress were certainly in admirable taste.

The first change in her favor appeared when our minister and his wife called on her (they had been travelling when she came), and their evident liking for the stranger did much to remove prejudice. Soon after, a great sensation was created. The ladies Julia and Caroline H— had also paid a visit to John Allison's vine-covered cottage, and spent several hours in inspecting the green-house, with its choice fruit and flowers, the fowl-yard where Catherine's pets were the wonder of the parish, the kitchen garden, the orchard—everything was seen and admired, and the ladies and their father had gone away delighted at the neatness, even elegance, of the whole establishment.

A rare taste for the beautiful and picturesque had Catherine, and her young husband loved well to indulge it. Catherine's popularity rose from this day, for it was well understood that to none other than a superior woman could Lord S— introduce his young daughters; and the particular kindness ever after shown to John Allison was as much owing to his wife's good qualities, as to the old nobleman's avowed respect for the young farmer's sterling worth.

When the family went to London, and some choice cattle were sent down to Whittlesford for John, "some of the Duke of Devonshire's own breed," Catherine's poultry-yard received a valuable addition as well in a "few of the rarest kinds."

Two years after their marriage, a little daughter was born to John and Catherine Allison, the only addition that could possibly have been made to their happiness. A fair little lady she was, with her soft brown eyes and rose-leaf cheek, and lips like the half-opened bud. John Allison called her his "apple-blossom"—and it was no bad comparison—and he loved her until he feared to think what might be his feelings should he lose her. The Ladies H— were still away; but when the news reached their London home, a costly cradle found its way to Whittlesford, a bed fit for a little princess, all rosewood and blue silk and dainty lace—John said "far too fine for their humble home," but Catherine laid her little one on the soft pillows and pronounced it perfect.

It was only now that our good village folks began to understand and appreciate Catherine—to find out how gentle, kind and benevolent she was. No one ever heard her repeat an ill story of a neighbor, or draw an unkind inference, or knew her to regret an opportunity to do a favor. She took no additional pride with their rising fortunes (unless it might have been in her handsome, well-to-do husband), but dressed as neatly, and lived as unostentatiously as ever. She seldom went out, except on the Sabbath, when leaning on her husband's arm, she walked regularly twice to the old parish church, or when some case of sickness required her personal attendance. To the poor, out of their abundance John Allison and his wife freely gave; and the apples, the milk, the honey and the corn they annually gave away, added much to the comfort of many a poverty-stricken household. Then at Christmas, it was pleasant to see Mr. Allison's anxiety lest any one of the poor cottagers should be overlooked in the general distribution of beef and mutton, the materials for plum puddings, and the wood and coal wherewith to cook the same.

There came a year at last—a year of suffering long to be remembered throughout the length and breadth of England—when wheat was a guinea a bushel, and bread was far beyond the reach of the poor man. It was a time of temptation to John Allison, but Catherine stood beside him like a good angel. Long years afterward, when the daisies were blooming on her grave, the villagers told how she sold all her choice poultry, the petted favorites of many years, that the money might buy bread for the poor; and her husband, with tears, declared that her persuasions alone saved him from doing as other prosperous farmers did then—take cruel advantages of the necessities of the suffering.

Lord S— lost his election that year by advocating the use of rye and other articles in the making of bread for the cottagers; but one and all blessed John Allison and his gentle helpmate, and I doubt if any of the long line of noble ladies whose ashes reposed under the chancel, were ever more generally beloved and respected than Catherine Allison, who probably could have traced her pedigree no further back than her own father.

Need I say that the child of such parents was all they could wish?—that little Katie Allison was the pride of our village, beloved equally by our good pastor and his wife (who, childless themselves, looked upon her almost as their own), and the poorest laborer on her father's farm? The gayest little singing-bird that ever made glad a home—well might her mother, with a sort of prophetic terror, clasp her in her arms and say her song "was too sweet to last long."

When Katie was five years old, her mother caught a cold—just such a cold as thousands take and say, "O, it is not much! I shall be well in a few days," and the end of that few days is—eternity! Mrs. Allison said so herself, at first; but by-and-by the cough grew worse, and the pain in her side increased a little, and a dull, languid feeling oppressed her. She made no complaint—she never did—but it was strange to miss her in the accustomed place at table, and to listen in vain for her pleasant voice about the house; John Allison found it very strange and sad, yet he never dreamed how near was the time coming when he should see and hear her in his house no more forever.

As the weeks went on, he grew restless and uneasy, watching her incessantly; and people found that it was not well to speak of his wife's changed appearance—his temper could not bear it now. To her, he ever spoke encouragingly. "She would be better when the summer came again, and they could go out once more together." He thought the weakness would all pass away again, and he "had never seen her look better in the face than now.' This was only too true; for the hectic flush now supplied all that had ever been wanting to make her beautiful, and the brightness of her eyes, and the false, fever strength, only too sadly misled the anxious husband. But the summer came—and Catherine Allison was dying! We all knew it now; she had known it long, and vainly striven to make him believe the truth.

To her child, Catherine now clung with a fearful love; it was all that kept her from heaven—the one tie that bound her to earth. Never for an hour, by day or night, would she allow Katie from her side; and in attending to her child, were the mother's last days solely devoted. In the wild June days, they sat together in the rose-bowered cottage porch—a sad yet lovely picture; and many a stranger that summer visiting our ancient church, sighed, as they caught a passing glance of that dying mother and her beautiful child.

There came a lord, one day, to see the old monuments—a fine, handsome youth of sixteen, with a haughty, high-bred air, yet gentle too. He stopped and spoke to little Katie, asking for some of the roses with which she had filled her basket to overflowing, and thinking, while he took them from her hand, that never before had such a vision of beauty appeared on earth. The child's white dress was not more spotless than her fair, uncovered shoulders, nor the pink roses a more delicate shade than her rounded cheek.

Mrs. Allison smiled assent when the youth begged leave to rest beneath the flowing porch; "he had travelled far, and the day was warm." And he sat for two long hours and talked—not of such subjects as boys usually converse on, for he had known much of sorrow in his young life, and yet wore sombre garments for a loved mother's memory. It was a strange meeting, and neither knew the other's name; yet when the handsome young stranger, in departing, kissed little Katie's cheek, and bent one knee in lowly reverence on touching her mother's hand, both mother and child felt as if they had known him for years.

From the first cottager he met, the strange youth learned the names of his new acquaintances; but his, they could never discover. That was the last day that Catherine Allison left her room; a few more weeks of rapid decline, and all suspense was ended.

Poor little Katie was sent away, when all was over; but on the day of the funeral, the tender-hearted old farmer to whose care she had been consigned, could no longer refuse her piteous pleading to be taken to her mother. He carried her to the desolate house, and placing her in her father's arms, recalled him thus to life and action. For Catherine's child, he must live, and no longer neglect his motherless little one, who, in the past few days of suffering and sorrow, had pined for the accustomed care.

They laid her in the quiet old churchyard, fair Catherine Allison, and they put a simple white stone to mark her resting-place, bearing her name and age, twenty-four years. She was only sixteen when John Allison first brought her to his happy home.

How soon a year is gone! and how many changes the twelve short months usually bring even in a quiet village, as Whitleysford was in the days I write of. Some of the old residents were gone to their long rest; others had come to take their places.

Among the newly-married ones, at the end of the year, was John Allison. If his first choice had given offence to our villagers, his second raised a perfect storm of dislike, and, to the credit of humanity be it said, for far better reasons. That sweet little Katie should have a strange mother, was bad enough; but such a mother! No words could express the feelings of the people on first beholding the new Mrs. Allison. She was a sergeant's widow, with all the vulgarity usually acquired from barrack life, with a loud voice and a tawdry dress, and a complexion which hinted at a love for some beverage stronger than coffee.

She had two daughters older than Katie, bold little hoydens, well versed in barrack-yard conversation and manners—in fact, such children as our quiet village folks had never seen in their lives. By what manoeuvres this woman had succeeded in entrapping the young widower, none could tell; but certain it is that he put her in Catherine's vacant place, and gave his little girl entirely to her care. That he did not love her, we all knew; and that he learned to fear her fierce temper, was also soon discovered.

Catherine's two domestics, deeply attached as they were to Katie, could not put up with the tyranny of the new mistress; and in spite of Mr. Allison's entreaties, backed by offers of double wages, both the girls left. Under their care, the child had missed but little of the mother's love, for they were faithful and good; but when given up to the stranger, she soon showed the change. Her person and dress, ever kept so neatly, were now neglected; her playthings were appropriated by the Misses Dobson, and she came at last to be little better than a slave to their caprices.

John Allison saw it all; and what he did not see, the neighbors told him. But he had so long been used to Catherine's gentle persuasion and loving rule, that he shrank in alarm and horror from the terrible passion of the sergeant's widow, instantly aroused by any remonstrance in favor of the child.

"She was well enough cared for, the idle little thing, who spent all day sitting about among the flowers! Did he suppose that she was going to slave herself to death, working for that child, while her own two poor girls were in rags?" And thus she would run on for hours, until he was fairly driven off to his farm to find peace.

Poor little Katie, when any of them struck or ill-used her, used to take shelter under the churchyard trees, where, sitting on her mother's grave, she always spent her sorrowful hours.

John Allison was naturally a peaceable man; for the sake of a quiet home, he yielded all disputed points to his termagant wife, and in secret soothed his child's wounded feelings, rather than cause more anger by openly taking her part. The home was very different from what it had been in Catherine's time. Then, all was love and peace; now, Mrs. Allison's quarrels with her servants, her ill treatment of Katie, and the boisterous behaviour of her two daughters, made it a very bedlam for a man of Farmer Allison's quiet habits.

No visitors ever went to the cottage now; the neighbors made no attempt to disguise their opinions of Mrs. Allison, and the ladies from the Manor House passed her by unnoticed. As years passed on, Katie might have grown up in ignorance but for the kindness of the good clergyman and his lady, who gave her what instruction they could, and furnished her with books to improve herself.

Mr. Allison, through the importunities of his wife, made a will giving the three children an equal share of the property at his death, a most unfair proceeding towards his own child, but as I said before, he dare not refuse to comply with his tyrant's demands. It would be vain to describe the system of saving which Mrs. Allison now adopted, in order to increase the fortune her girls were eventually to share; or to explain the feelings she entertained towards Katie for holding one third of it from her own darlings.

When Katie was fourteen, the house servants were dismissed; and as the Misses Dobson were at a fashionable boarding-school, their mother undertook the housework alone with her step-daughter. Of course, the poor child suffered; but, as heretofore, her father was helpless to relieve her. In spite of all Mrs. Allison's mean savings, their affairs did not prosper. People said it was a judgment on John Allison that his cattle sickened and died, that the blight struck his crops, and year by year his property dwindled away.

The girls came home, when Katie was fifteen. With their increased expenses, Mr. Allison said he "could no longer afford to keep domestics; they must do the housework among them." And as they had no idea of burying their newly-acquired accomplishments in the kitchen, of course the additional burden was laid on the child of the house, poor Catherine's petted darling.

There was more company keeping now than the cottage had ever witnessed, for Mrs. Allison was wondrous kind to the young men who visited her daughters; but no one saw Katie, who at such times was doomed to Cinderella's fate—it being altogether against her stepmother's policy to permit the contrast of her beauty with her own children's coarse features and ungraceful forms. Almost any other child would have grown vulgar and awkward too, from the constant association; but Katie possessed her mother's own nature, the love of all that was beautiful, and the charity that thinketh no evil, and her face reflected the beauty of her disposition. She was handsomer than her mother had ever been, with more of the rose hue of health in her cheek, and a freer spring in her graceful step.

"Where is Katie? Is she not going to church this morning?" asked Mr. Allison, as the family started for the usual Sabbath walk to the sanctuary, one fine summer day.

His wife answered with more than usual asperity.

"No! She cannot leave the house to-day. Some one must do the work, Mr. Allison, and I hope you don't think that me and my daughters are going to stay at home forever?"

"No, but Katie has not been to church for two months, and you know I promised the minister she should go to-day. She wanted to so much, poor child." And perhaps never more in his life had John Allison regretted his own weakness than at that moment.

The wife's face flushed with passion.

"There were reasons, Mr. Allison, why she could not come."

Yes, three reasons; and he might have seen them at that moment on the heads of his companions in the shape of gay summer bonnets which had occupied their time and attention for the past week, leaving the neglected household work for Katie to attend to on the Sabbath.

No more words passed ; but the husband entered the house of prayer with very different feelings from what he had once experienced when Catherine's little hand rested lovingly on his arm.

Katie in the morning had felt the disappointment keenly. She had been urged to make unusual exertions all the week, with the promise that once more she should sit in her accustomed place on the Sabbath, and hear the living words of warning and advice from the gray-haired pastor ; and it required all his lessons to teach her on this occasion that her present duty was submission.

Within half an hour after the departure of the family, she took her Bible and went to her mother's grave, her favorite place for reading ; but Katie did not read to-day. She sat watching the yew-tree shadows on the tombstones, and the little birds twittering in the sunshine, and by-and-by the sweet strains of the organ came stealing through the soft air and the voices of the congregation joining in a well-known hymn. Katie thought of her mother singing with the angels, and she wondered if she could see her child now, her poor neglected girl, whom not her own father dared to be kind to ; and though the minister had said that her mother could see her at all times, she could in no wise believe that her departed parent could witness all that had taken place since she left earth, and still be happy. These were very puzzling thoughts for Katie, and she was too deeply absorbed in them to heed the coming of a stranger, who, pausing under the yew branches, watched her with pleased attention. He was tall and dark, with a slightly foreign look, and you would have said, from his air and appearance, that his companions had been no cottage dwellers.

Katie started and blushed a little when he first spoke ; but there was a rare charm in his conversation, and she soon forgot about her faded old muslin dress, her worn shoes, and her shabby sun hat, when he told her that he was the stranger lad who ten years before had spent that pleasant hour with her and her mother, under the rose-shaded porch. He had travelled long in foreign lands, and only within the last few years returned to England, but he had never forgotten the little girl and her roses, and had come at last to Whittlesford to find out if she still remembered him.

Katie would not have known him again, but she had never forgotten the incident and told how long she and her mother had talked about him, "even to the last day she lived." Katie's dark lashes were wet with tears, and there was something very like a tear glistening in the stranger's eye as she spoke.

They talked very long and earnestly ; so earnestly, that they took no heed of time—that the congregation had left the church. The stranger was learning all about Katie's life, and all unknown to her, had discovered how good and truthful and humble she was—how she had crushed down her aspirations for a higher or happier life, and in silence strove to do her duty, unpleasant as it was.

"You are not happy, Katie! You do not like this life of drudgery?" the stranger said.

She glanced down at her hands—beautifully shaped little hands they were, but sadly discolored—and sighed and shook her head.

"Would you leave it, Katie? Would you leave them all, who are so unkind to you, and the home where there are none to love you now?"

He glanced at the grave, and awaited her answer with anxiety.

"I cannot leave my father," she said at last. "I am all the comfort he has now ; and she loved him so well ! No, I cannot leave him." And her tears fell fast, while she spoke.

"Yet had your mother lived to this day, Katie, I know that she would not have refused me her child."

Katie was spared making any reply, for at that instant Mrs. Allison appeared through an opening in the hedge ; and though astonishment prevented her making the angry speech she had intended, the tone in which she bade her step-daughter "come home" boded no good to any one. Poor Katie blushed and trembled under the look of rage and scorn bestowed upon her ; but not all the women in Whittlesford could have confused the stranger, or caused him for one instant to lose his self-possession.

Mrs. Allison was completely crushed by the searching glance bestowed upon her, and the stately air with which he replied, "I will see Miss Allison in safety to her father." Then lifting his hat from the grass, he drew Katie's little hand within his arm and followed the irate dame, who in all her Sunday magnificence of green satin gown and cap, with pink streamers, stalked moodily homeward.

The stranger did not introduce himself to Farmer Allison, save as a traveller who "many years ago had seen his little daughter, and meeting her to-day at her mother's grave, had claimed her acquaintance." He coldly refused the Misses Dobsons' pressing invitation to be seated, and, Katie having disappeared, almost immediately went away.

Of course there was much speculation in the cottage as to who he could be—the girls having formed a high opinion of his personal merits, while their mother, smarting under the recollection of that haughty look, set him down at once as a “highwayman.” The studies of her youthful days had been mostly adorned with descriptions of such characters, and she scolded with unusual bitterness both Katie and her father for encouraging such a “villain” to come about the house.

Katie went with them to church that afternoon, and Miss Dobson, in a blue muslin gown and pink ribbons, and a book in her hand, took her station in the porch, in case the stranger should pass that way again. To her extreme annoyance, he accompanied the party home from church, having joined Katie at the door and walked by her side to the cottage gate, when, lifting his hat, he bowed low and left her.

Mrs. Allison was in a rage, and avowed her determination to “put a stop to such doings at once.” But for once her husband contradicted her, and desired that “the child should be left to do as she pleased.”

Mrs. Allison feared to make him too angry then, but in her heart she determined to prevent any more interviews with the stranger—not through any interest in Katie’s welfare, but solely from a spirit of contradiction and ill-temper. Acting on this resolution, she next morning forbade any more visits to the churchyard, a cruel punishment to Katie, whose heart had throbbed all night in sweet response to the whispered request he had made to “meet him there once more.”

While going through the daily routine of household affairs, her thoughts were wandering to the kind stranger resting under the yew trees, perhaps thinking her careless or indifferent about her promise; and very bitter were the tears she shed, when the loneliness of her own room shielded her from the Misses Dobsons’ sarcastic remarks, and her stepmother’s angry reproaches.

None might know all the thoughts that passed through Katie Allison’s mind that sorrowful night; but certain it is, that the cruel treatment of her relatives but added to the attachment to her new friend, and paved the way for feelings her innocent young heart was yet a stranger to.

Three wretched days followed, and then she gave up all hope of seeing him again. He was to leave Whittlesford on Tuesday; this was Thursday. Life had lost many charms for Katie Allison!

It was midsummer. The wells were low, and Dame Allison in a fret about her new-made butter. With many angry words, she at last bade Katie take the pail and go down to the spring for cool water; and “mind to hasten back in time.”

Once the young girl would have joyfully accepted the permission to leave the house for a breath of the fresh air under the beechwood boughs, where the cool water ran sparkling from the rock, and the fierce summer sun could not enter; but to-day she walks listlessly, and her father, watching her from a distant field, sends a boy to relieve her of her burden. He fills the pail, and carries it up the bank and over the fields, and Katie need not hurry now; so she stands sadly looking into the clear pool, and listening to the murmur of the little stream as it winds among the trees and through the meadow, until at last it falls into the river.

Katie is so lost in thought, that she does not hear a footstep on the mossy bank; and when the stranger’s voice breaks the silence, she starts and is in danger of falling into the pool. His arm alone saves her; nor does he withdraw it again, for overcome with the suddenness of the surprise, she is weeping.

“Katie! dear little Katie! did I alarm you?” he whispered, and drew her to his side until her flushed face was hidden on his shoulder.

He did not ask if she was glad to see him again, but when she grew calm, he spoke of the fine day and the cool stillness of the beechwood, and gradually they began to talk, as they had done at their first meeting, without embarrassment. He spoke of his intended departure.

“I thought you had gone,” Katie answered. “I thought I should never see you again, and that perhaps you imagined I did not care.”

I know not what resolutions the young man might have made previous to this meeting, but the sight of Katie’s tearful eyes overset all his previous intentions.

“I knew that you would have come, Katie, had you been permitted; I also knew that you suffered, for by my own feelings I can partly read yours; but if you imagined I could leave without seeing you once more, you sadly mistook me. I love you, Katie; I believe I have loved you since I first saw you, a little child. But I have seen and suffered much since then, Katie; and I thought, when I came here, that never more could I trust a woman. I have learned to trust and hope once more; you have taught me how much there is of goodness yet in the world, and if you can love me too, I shall have no reason to regret that my former hopes were destroyed.

“I have told you nothing whatever of myself, Katie, nor can I do so yet; all I ask is that you will trust me, that you will let no doubt of my truth arise to make you sorrowful while I am gone, for I must leave you to-day. Already have I lingered here longer than I intended, but this interview has well repaid me."

He paused, waiting in vain for an answer, and his companion's face was hidden from his gaze. He took both her hands in his and looked into her eyes. He was very earnest in his wooing, however odd his method might be; but he read all he wished to know in the young girl's truthful countenance, and his own was perfectly radiant with joy. There was no time for many words. He put a slender chain in Katie's hand, to which was attached a ring of value; it was the pledge of betrothal.

"When I come, if you still wear this it shall be a sign that you are unchanged; but if you find that time alters your feelings towards me, give me back the token. I shall not blame you, for you are very young, Katie, and many changes may take place ere you see me again."

She was very young and inexperienced, little better than a child, in fact; but she had a true woman's heart, overflowing with sympathy for another's sorrow, and from the first she had felt that this young stranger had suffered some great grief. She laid her hand trustingly in his, and promised to remember his words, to pray for him, and to love him until he should return. And looking in her earnest eyes he once more believed and was happy.

John Allison had a short interview with his daughter's lover ere he left the village, and though he made no further disclosures relating to himself, the father felt satisfied that his regard for Katie was sincere, and his promise to return to claim her would be sacredly kept.

As the other members of the family knew nothing of the engagement, Katie was spared much annoyance, and save to taunt her with some jest about her wonderful lover, they never mentioned him. She wore his chain about her neck, and when alone, his ring upon her hand, but no other eyes than her own ever beheld either. A few weeks after his departure she received a letter, a long, loving letter, full of kind words of encouragement and advice, and so touchingly tender in its tone that many tears fell on the pages ere she had read it through. In it he told her that he was going abroad; that when she received it he would no longer be in England, but distance would make no change in his heart. The signature to this epistle was simply "Richard."

After this came long months of silent waiting, disturbed at last by the sudden illness and death of her father. It was a sorrowful day to Katie Allison when she saw him laid beside her mother under the yew trees in the old churchyard, and knew that henceforth there was no one to stand between her and her step-mother's ill treatment. She thought with dread on the future, and a very short time sufficed to show that her forebodings were well founded. Mrs. Allison had a nephew, a graceless scamp enough, yet beloved by her almost equally with her girls. As this young man was poor, and had no taste for work, his aunt had long set her heart on his marrying Katie, thereby securing her share of the property. While Mr. Allison lived, this plan was hopeless, his dislike of his wife's nephew placing a bar to all such proceedings; but after his death, the widow lost no time in bringing her hopeful relative to the house, and by all means in her power contriving to bring about a match between him and her young step-daughter. At first this was attempted to be brought about by kindness, but that failing, Katie's ill-disguised contempt for the young man and his pretensions, gave rise to a system of persecution as cruel as it was ungenerous. If she ventured out, young Sanders was always at hand, to see her home, and if she remained at home he never left her side for an instant; on Sundays he persisted in walking with her to church, and on all occasions his aunt and cousins spread the report that they were soon to be married. Of course it was believed to be a fact in the village, and many were the regrets that sweet Katie Allison whom all loved should thus sacrifice herself.

Katie did not hear half that was talked about, but enough reached her to make her truly wretched, and but for the steadfast friendship of our minister, who loved her for her mother's sake as well as for her own, I believe she would have died under the long-continued ill treatment of her persecutors. As it was, she grew pale and slender, so pale that at last people said she was dying like her mother, of consumption.

She had never told her friends at the parsonage of her engagement—her secret had died with her father—and though no questions were asked, they saw that something more than the ill treatment at home was wearing on her mind. As their house was the only place where she escaped the attentions of her unwelcome suitor, she accepted their frequent invitations with thankfulness, but as in earlier days she was still the Cinderella of the family, and Mrs. Allison took care that her visits should be as few as possible.

To her other unpleasant habits this woman had indulged a taste for strong liquors until it grew to be an everyday occurrence to see her more or less intoxicated. At such times Katie suffered fearfully from her violence, and one day she dared to lift her hand against the gentle girl, and finished the outrage by locking her in her room. It was not the pain of the blow which made Katie's tears fall, although the marks lay purple and inflamed on her white neck and arms, nor was it indignation at her cruel treatment, but in her hand lay the glittering links of Richard's chain, and they were broken.

She roused herself at last—she would no longer endure such treatment. Why should she allow a weak fear of causing more comment on her actions, prevent her from seeking another home? For eighteen months she had heard no tidings of her lover—he might be dead, he might have forgotten her—but she banished all doubt of his truth as she had ever done, and preferred to think him dead rather than faithless.

While making her preparations for departure, she did not see her lover approach the cottage, nor did she hear the conversation which ensued between him and the widow, a conversation in which Mrs. Allison scrupled not to tell the gentleman that her step-daughter did not wish to see him; that she was about to be married to her nephew, and that henceforth his visits could be dispensed with at their house; and when she saw how deathly pale he grew while listening to her words, she felt that she had taken a sweet revenge.

He met an old man on the farm, and asked for Mr. Allison. The man stared in astonishment. "The master be dead this year an more. Mistress be master up there now." And he pointed to the house. "But folk do say that Miss Katie, master's daughter, be going to marry young Mr. Sanders. It's a pity for her, for he be a wild one, surely."

It was true then, Katie had forgotten him, and well as he had imagined himself prepared for a disappointment, his suffering was more than he could calmly bear. He went down to the beech wood, the scene of their betrothal, and the desolation suited his feelings at that hour. The murmuring brook was choked with the faded leaves, and the trees no longer gave their pleasing summer shelter. He sat down on the moss-covered seat near the spring, and strove to calm the storm of angry feelings. He wished that he had seen Katie herself, it would have been some comfort to have received his dismissal from her; perhaps she was true after all; not so, he believed, would she have doubted him; and on the impulse of the moment he rose to seek her, when she stood before him. He sprang to meet her, scarce believing the evidence of his senses, but there was no room to doubt when he saw her joyful surprise, and heard the piercing tone in which she called his name.

"Katie, my Katie, you love me? You could not be false?"

She could not speak, but he saw the ring upon her hand and was satisfied.

"They told me you loved another, that you were soon to be his wife, but looking in your pale face, my darling, I can read all I have made you suffer. Would that my faith had been equal to yours, we should both have been spared much misery."

From the depth of sorrow to the summit of joy and content, it was a strange experience for one short hour of life. They went together to the parsonage, and while Richard and the clergyman were in secret consultation, the tender-hearted lady wept over the story of Katie's ill usage by her stepmother.

"You shall never leave us again, dear child; we are growing old, and henceforth our home shall be yours, and here you will be safe from the ill treatment of that wicked woman." And the good lady had her benevolent plans all arranged ere she knew that there was another home awaiting the orphan.

"Love, we part only for a few hours. Tomorrow you must give me the right to protect you ever more."

When they were alone the clergyman informed his young visitor that the stranger had explained all this long and mysterious silence, and had implored him to report the same to her if she wished. Her eager refusal stopped him.

"Not for worlds would I hear it from other than himself! I trust him fully, he is good and true, and honorable; since my mother died no one has loved me as he has done, and my faith in him is far above all curiosity. If he is poor I will work for him; if he has been wicked I will forgive him, and only when I cease to live, can I cease to love him."

The good pastor was deeply affected by her earnestness.

"My child, his confidence in you is equally strong; you deserve each other, and may you both be happy through time and eternity."

There was a quiet wedding next morning in the pleasant old parlor at the parsonage, all the guests present being the village physician and his wife, the former going through the ceremony of giving the bride away. There had been no time for preparations, no satin dress, no orange wreaths, no wedding cards, no gay assembly; the bride wore simply a plain, dark travelling dress, and when the vows had been spoken the newly married pair bade adieu to their kind friends, and entering the waiting carriage, soon left our village far in the distance.

On, on, through long miles of unknown distance, past stately homes and humble cots, and neat country villages and smoky towns they wheeled that day, only pausing long enough to change horses when theirs were weary. Neither of our travellers felt inclined for conversation, the perfect calm of content is earth's highest happiness, and these silent hours were the happiest they had ever known.

They have passed a neat country village, and the gentleman leans from the carriage and tells the coachman to drive faster, then directs his companion's attention to the glorious sunset, the broad river winding through the valley, and the distant view of the village. They enter a noble avenue, where the giant arms of the lofty trees meet far above their heads. On, on, under the shadows, then by-and-by past a rustic lodge where the great gates open as if by magic, then a long, winding drive and they are there.

It is a stately mansion, but before the astonished bride can speak, the steps are flung down, bowing attendants greet them on every side, and leaning on her husband's arm she passes under the marble archway. Before her is a lofty hall, half filled with gayly attired domestics who eagerly crowd round and greet her companion with tears and blessings. Silent and bewildered she is led along through lofty arched passages and broad oaken stairways, and at last they enter a charming little boudoir, a very gem of taste and elegance. But Katie sees not the rich satin draperies, the velvet couches, the silver-framed mirrors, the carpet like a bed of roses and lilies, nor even the birds hanging in their gilded cages, for her husband speaks.

"Love, this is your home—I would not tell you, for I wished to win you for myself alone—does this please you?" He knelt at her feet for an instant. "Will my wife forgive the only deception I have practised?" It was a moment worth all the past suffering.

LONG WHISTLE.

The Marysville Herald gives the following account of something new under the sun: "A whistling match lately came off at Mokelumne Hill. Two whistlers commenced at 9 1-2 o'clock in the evening, and kept it up till ten minutes of two the next morning, when one of them caved in, and was forced to stretch his mouth into all sorts of shapes to get the 'pucker' taken out of it. He 'allowed' his lips felt 'like they was the toe of an old boot with a large hole in it.'"

FOUNDER OF THE FIRST RAGGED SCHOOL.

The following is a brief and popular biography of John Pounds: "John Pounds, the cripple and the cobbler, yet at the same time one of nature's true nobility, was born in Portsmouth, in 1766. His father was a sawyer, employed in the Royal Dock Yard. At fifteen, young Pounds met with an accident which disabled him for life. During the greater part of his benevolent career he lived in a small weather-boarded tenement in St. Mary's Street, Portsmouth, where he might be seen every day, seated on his stool, mending shoes in the midst of his busy little school. One of his amusements was that of rearing singing birds, jays and parrots, which he so perfectly domesticated that they lived harmoniously with his cats and guinea pigs. Often, it is said, might a canary bird be seen perched upon one shoulder, and a cat upon the other. During the latter part of his life, however, when his scholars became so numerous, he was able to keep fewer of these domestic creatures. Poor as he was, and entirely dependent upon the hard labor of his hands, he nevertheless adopted a little crippled nephew, whom he educated and cared for with truly paternal love, and in the end established comfortably in life. It was out of this connexion that his attempts and success in the work of education arose. He thought, in the first instance, that the boy would learn better with a companion. He obtained one, the son of a wretchedly poor mother; then another and another was added, and he found so much pleasure in his employment, and was the means thereby of effecting so much good, that in the end the number of his scholars amounted to forty, including about a dozen little girls. His humble workshop was about six feet by eighteen, in the midst of which he would sit engaged in that labor by which he won his bread, and attending at the same time to the studies of the little crowd around him. So efficient was John Pounds' mode of education, to say nothing about its being perfectly gratuitous, that the candidates were always numerous; he, however, invariably gave the preference to the worst as well as the poorest children—to the 'little blackguards,' as he called them. He has been known to follow such to the Town Quay, and offer them bribes of a roasted potato if they would come to his school. His influence on these degraded children was extraordinary. As a teacher, his manners were pleasant and facetious. Many hundred persons, now living usefully and creditable in life, owe the whole formation of their character to him. He gave them 'book learning' and taught them also to cook their own victuals and mend their shoes. He was not unfrequently their doctor and nurse, and their playfellow; no wonder was it, therefore, that when on New Year's Day, 1839, he suddenly died, at the age of seventy-two, the children wept, and even fainted, on hearing of their loss, and for a long time were overwhelmed with sorrow and consternation. They, indeed, had lost a friend and benefactor. Such was the noble founder of the first Ragged School."

CONTENT.

Unfit for greatness, I her snarls defy.
And look on riches with untainted eye;
To others let the glittering baubles fall,
Content shall place us far above them all.—CHURCHILL.

THE PUPIL OF RUBENS.

BY H. W. BENNETT.

IN a large, vaulted apartment in Flanders, surrounded on all sides by magnificent paintings, with here and there a statue, or a well-filled bookcase, sat one of the great masters of art—Rubens. Beside him sat his wife, the beautiful Flemish girl, Helen Formann, whom he married soon after the death of the first, with whom he had lived in such magnificence as to excite the envy of contemporary artists.

Afar off, at the other end of the apartment, stood his pupil, Anthony Vandyck, giving the finishing touches to his battle of the Amazons, and occasionally glancing towards the group opposite. Near him was an easel, on which was the half-executed painting of a lady, which had already assumed the unmistakable features of Helen Rubens. It would seem indeed, that no painter could do justice to that lovely face, so beautifully serene and tranquil, so undisturbed in its sweet repose. She was talking softly to her husband, as he sat, looking with earnest eyes upon her who was all the dearer for the weary absence from which he had just returned.

"And so you are now an English baronet," said Helen, laughing. "What title are you to be known by? Must I call you Sir Peter, or Sir Paul?"

The liquid laugh reached the ears of Vandyck, and he suspended his brush to hear the mimic music once again.

"Nay, darling," said Rubens, in a low voice, "call me thine own. All other titles fade before that. When the king of England conferred the order of knighthood upon me, he little thought that this little circlet thou hadst put on my finger when we parted, was worth all the honors which he could bestow."

"Hush, flatterer! thou wilt spoil me by your praise. Didst see no brave English dames who stole thy heart for a while from Helen?" she asked, naively.

"Not one. They are too precise both in figure and manners, too straight-laced, it may be, to make me forget for a moment thy soft, undulating, perfect figure, or thy serene loveliness."

"Nay, Paul, thy pupils are hearing thee. Lo, there is young Vandyck looking this way. He will think us two silly turtle doves, billing and cooing here in such a way as does not become thy dignified station, and I fear me, will make him think me a vain lover of flattery. Even from my husband's lips, dearest Paul, another might deem it worthy of ridicule."

The cheek of Rubens crimsoned, and his eye almost kindled, as he said passionately: "You care then, for this young Hollander! Take heed, Helen! once arouse my jealousy, and you would feel its effects most terribly."

The sweet eyes filled with tears; the rose paled on the cheek which Rubens had just been praising, and the whole figure seemed to contract and shrink painfully, but no word came from the whitening lips. But the tearful eyes were fixed with an open earnestness upon his face, as if they dared him to look into their now troubled depths, and then have a shadow of doubt on his mind of her faithfulness and purity.

"Is it so, darling?" he asked, kindly. "Have I wounded you? Believe me, I was but in jest."

"And you have no feeling toward Anthony?"

"None—so help me heaven! If I ever had doubts of thee, I could look in thy face, and forget them all."

Helen's tears were dried, as dry the diamond drops of dew by the warm sunshine. She had a tender, sisterly feeling for Vandyck, which it would have been difficult for any one who knew her to call wrong. He had come to them fresh from his mother's loving care, and that mother a widow. The memories of home were unobliterated, and he needed a woman's gentle sympathy. He found it in the wife of Rubens; and although it was given in the purity and innocence that marked all her acts, yet, it must be confessed that such was the depth of his devotion to her, so obvious and undisguised was his admiration, that he had, unfortunately, given rise to some observations which reflected upon both. At all events there was a blending of their names on the lips of many, and Rubens's absence had seemed to give latitude to the speeches which were floating on the wing of rumor.

No one testified more friendship for Anthony than Rubens himself. If he entertained any jealousy of his pupil, it was as a rival in his art—not in the affections of Helen. He had advised him earnestly to go to Italy; but so had he advised all his best pupils, purely for their own advantage.

Vandyck did see the little scene which took place between Rubens and his wife, and more than half suspected the cause. His blood boiled within him, to think of her being subjected to blame on his account; which he inferred from the glances both cast towards him. He resolved to finish Helen's portrait without delay, and then to depart.

By means of a carefully arranged screen, he was enabled to keep the picture concealed. He had entreated his master not to look upon it until it was completed, and then to pass judgment upon its execution. He painted every day, and all day long, putting his heart and soul into the delightful work, subjecting the picture to all lights, and passing the severest criticism upon it himself. It was finished. Rubens was to inspect it alone. He came out from the studio, and embraced his pupil with ardor. "It is perfect!" he said. Vandyck burst into tears, nor would he enter the room while any one was looking at it. For hours, however, he gazed upon it himself, when he was not observed. Still he knew that it was wrong, and that he ought to battle with the love which he felt was doomed to work mischief if not speedily conquered; and yet he lingered, and would have lingered perhaps too long, had not something interposed. He was sent for by Rubens, to come into the court-yard. He almost trembled with the emotion which this message induced in him. He had grown weak under the influence of mental uneasiness, and the merest trifle was sufficient to overcome him. He went, however, and to his surprise, found Rubens and his wife, and the Chevalier Nanni, a young, and accomplished Italian. They were admiring a beautiful white horse, which a groom was leading up and down the court-yard. Vandyck exclaimed upon the beauty of the animal, which indeed was worthy to be gazed at by the eye of an artist.

"He is yours, Anthony," said Rubens. "It is a simple expression of my good will, and of gratitude for the invaluable portrait of my wife. Here, too, are letters, introducing you to men of wealth and talent in Italy. It will gratify me to hear of your success there, as I feel assured that you will succeed. I wish to speak with you privately before you make your arrangements."

Anthony was too full of emotion for many words. He met his instructor as he wished; and Rubens, scarcely knowing how to commence the subject upon which he wished to converse with him, sat speechless for some minutes. Then gathering control of himself he said:

"My pupil, you well know how dear to my heart you have ever been. No son could have been more to me than yourself. I have taken pride in your genius and talents, and I do most sincerely wish that you were in the place of a son to me."

His listener was confused, not knowing whither this conversation tended. Rubens went on.

"I know not how to approach this subject; but my strong wishes impel me to it, at a venture. It is of my daughter, Allegra, that I would speak. Her mother was an angel while on earth, and she bequeathed her virtues to this child.

I need not tell you how good and amiable she is. Her conduct to myself and to my Helen would establish that in the mind of any one."

Rubens cleared his throat, and seemed waiting for some assent to his words. Vandyck gave it readily, and the master resumed:

"My pupil, Allegra loves you, I believe from my heart. What does your heart say to this frank avowal? You will not despise a father who thus tries to secure the happiness of his daughter?"

Vandyck was thunder-struck. Never by thought or word had he believed himself aught but indifferent to the daughter of Rubens. Never had he dreamed of loving her. Much as he respected and esteemed his master, he felt a lowered sentiment for one who could thus offer his daughter to the acceptance of any man; while he almost questioned the delicacy which hitherto he had given credit to Allegra for possessing. He thought that the "angel-mother," in bequeathing her virtues to her daughter, had omitted maidenly modesty. He began to grow indignant that a wife should thus be forced upon one who had never shown her a particle of attention more than the strictest law of etiquette would suggest to a person resident in the same family.

Could it be that Rubens, fearing for his wife, was tempted to substitute his daughter? His reply was necessarily cold and constrained; and his master, mortified to the quick at his own fruitless committal of his child, turned away to conceal his wounded pride. When he could speak, he begged his pupil to forget all that had been said, and Vandyck readily promised. That his departure from Flanders was expedited by this little episode, may be readily believed.

In the neighborhood of Brussels, there is a beautiful little village called Savelthem. In the fine old church, which pious hands have kept from entire decay, there are still two altar-pieces, executed by an artist whose name is yet kept in remembrance through these exquisite specimens of his genius; and tradition has handed down the fact that the Madonna represented in one of them, was painted from a beautiful peasant girl, whose descendants still inhabit Savelthem. It is still further asserted, that the artist himself was the original of the figure of Saint Martin, seated on a milk white horse. This, unlike some traditions, is founded on fact. The beautiful daughter of Martin Berg, a peasant of the better sort, was in the habit of going to the church every day to practise upon the organ; her father having been anxious to give her a musical education. There was some envy on the part of others of her own rank, when Marie Berg was appointed organist of the church at Savelthem; but the girl herself had an independent air that forbade any personal insult to her station, or any reflection upon her father's pride in her. It was but natural then, that when Marie spent so much of her time in the church, and at the same time that the artist's white horse was grazing at his ease before the church door, ill-minded people should couple their names together as lovers. How much more, when the altar-pieces were uncovered, and Marie Berg appeared as the Madonna, while in the sacred place devoted to holy St. Martin, sat the profane figure of Anthony Vandyck, on the identical white horse! From this dream he was soon awakened by the arrival of the Chevalier Nanni, who, instigated by Rubens, had followed him hither. Notwithstanding all that had passed, the master of Vandyck could not hear, as he did, of his pupil's supine life, lingering in villages, and falling in love with peasant girls, unmindful of the glorious future that he might win, without making an effort to bring him back. He implored Nanni to save him, if possible, and see him safe in Italy.

What effect his absence had upon Marie Berg, may be inferred by the fact that she soon after married in her own rank in life, and that her descendants are among the higher sort of peasants in and near her native village.

Now truly did he rise up from his dreamy life, and become an artist and a man. His reputation spread far and wide. Genoa, Rome, Florence, Turin and Sicily saw and admired. Returning to his own country, he painted historical pictures and altar-pieces, of which latter, the St. Augustine at Antwerp, and the Crucifixion at Courtray are the most remarkable. By invitation of Frederick of Nassau, he visited his court at the Hague, where he became justly celebrated. He then went to London and Paris. Returning from England, he wore a miniature of King Charles, set with diamonds, and suspended by a gold chain. Charles also bestowed upon him the honor of knighthood, an annuity, and a summer and winter residence.

Success and prosperity awaited him at every turn; and but for his extravagant habits, and his wild idea of discovering the philosopher's stone, he might have realized a vast fortune in England, where he fixed his residence for life.

Had he forgotten the Helen of his youthful dream? Never for a moment had that beautiful face faded from his memory. Who can tell how this man—stricken down by premature old age, the wine of life exhausted, the body infirm and weak, the spirit enfeebled, dying of untimely decay at forty-two—who can tell how different might have been his life, had fate decreed him the husband of Helen Formann? Almost in his last year on earth, he met with a new realization of his dream of love. At the court of King Charles, through the intervention of Buckingham, who was the firm friend of the artist, he was introduced to the beautiful Maria Ruthven, the daughter of Lord Gowry. All that was left of a heart that had been twice wrecked; all that was left of a life that had been frittered away by passion, extravagance and the love of splendor; all that remained of the glorious artist, who might have been so glorious as a man, was offered to her acceptance.

For the first time—now that he was past loving, he was truly beloved. Helen Formann's love for him was but a passing fancy, which her pure nature soon scorned and repented of. Marie Berg's was that of a peasant girl, longing to distance her companions by possessing the affections of one in a higher rank than her own. But this, of the innocent daughter of Lord Gowry—the wild rose of Scotland—was the first pure, warm, tender affection that had really ever bloomed for Anthony Vandyck.

From afar he heard of the death of his old master, Paul Rubens, whose threescore years and upwards had brought nothing but honor, prosperity and fame. How his own life faded into nothingness before the truly noble and useful life of Rubens. Even then, had he not just been united to Maria Ruthven, he would have gone back to his early love; so firmly was her image fixed in his heart. His young wife knew nothing of all this. The scandals of Flanders had not penetrated into England, and she had never heard of Paul Rubens. She—poor, innocent child! was only looking at her husband's pale face, and wondering that her love could not win him back to health. She thought not of the desolate Flemish lady who, still young and beautiful, was sitting in her dreary weeds, by the coffin of him whom all Europe loved and honored. She dreamed not, that ere a single year had rolled round, she would be acting in the same ghastly spectacle of death.

The church of St. Paul received the dust of Anthony Vandyck, and his epitaph was written by the gentle poet, Cowley. Wept over by a lovely and innocent wife, and mourned by a king, who, however dissolute in character, was still appreciative of genius, the remembrance of his talents cherished in the heart of every lover of art, who can say that his ashes did not receive all the homage they merited?

I AM THINKING.

BY WILLIE WARE.

I am thinking, I am thinking,
Of the long and dreary past;
Of the many cares and sorrows
Old Time has o'er me cast.

I am thinking, I am thinking,
Of the friends of earlier years;
Of the days of boyish friendship,
When for me there were no fears.

I am thinking, I am thinking,
Of this weary, toilsome life;
Made up of joys and sorrows,
Heavenly calms and bitter strife.

I am thinking, I am thinking,
Of our coming home in heaven:
Where the wronged are free from sorrow,
And their wrongers are forgiven.

THE SARDINIAN PEDLER.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

THE little village of Balenne, in Sardinia, is one of the prettiest that meets the eye of the traveller through this picturesque region. It is perched upon the highest range of mountain scenery commanding extensive views; and its cultivation is more than equal to the other towns in the same locality. Where the fields are not rich enough for other purposes, they are appropriated to the goats, of which there are a large number; almost every one of the farmers and the better sort of peasants possessing several, and, in many cases, a considerable stock.

As far from the din and turmoil of cities, the peaceful inhabitants of these mountains ply their humble labor, without a wish for greater distinction; except that now and then, some perturbed and restless spirit will be stirred up by strife or ambition, and seek a higher or noisier lot at a distance from the quiet scenes of the mountain villages.

"Once on a time," there lived at Balenne, a farmer who valued himself particularly upon his possessions. Indeed, his farm was the best within the village; he had a good stock of cattle, a productive farm, and a quantity of sheep which no other landholder could equal.

But there was one possession that he prized above them all, as well he might; and this was his daughter and only child, Leona, a very pretty and modest young maiden, whose gentleness of demeanor and simplicity of dress were worthy of imitation by every farmer's daughter or peasant girl in Balenne.

As might be expected, both from her own charms, and her father's profitable estate, Leona had no lack of lovers; but she withdrew herself from their notices as much as possible, seemingly with no desire for the expression of their admiration, and remained at home nearly all the time, occupied with household matters, in which she proved a most efficient helper to her mother. The broad, farm-house kitchen, an apartment more constantly occupied than any other in the house, was kept neat, fresh, and beautifully sweet by the hands of Leona; while the cooking of the establishment always received its nicest touches through her delicate taste and skill. Glad indeed was Dame Alber that her daughter signified no intention of listening to her many suitors; both because she could not bear the thought of parting with her, and also, because she believed that there was not one in Balenne who was half good enough to be Leona's husband. So the girl went on to the mature age of nineteen, without having an accepted lover. She tended her flowers, waited upon her parents, and performed all her duties with a cheerfulness of temper which made perpetual sunshine in the old farm-house; all the time apparently unconscious of the pain she was inflicting upon the youths of Balenne, or the jealousy she was exciting in the maidens. Leona knew well enough that she was beautiful. How, indeed, could she help knowing what her mirror so eloquently told her, and which every tongue about her confirmed? So, she had none of the little, silly affectation of pretending that she did not know her own beauty; but satisfied with its possession, she strove to keep the friends which her face brought her, by the charms of her mind and manners.

Among her most highly favored places of visiting, although she not often indulged in this feminine amusement, being happier at home than anywhere, was the house of a widow lady, whose husband had been a Sardinian officer, of a rather low grade it is true, but whose bravery in the battle in which he was killed would unquestionably have brought him preferment, had he lived to receive it. Madame Rayner was a woman far above the ordinary standard of the Balenne females; being of higher birth even than her husband, after whose death she retired with her only child to this mountain village, where she could practice the economy now so necessary with her narrow income, and have leisure to educate her son.

Louis Rayner was a good son to his mother, but somewhat proud and high-spirited. He disdained the unambitious youths of Balenne, and held no intercourse with them whatever; devoting all his time to literary pursuits, excepting a few hours each week to solitary hunting or fishing, by which he supplied his mother's table. In fact, Louis was becoming a trifle indolent, and not a trifle misanthropic. His mother, alarmed at his total scorn of such society as Balenne afforded, took pains to draw some of the most intelligent to her house; but he turned away from them all, until she discovered a charm in the daughter of the farmer, Auber, which she believed could soothe the perturbed and moody spirit of her son. Very sweet and lovely was the vision of the fair Leona, as she came up the little lawn before Madame Rayner's door. She had seen the lady several times in the little, unpretending library room of Balenne, and had been introduced to her each time by some mutual friend. Each time Madame Rayner had urged her to call on her, and won by her pleasant manners, Leona had availed herself of the invitation. Louis, however, had kept out of sight at these times, until one day, unexpectedly entering the room where she sat, waiting for his mother, he found that he could not accomplish a retreat without absolute rudeness. Madame Rayner knew too well what she was about, to be in a hurry to interrupt the conversation which was going on between the two; and when, at length, she could not decorously wait any longer, she was delighted to find by the unwonted sparkle in the eyes of Louis, and the animation of his voice, that he was pleased and interested in his new acquaintance.

The result was, that while Leona went home to think of the animated and intelligent youth who had made her morning so pleasant, Louis was roused to a sentiment unknown before, and declared to his mother that he could not live without Leona Alber. For several days he talked of nothing else. His mother soothed him by continually inventing occasions for the two to meet; and when, after a few weeks madame was taken ill, Leona was sent for, and entreated by mother and son not to leave her. Leona promised; and she attended her poor friend faithfully until she died. The grief of Louis was deep but noiseless, and Leona strove long before she could rouse him from the utter depression into which he had fallen.

When all was over, and the funeral services performed, she went home, leaving him all alone, for he would have no one in the house. Finally, the Albers prevailed on him to go to the farmhouse, and he became more tranquil. As his sadness wore off, he declared his love for Leona, and she, fully reciprocating it, the matter was laid before her father. The worldly prudence of Dame Alber and her husband forbade them to throw away their daughter upon one who had no visible means of support; but they both liked the young man, and Alber promised as soon as he could furnish two hundred crowns, he should be entitled to his daughter's hand, and a third of his farm. Stung with the impossibility of accomplishing this, in a place like Balenne, Louis had to call to his aid all his fortitude and strength, and even then he could see no hope. Added to his present distress, he was maddened with the knowledge that a richer suitor was proffering his claims to Leona's notice; and although he did not doubt her constancy, yet he feared that the avarice of her father might operate unfavorably for him. He left the farm for his own solitary home; but the lovers met every day, renewing their vows of unending devotion.

Leona came to their trying place one night with a face full of alarm. Young Launy, her new lover, had been urging her father anew, and Alber, satisfied that Louis could not produce the money he required, had made a request, almost amounting to a command, that she should receive Launy as her lover. That evening, all the young people of Balenne were invited to a wedding. The daughter of one of the richest farmers was to be married, and a grand merry-making was to succeed the marriage ceremony. Leona, for a wonder, was going; and Louis agreed to go with her, although he was in no mood for mirth. He kept out of the principal room most of the evening, and seating himself by the wide kitchen fire, he listened with growing interest to the adventures of a French pedler, who was relating his hair-breadth escapes among the mountains, in his lonely travels. These pedlers do almost the entire business that is transacted in the retired villages of Corsica and Sardinia. They purchase, at Genoa, as much as they can pack into two large knapsacks, their stock consisting of handkerchiefs, dresses, sewing materials, lace and jewelry; and they have no difficulty of disposing of the whole in a short time. The return of these itinerant merchants, at certain periods, is anxiously expected, and eagerly welcomed by the female portion of these scattered communities, and "the pedler" is quite an important personage in their houses, their food and lodging for their brief stay being always generously given without pay, the news they bring affording sufficient compensation. Sometimes, however, they are not fortunate enough to reach a neighborhood or hamlet, when night approaches. In this case, they betake themselves to some cave, where, by the help of flint and steel, they can make a fire of dry leaves, and then lie down with their knapsack for a pillow. His experiences in these mountains often form the materials of rich stories which he relates at the firesides of future entertainers. Thus, in many ways, the pedler, without any fixed abode, becomes a part and parcel of many houses, welcomed by old men, young brides and little children, who are all consumers of his wares.

He was in the midst of one of his thrilling adventures, when Louis, whose curiosity was thoroughly aroused, took his seat near him, and listened with such undisguised interest as to cause the pedler to remark him closely. He frankly answered all the questions of Louis, as to his intended route, and the period of his return, and, apparently well pleased with each other, they separated with an express desire to meet again. Louis went home that night with a feeling of desperation. Through the open door of the kitchen where he had sat, he had seen unequivocal demonstrations of love on the part of young Launy towards Leona; and as unequivocal encouragement on the part of her father, who was present a portion of the evening. Something must be done! Leona should be his, if he risked life itself to win her.

"But no use in that," he said, bitterly, "for courage and intellect, and all that she or I prize, is nothing without money. By heaven! Alber thinks more of that stupid fellow with his purse, than he would of the angel Gabriel. I would that my father's profession were open to me now. I would carry Leona off to-night, and people would admire it in a soldier—but were I to do it now! Didn't I envy the pedler to-night, when he opened his well-filled purse, and showed the gold and silver? I wish he would loan it to me, to dazzle Alber's eyes with."

While Louis spoke, a thought came into his head, which he in vain endeavored to repel. Every time he looked at the image which it brought up, it grew less frightful than at first, and its accompanying sentiment dwindled from a crime to a mere business transaction, which, though out of the common course, could be rectified at a future time. In short, the good and exemplary Louis, whose whole life before this, had been free from any thought of doing evil, was now planning to get the pedler's money peaceably if he could—forcibly if he must. It is said, that Satan, when he makes his first triumph over the good, leaves but little space between the planning and executing the deed to which he tempts. In Louis's case, he made no exception to the general rule, for the next morning he was upon the track of the pedler, as he had described his intended route. He soon became sensible, however, that the pedler had changed his purpose of coming this way, or that he had not set out so early as he proposed, for there were no traces of him in the damp forest, through which he must have passed, had he pursued his original design. Retracing his steps, he came back to a cavern which he had accidentally noticed as he passed. It was now the dusk of evening, but not too dark for him to perceive that around the mouth of the cave, there were the marks of a man's boot. Louis crept cautiously in, and there sat the pedler, his whole figure lighted up strongly by a blazing fire, a comfortable supper on a rock by his side, and his happy face beaming as kindly as it had done by the farmer's fireside. Louis advanced toward him and bade him good evening.

"Ah, my friend of the hostelry," said the pedler. "What chance brings you to this wild place, that seems only fit for owls and pedlers?"

"I came purposely to see you," answered Louis.

"Very good; I am to have a party then, in this castle, and you see the board is laid for supper. Sit down, and partake with me."

"Not until I know whether I shall kill you or not."

The pedler's face expressed surprise, but no alarm. He evidently trusted to the good face of the young man more than to his threatening words.

"Listen," said Louis, and he stated his whole story precisely as it was, in connection with Leona, and the impossibility of his raising the sum which the capidity of Alber demanded. "Now," he continued, "it is at your option, to lend me the two hundred crowns, and trust to my repaying you, or run the risk of my taking it forcibly by despatching you. I have no time for hesitation, for already they may be forcing her to marry Auguste Launy. Here—I swear to you that I will repay you, but you may have to wait some time for me to accumulate it."

Of course, the pedler chose to loan the money, and after exacting a promise of secrecy from him, Louis sat down to supper with him in the most friendly manner. He stayed through the night, and they parted in the morning, each pursuing his own way. Before parting, Louis gave him a silver button from his sleeve. It was his father's, and he valued it highly.

"Whenever I can repay you," he said, "I will advertise this button as lost, and offer two hundred crowns for its restoration. You will receive what I owe you, apparently as the reward. Do you understand? There is to be no talk whatever of the loan."

With the money so strangely obtained, Louis renewed his application to Alber, who was surprised at finding that he was now rich enough to claim his bride. They were married in the course of the following week, and the house so long desolate, seemed once more the abode of peace and cheerfulness. I say seemed—for in the breast of Louis there was a canker that destroyed half his happiness. True, he had not actually intended to commit a crime; and he had done no harm that he did not mean to remedy. But conscience is not satisfied with these quibbles, and he lodged to make the actual restitution he had promised.

Next year, the pedler came again, and Louis, happening to meet him, insisted on his going directly to his house, where Leona, who remembered him, made him welcome. Two or three years passed away, each marked by the annual visit of the pedler, and the earnest invitation of the Rayners to take up his abode at their house. The fourth year, Leona's father had paid the debt of nature, and Louis anxiously awaited the arrival of his creditor. He had removed from his own cottage to the farm-house, and was now comparatively a rich man. From motives of pride, he had never taken the offered portion of Alber's estate, and the farmer was too avaricious to press it upon him. But now, he came into possession of more than he could have believed that Alber owned.

It was just at the gloaming of a snowy winter day, when Louis, who was abroad on some errand, saw the pedler cross the road below him. He shouted to him to come up the hill. They entered together, and sat down to the cheerful evening meal with Leona and her oldest child. The other two were safe in bed. After supper, Louis said to his visitor:

"I have lost a button like this on my sleeve. I would give two hundred crowns to find it."

"And I," said the pedler, "have one exactly like it. But I will not take your money, for it gives me pleasure to restore the button."

Leona looked up surprised. "Send little Sophia to bed," said Louis to his wife. "I wish to speak with you."

After the child was gone, Louis said to her: "Darling, there is but one thing in which I ever deceived you, from the first hour of our acquaintance until now; and that regards the debt which I owe to our good friend here. It is to him alone that we are indebted for being together. Had it not been for him, you would have been the wife of Auguste Launy."

"Heaven forbid!"

"Most assuredly; your father had it all planned, when I appeared before him so unexpectedly, with the two hundred crowns he demanded."

"Yes, yes, love; that was a mystery."

"Well, I had it of our good friend——"

"Who thinks your generous hospitality is enough to cancel the debt?"

"Nay," answered Louis; "you are to take the money also."

"Certainly," said Leona; "that would be but a poor return for the happiness you have given us."

"But what would you say, darling, if you were told that I robbed him—that I threatened his life, if he did not permit me to take it? Would you bear to look on me again?"

"And you did this for love of me, Louis?"

"I did, indeed. There was no other way to gain you, and wrong and bad as it was, I think you must forgive me, for I was in a state of madness."

"Forgive you! O, Louis, I would forgive anything but the loss of your affections. Besides, I know well that you would never commit such a deed as you threatened—nay, you would never threaten again."

Louis smiled. "I cannot even repent of what I have done; and should do it again, if there were the same temptation. But of course, that can never happen again," he added, as a grave look settled upon her face. "There are no more brides to commit sin for, thank heaven! But come, my friend, let me have the only pleasure which can attach to this sad business. Take your two hundred crowns, and if you ever see an unfortunate wight in the position from which you saved me, just lend him the money without waiting to be asked."

The pedler in a few years had prospered so well, that he was able to retire from his wandering life. The former habitation of Louis was still empty. He re-fitted it, and offered it rent-free to his old friend, who had decided to be married, and settle down quietly, as the French pedlers, by their superior economy and prudence are often enabled to do.

GENEALOGICAL. — A toadying writer in a Paris paper is undertaking to show that the Bonapartes sprang from a very ancient and noble family of Lombardy. This is enough to raise the great emperor out of his sarcophagus and out of his boots—for he prided himself on springing from the people, and loved to flaunt his lowly origin in the faces of the sovereigns and aristocrats of Europe.

MOTHERLESS AND BLIND.

BY MRS. E. T. KILDREDGE.

Tell her gently in love's whisper of the sweet and fragrant flowers,
That are opening into beauty in their green and leafy bowers;
For I know she loves them dearly, though she never may behold
The little tender flower-buds that so lovingly unfold.
There's a home of rest and beauty—a home of joy and love,
For none are sad and sightless in yon spirit-home above;
And I know she will grow happy when you tell her of that land
Where her dear and blessed mother dwells amid the angel band.
Tell her of her baby brother, with his sweet and happy face,
Who never knew a mother's loss—though none may fill her place!
And perchance her lovely precepts may guide his feet aright,
For her face is calm and holy as the beauties of the night.
Sometimes I think it was God's will to call her mother home,
That she might guard her sightless child where'er her footsteps roam;
For I know an angel mother must hold a child more dear,
Than an earthly mother ever could whilst with her children here.
I know by my own feelings—by my spirit-yearning deep,
That angels love their earthly friends, and watch them when they weep;
E'en while my pen glides o'er the page, my Lewis hovers nigh,
And another beauteous seraph gladdens now my spirit's eye.
Sometimes, when I grow heartsick, and feel a strange unrest,
Because, perchance, some careless word has deeply pierced my breast;
When I think of that sweet maiden, the motherless and blind,
I chide myself most bitterly, and quickly bow resigned.
When I see her calmly sitting—her twin sister by her side—
With her blue eyes closed forever—all life's sweetest joys denied—
Then I think that God our Father is so merciful and kind,
That he never will forsake her, the motherless and blind.

THE SOMNAMBULIST.

BY HERBERT LINTON.

THE family of Frederick Von Bruner had numbered various of its most distinguished members as martyrs to a long descended and hereditary gout. Only one of this noble family remained, in the person of Frederick, who, while he inherited the fine qualities and handsome features of his ancestors, was suspected, by his family physician, who had watched the symptoms of his father and brothers, to be marked out for the same fate, unless the most vigorous measures were taken to prevent the insidious attacks of the enemy. To avert this misfortune, Dr. Ebert ordered his patient to the baths of Wiesbaden. Unfortunately, Frederick, although of aristocratic birth, was poor; his sole possessions being an army officer's pay, an old lawsuit, as old and intricate as little Miss Flyte's chancery case, and the reversionary interest so deplorable in the dreaded gout. To amend these undesirable deficiencies in his fortunes, Frederick might, like other young men, have been tempted to visit the baths for the express purpose of entrapping some unwary heiress. With his youth, unblemished name, aristocratic appearance and singular beauty, it would have been no hard task to find himself a wife, not only among the rich parvenues that frequent the baths, but in the more exclusive haunts of aristocratic wealth. But vain were the advances of either of these ranks to the handsome young German. Frederick's heart had long been in the sole possession of the daughter of an old neighbor of the Von Bruners, who, though lacking the patrician ven to his name, was possessed of a large fortune, of which Mademoiselle Minna was sole heiress.

Frederick, with the generous unselfishness of youth, would have been truly glad, had Minna inherited only a bare competency. He could not bear to be accused of mercenary purposes, which his heart acquitted him fully of meditating. So, with the timidity, it is true, of one who seeks alliance with wealth, yet with the secret consciousness that his character and position ought to overbalance any defect of fortune, he laid the case before Mr. Engel.

The father of Minna respected—nay, loved Frederick Von Bruner. Moreover, he coveted the patrician prefix, and thought that Madame Von Bruner would sound extremely well, when he spoke of his daughter; but his desire for a wealthy son-in-law overtopped all this. He could not, however, fail of admiring the generosity of the lover, while he deprecated his romantic magnanimity in offering to renounce all that the young lady might have in expectation. M. Engel was fifty—Frederick but twenty-two. The former smiled, and thought in all probability, the young man would learn wisdom, as he had himself with advancing years.

"After all, my dear Von Bruner," he said, in reply to his earnest words, "you are presenting to me the romance, not the reality of life. A few years will change your views thoroughly."

Frederick shook his head incredulously.

"Pity it is that the world destroys this fresh, young feeling so early. But as philosophers, we must necessarily entertain views that sentimentalists despise, until they in their turn become philosophers."

"When I become cold-hearted and selfish like that, may I cease to live!" exclaimed Fred.

Engel smiled. "I will give you my daughter, my dear Von Bruner, on condition of your accumulating a sufficient property."

"And your estimate of what that ought to be is—"

"To any other man than yourself, I should say, seventy-five thousand dollars; but so much do I like you, my dear fellow, so well satisfied of your ability to make my daughter happy, that in your case I will say only forty thousand. When you can give me proof that you possess this sum, Minna shall be yours."

And so, with this very consoling prospect before him, Von Bruner set off for Wiesbaden. An interview with Minna gave him the assurance that her heart, at least, was untouched by the supreme selfishness which he attributed to the father; and hope, which seldom deserts the young, still lingered with both.

Dr. Ebert had a friend at Wiesbaden—a medical man, to whom he gave a letter of recommendation. He did this, because he thought he would be a valuable acquaintance to the young man, as well as a reliable practitioner in case of illness. At the same time he expressed a wish that Dr. Efendahl should write to him from time to time, his opinion of the efficacy of the baths upon Frederick's constitution.

The doctor did even more than this. He took a strong interest in his friend's patient, and invited him very frequently to his home, where he endeavored to make him as easy and happy as possible. He also wrote often to Dr. Ebert, and detailed his views upon the character as well as the physical organization of Von Bruner. These letters, or the sum of them, Dr. Ebert often imparted to Minna Engel, who was a great favorite of his. After an absence of some months however, on the part of Frederick, he received one from his friend, which we will permit to tell its own story.

"MY DEAR EBERT:—From the praises which I have voluntarily bestowed on your friend, you will not expect me to send you anything of a condemnatory character. Believe me, I grieve to do so; but hoping that you will have some influence upon him, I feel bound to tell you that M. Von Bruner is a gamester! You will be shocked, I know; as from the perfect confidence you have seemed to repose in me, I cannot think you would have witholden so important a particular, had you known it. Of course, I make no such statement without having proofs—proofs which I will show you at any time, through your own vision. I can only add—come and see.

"Yours as ever, EFENDAH."

Dr. Ebert received this intelligence with a sorrow that indicated how sincerely he had been attached to Frederick. Through means of one of those gossiping creatures who infest watering places, the same story reached M. Engel at the same time; and at the doctor's second stopping-place on the road to Wiesbaden, he was surprised to encounter both Minna and her father. The young lady had not yet found out her father's object in taking her thither, but the seniors soon found that their purpose was the same. Both visited Dr. Efendahl on their arrival, and he imparted to them what his own eyes had witnessed; the nightly entrance of Frederick at a late hour, into one of the most notorious gambling houses in the city.

"Have you spoken to him?" asked Ebert.

"I have not. I preferred consulting with you as an older friend. I will accompany you both this night if you wish it."

"This night it must be," said M. Engel, "since I can no longer conceal—after to-morrow at least—my object in coming here, from my daughter. She will be expecting, of course, a call from Von Bruner the moment that our arrival at Wiesbaden transpires."

"This night then, at ten, we meet here again."

Minna sat in her room at the hotel, wondering what had become of her father, and why Frederick did not call. She dared not venture out; and altogether the morning passed very uncomfortably. When her father at length appeared, he was silent and abstracted. She begged him to go out with her, but he entreated her to remain within for this day at least, until the purpose for which he came should be accomplished. "After that, you shall be as gay as you please," he said, with a smile, which did not seem to come from the heart. He remained with her until nearly ten, and then, asking her to sit up for him, he went out. Little did Minna dream where he was going, or what was his object.

Frederick Von Bruner had been growing strong and healthful under the influence of the waters. The only inconvenience he experienced was a stronger inclination to sleep. On this evening particularly, he found it impossible to resist, and had retired before ten, profoundly sleepy and tired, and before the clock struck, he was perfectly oblivious of all around him. Not even the image enshrined in his deepest affections had power to keep him from slumber.

While he thus lay, the three gentlemen were leaving Dr. Efendahl's house. They approached the apartments most usually attended by the better sort of gamblers, and on entering, they placed themselves in a situation from whence they could see every table, but were screened from observation by the players. Every face was unfamiliar. The young and old were alike there; the experienced cheat and the "pigeon" he was about to pluck. Dr. Ebert gave a triumphant glance at his friend, as if he believed him mistaken. Efendahl interpreted the glance, and merely said, "wait!"

They did wait. Precisely at eleven, a figure, in every respect like that of Frederick entered the room, and approached a certain table. The players made way for him, and he sat down and commenced to play. He exhibited the most perfect self-possession, appeared fully occupied with the game, and showed little or no emotion at either winning or losing.

At this point, M. Engel entreated his friends to remain exactly where they were, until he should return with his daughter. Dr. Ebert expostulated, but to no purpose.

"She will not believe it, unless convinced by her own sight," he answered, and in a very short time he returned with her.

Perfectly unconscious of the character of the place, she saw in the gayly decorated and brilliant room, only an ordinary party, amusing themselves with cards, until her father undeceived her. She was startled and troubled that he should have brought her hither, and urged him to suffer her to go home.

"One moment, Minna. This is a 'hell,' and these people are confirmed gamblers. Now, look at the third table, and tell me who sits there upon the right!"

She looked, shrieked and fainted. Her father carried her out, and put her into a carriage. As soon as he saw her revive, he left her in her own room with her maid, and returned to his friends. In the next moment he strode up to the table, and was just grasping the arm of Frederick, when he was arrested in the motion by a smart tap on his own. Looking round, he discovered Professor Paul, the most distinguished physiologist of Germany, and an acquaintance of his own. Shaking Engel warmly by the hand, he apologized for his roughness by saying:

"That young man must not be disturbed. He is in a somnambulant state, and would die instantly if suddenly awakened. I have studied him here for several nights, and have trembled lest some sudden shock should kill him at once. He drew Engel off into a corner, gave him a dissertation upon somnambulism, and while the two mortified physicians listened somewhat sullenly to his long-winded explanations, it was interrupted by an unusual confusion.

"What is the matter?" asked the visitors.

"The bank is broken," answered a gentleman near them, and, pointing to Frederick, he added, "the fortunate winner is that young man."

Perfectly calm and unmoved, Von Bruner was seen to gather up his winnings, putting them carefully in his pocket, and leave the house without a word.

The next morning he rose late and unfreshed. Putting on his clothes, he found his pockets unusually heavy, and hastened to ascertain the cause. Gold, notes and checks were successively taken out, until in his rapid counting he numbered sixty thousand dollars! Often, lately, he had been exceedingly puzzled with regard to money; sometimes finding more, sometimes less, than he imagined he possessed. It had not only puzzled, but troubled him; but having no one to talk to about it, he had tried to think he was mistaken as to the fact. Hitherto there had been only small sums, either missed or gained; but now he was perfectly confounded. While he was in this state, he was surprised at the apparition of M. Engel, followed by the trio of physicians. An explanation took place, Professor Paul undertook to cure him of his somnambulism; and the result was a speedy marriage with Minna Engel, cordially agreed to by her father, and rejoiced in by his three medical friends, and we trust also by the reader.

WEBSTERIAN.

Mr. Speaker," said Ezekiel Webster, some twenty-seven years ago, in the House of Representatives of New Hampshire, "we have heard from our infancy of the exorbitant system of taxation in England, and of the oppressive weight with which it presses her population. It is true that no people ever bore burdens like hers. Her system of taxes is felt severely in every branch of her industry—agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing. It bears with a load almost insupportable. It treads upon her people with the weight of an elephant with a war-castle upon his back."—Boston Journal.

"John," said a clergyman to his man, "you should become a tototaller, you have been drinking again to day." "Do you never take a drop yourself, meenister?" "Yes, John; you must look at your circumstances and mine!" "Varra true, sir," says John; "but can you tell me how the streets of Jerusalem were kept so clean?" "No, John, I cannot tell you that!" "Weel, sir, it was just because every one kept his ain door clean."—Vermont Eagle.

A MODEL LOVE-LETTER.

BY G. S. CAMPANA.

O thou whose virgin heart I wish to please,
 My dearest, sweetest, loveliest, best Louise!
 When gudgeons build their nests in mountain tops,
 And hungry fishermen catch mutton-chops;
 When oysters upon currant-bushes grow,
 And rivulets with milk and honey flow;
 When turkeys from their spits shall fly to greet me,
 And roast-pigs cry aloud, "O come and eat me!"
 When "mountain-dew" shall need no distillation,
 And "double-~~er~~" be brewed by inspiration;
 When geese live on their livers, and paps
 Shall buy from them his pates-de-foir-gras;
 When pigs to philosophic truths awaken,
 And furnish plentiful extracts from Bacon;
 When "bulls and bears" shall neither growl nor gore,
 And "lame ducks" waddle in Wall Street no more;
 When gamblers' "pigeons" win back all they've lost,
 And Peter Funks sell watches at prime cost;
 When "Brindle" goes to market with her cheeses,
 And no one but her sells, unless she pleases;
 When buffaloes sell "robes" for current money,
 And bees grow rich by manufacturing honey;
 When beavers trade in furs, and shopping maids
 Bargain with silk-worms for their new breccades;
 When bats improve their sight by wearing glasses,
 And nightingales learn music from jackasses;
 When ladies teem with wit, and never show it,
 Look beautiful as angels—and don't know it;
 When ancient maidens cease to sigh for youth,
 And politicians aim to tell the truth;
 When spendthrifts learn to reckon cent. per cent.,
 And miners cease to mourn their money spent;
 When rivers upward from their sources fly,
 And pump the mighty depths of ocean dry;
 When all the lofty mountains fall, ker-alap!
 And tumble down into the valleys' lap;
 When polar suns cook beefsteaks, slice by slice,
 And Yankees go to Guinea for their ice;
 When steamers o'er the Rocky Mountains go,
 And railroads cross the Gulf of Mexico;
 When sleigh-bells ring the fourth day of July,
 And cherries ripen for our Christmas pie;
 When Turkey carpets, woven all complete,
 Shall be the grass that grows beneath your feet;
 When wool shall float in fleecy clouds above you,—
 Then, dearest—only then—I'll cease to love you.

"FAINT HEART NEVER WON FAIR LADY."

BY FRANCES P. PEPPERELL.

In the still romantic region round Enniskillen, in the old kingdom of Ulster, Ireland, there stood, near the middle of the sixteenth century, a fortress covering an immense extent of ground, and occupied by descendants of the dethroned kings of that country. Since its subjection to Henry II., the different generations of these heirs had dwelt here, holding as warm a place in the popular heart as ever before; and at the time of which we write, the last male of the line had been a twelvemonth dead, leaving one daughter, who was now in English parlance the young Countess of Ulster, but known and styled by the inhabitants throughout the north of Ireland as their queen, while they contentedly allowed his widow to remain, as their conquerors called her, Lady of Enniskillen. Of course, among the nobility of the region, there were not wanting pretenders to the hand of the young heiress; and among these, there were two who seemed to have distanced all others—one, the Earl Lawrence of Blackrocks, by his determined perseverance, the other by his own personal qualities and the favor of the Countess Clarice. This lover was Baron Harvey of Clare. The rivalry between these suitors was bitter, and neither of them lost any opportunity of presenting his claims. But the baron, though the inferior in rank and possessions, looked, spoke, danced and sang better than the earl; and it was believed that he loved better, "for," said Clarice, "he loves me, and the earl loves Ulster, and except that he hates Clare, would willingly surrender me to him could he gain thereby my wealth."

The castle of Enniskillen stood on a level about a hundred rods from the sea-shore, a bleak, rocky coast, abounding in caverns and gaps worn by the everlasting raging of the Atlantic in wild northwest storms. Behind it a wood rose, clothing a range of small hills beyond which broad, fertile valleys lay sheltered, well tilled and yielding great harvests. At the close of a stormy day, Blackrocks, as he was familiarly known, might have been seen impatiently pacing to and fro on the shore, hidden from the observation of the castle by a bold bend of the beach.

"Another such day," he murmured, "would be enough. Up should fly those gates and sluices, and flood the castle—and then it would be an easy affair to bring out the bird perched on my wrist! But Fate is against me; the west is as clear as a jewel, the sea runs too low to reach the first cave, and I must wait. What keeps Dennis?" he exclaimed, stamping his foot with an oath. But at the word, a man stole cautiously round a cliff and met him.

"I have given them your orders," he said. "Ross is in the Valley Sligo, and the Black Band at Lough Neagh, and just out of Donegal, the Slieve is mustering. There will be over five hundred, or maybe a thousand, well armed, too, though none so much powder or guns."

"A thousand spears are not to be laughed at, Dennis," said his master.

"And so the maid may find," answered Dennis, laughing.

"You'll assemble them all in the Valley Ree, just five leagues hence, where we may call them at an hour's notice. I try the dainty dame once more, and then if I leave one stone upon another of Enniskillen Castle, may Blackrocks lose its lord!"

"I hear," answered Dennis. "They shall be to-morrow where a blast of my trumpet shall summon them, and tumble the lady's towers round her head!" So they separated.

At the same time, the Countess Clarice sat with her mother in a long, low room, sumptuously furnished according to the luxury of the day, and hung with rustling silken tapestries. Before her, in a golden vase, was a bunch of roses of vivid and delicate shades, every separate tint of which she was copying into the embroidery whose finished yards lay fallen in stiff, gorgeous heaps upon the floor, while the Lady of Enniskillen was recounting some legend of the former grandeur and majesty of Ulster. The Baron of Clare had left them about two hours since, returning for a season to his distant home, and although his suit had not been crowned with any complete assurance of success, yet hope gushed through his heart, and he had never felt so happy in her presence as he did that day when leaving it; for the first time after being so long a guest, something promised him happiness.

As the darkness fell, the needle was stayed in her hand, and bending forward with the bright glow of the firelight upon her fair face and light, falling hair, she listened to her mother's recital. A prettier picture could not be imagined—the attendant maidens silent as statues, the stately lady who spoke, with her long white hand attesting her story, and the lovely maiden fair and pale as a snow-wreath melting before the flickering blaze! So rapt were they in the exciting tale, that the creaking gates, together with the entrance and quick steps of a guest, followed by the warder and a groom, were unnoticed till with a peculiar emphasis the Earl of Blackrocks was announced. The Lady of Enniskillen ceased, and a slight frown gathered on Clarice's brow, giving her an appearance more real and human than she had worn before.

"I shall believe her ladyship is what my friend the Baron Clare has so often called her," said Blackrocks, "a misty spirit of the twilight!"

But some wayward and sprite-like impulse had seized her, as he spoke, transforming her gentleness in an instant; and snatching a torch from the hearth, she had instantly lighted a half-dozen that waited in their niches, and in the sudden blaze vanished all sentiment and shadows from the room.

"For what does my Lord of Blackrocks honor us at this hour?" she asked, turning quickly towards him with the torch still in her hand.

"Certainly one would think," he responded, "to see the countess in a new character. I never knew that the shrew was a capability of hers."

"That being all, it were easy to see it and go!" she said.

"Clarice! Clarice!" cried her provident mother, "at least do not forget that Blackrocks is thy guest!"

It was the first time she had ever displayed any semblance to him but that of studied courtesy, since under the influence of her mother she had disliked to create any contention, the latter, being a partisan of the earl's, fully believing that his domineering energy and greater rank would achieve more glory to the house of Ulster than would an union with the mild Baron Clare.

"He is not likely to allow me to forget it, mother," she replied, flinging the torch upon the tiles. "Will the earl be seated?"

"Do not think I come to force myself upon your retirement," he said, still standing and leaning one hand upon the high back of the chair she offered. "I have few words to say, and shall not detain the lady long." He paused a moment, looking down upon the coals. "I have never, Countess Clarice, offered you my hand, nor decidedly asked you to become my wife, although you are well aware that such was my wish, and such the directions of your father, to which I stand pledged. To-night I do so, and excuse me if I find it necessary to declare that the answer I require must be positive, and without wavering. I am but a rough warrior, and unacquainted with the arts of love—yet Clarice!" he exclaimed, stepping forward suddenly and taking her hand, "you will be happier on so strong a bosom, and reign a prouder queen in so great a love as mine, than—"

"It is sufficient to assert your powers, and depreciate no others."

"Think, Clarice," he urged, still holding her hand, "before you sentence me either to the bliss of staying or to depart."

"If the earl has nothing more to say," answered she, after a short silence, "allow me to wish him farewell." And withdrawing her hand, she glanced at his face, and turned to leave him; but the glance of an instant had shown it under a new aspect, glowing with an unutterable tenderness, and its dark eyes full of singular beauty, yet simultaneously the face of Clare flashed across her memory and filled her with a repugnance to Blackrocks not to be overcome.

But at the moment she turned, she caught another phase of this passionate character—a countenance changing with an effect as sudden as lightning in a clear sky—and he exclaimed:

"Another moment. Remember your words are final, nor is a proposed union with Blackrocks to be answered by an insult. Countess Clarice, I await them!"

"They are already given."

"Clarice," said the Lady of Enniskillen, "tell us—do you love Clare?"

"No one has a right to ask me!" she answered, the red shooting over her cheek. "But I will answer that, too—no! Still, I had rather see one smile from him, than a year's courtship from the earl."

"It is the same thing," she replied. "O, child! are you, too, taken captive by his songs and galliards?"

"Mother!"

"Yes. I repeat it, you do love him!"

"No—not now," she answered, slowly. "Yes, perhaps, at another day. You will drive me to it."

"Madame, I did not come to disturb your family peace, nor to assist at any bickerings. Allow me to remind your daughter that I wait."

"And I have assured you," replied Clarice, "that waiting is unnecessary. You have received your answer; I will not be your wife. Go!"

"Then, since I stoop to no deception," he responded, "I consider it due myself to assure you that I shall immediately take such steps as will place you in my possession. I have sworn to the old Lord of Ulster that you shall never be the Baron Clare's, and I will keep my oath! To effect it, the only means remaining are to make you mine. Mine you might have been in love and peace, mine you shall be in force, and if you choose, in hatred. To-morrow morning there will be no escape from my power."

Anger flushing and paling her face in quick succession, Clarice asked him:

"Would a mouse in a lion's den threaten the kingly beast? You presume, my lord, because at this moment my guest, you are safe. I do not know why it should be so, yet I will not violate the laws of hospitality. You threaten to besiege me? Depart while you may!"

Her voice trembled with the intensity of her emotion, and stepping lightly forward, she touched his extended arm with her fingers—hardly knowing what she did—the quick electric force of the motion hurling it to his side, and flitted back to her mother.

"Strike your maids, Lady Clarice!" said he. "Your hands are too fair to bruise against mail!"

He strode towards her, seized and wrung them both in his own, and was gone. Clarice sank weeping to the floor.

"O, mother, how I hate him!" she sobbed. "Dare speak thus to me? He shall rue it! Where is Clare? I will send for him. We must hasten—increase our archers and our provision. We can send out through the Water-Way. Blackrocks does not know of that, thank Heaven!" She brushed off the tears, started to her feet, and immediately left to issue her orders, and do what she could in such haste before the earl should fulfil his threat.

The night was more than half spent, when a messenger returned, bringing with him the Baron Clare and some three or four followers. They had entered by what was called the Water-Way, a series of natural caverns and hewn passages leading to the shore. This place, once quite unguarded, had a few times afforded entrance for the sea into the cellars and dungeons of the castle, rendering it impossible for a residence from the malaria that ensued, or from the depth of water that covered the inhabitable portions of the place. To provide for such occasions in the future, great iron doors had been hung here and there along these passages, and of the several sets of keys to these doors, which hung always in the hall, one set had once been given to the Earl of Blackrocks by the father of Clarice, on some sudden emergency. This he still possessed, although the countess was not aware of it.

"The Baron Clare!" exclaimed Clarice, in a joyful tone that echoed through the great apartments, as she caught sight of him.

"Much aid will he give you!" replied the Lady of Enniskillen, scornfully, as she followed her down the stairs to welcome him.

"Returned so quickly?" cried Clarice, pleasure beaming from her face. "How kind! how brave! Perhaps you do not know into what danger you have come?"

"I have come into the danger from which no man would fly—the chains of Countess Clarice!" he answered, in courtly style.

"Ah, sir, we shall soon cease to use our gallant manner! Our hearts may be too heavy."

"What! you seem to apprehend some disastrous chance—I had thought—"

"Well, what had you thought, Baron Clare?"

"That your ladyship had summoned me back."

"That we might daily the day in courtship and pleasure?"

"As we have done—"

"Perchance we have. O no, Baron Clare! you are in real peril. This fortress will be in a state of siege to-morrow."

"Pardon me. Why do you not escape?"

"Escape? From the stronghold of Ulster? From the fortress of my fathers? That is not a habit of the Enniskillens. And if I wished it, our enemies are too near to render it practicable."

"Then there is no real danger?"

"The greatest. Our yeomen are already coming in with their bows. Blackrocks cannot prevent them yet. Our provisions are sufficient for a long time. Still, the risk is not small. I requested your presence and aid in it, but it may have been wrong to recall you. Pray pardon it, and if you think best and safest, leave me for your own home, I beseech you!"

"Really—the Countess Clarice cannot suppose I would desert her now! And yet I do not see how it is in my power to aid her! Myself and servants will be so many more consuming your provisions, perhaps I had best—"

"O no! no perhaps! Without doubt you had best," she exclaimed, with a sudden intonation of disdain that he had never heard from her before. "Leave, by all means! Your fears will infect my garrison."

Perhaps the taunt stung him, for she was obliged to interrupt profuse professions by assuring him that he was not needed, and that there was no time to lose, if he intended to depart. So saying, she bade farewell, ordered him to be conducted out the Water-Way, and again joined her mother. In less than an hour, they returned. The mouth of the Water-Way, they said, was guarded by a strong detachment, and a band of Blackrock's forces were slowly investing the castle. Escape for the Baron Clare was impossible.

"The place is impregnable," said Clarice to her mother. "I do not comprehend the earl's plan. He cannot starve us out, for Lord Arthur Grey, whom the Queen of England has appointed her deputy in Ireland, will arrive in the country before that pass!"

"My dear," said her mother, "the earl will render it impossible for you to communicate with Lord Grey. It is only a question of time. He will conquer, and meanwhile we shall be amused by the valorous exploits of Baron Clare."

"Do not mention him to me again; he is only fit to carry the ribbon of a lute. I can thank Blackrocks for this, at least, that he has taught me the falseness and cowardice that may lie under so handsome a face as Harvey Clare's."

Perhaps she wronged the baron, for once barred from escape, nobody could be more vigorous than he in precaution; and during the first of the siege, no one oftener showed his head above the battlements, or uttered louder defiance than he. But to all his boasts and threats, Blackrocks answered no word; he only proceeded on his work with a deadlier certainty of intention, and while Clare talked, he worked. The Countess Clarice now bade fair to be forlorn, indeed; for the one lover had become her enemy, and the other filled her with a contempt that increased itself by the recollection of her former favor. Frequently she saw the earl at his task below, heard him encourage the sappers, saw him draft the mines, and stand unflinching in the showers of arrows and storms of shot that now and then flew from her towers and raked his army. Unlikely as so insufficient a force as the earl's was to destroy this citadel, it is fair to presume that an ulterior purpose waited behind the array he displayed; yet that this should be, by means of his soldiers, to prevent any attempt on the part of Clarice to depart, thus retaining her before him, till "some storm great beyond a God's expression" should put it in his power to flood the caverns and obtain her, never entered any one's imagination. Now that the siege had become more earnest, Clare was less often seen, and soon he disappeared entirely from the beleaguers. In all the movements of Blackrocks, Clarice beheld nothing like triumph or exultation; it was, rather, as if he were carrying a resolve into execution, or fulfilling a promised duty, and only now and then, latterly, as success seemed to defy him, a spark of his old indomitable will and fiery courage animated him to prodigies of valor and daring attempts, which brought blushes to the brow of Clarice, as she thought of the baron sitting below with her mother, or pacing the long halls and joking and revelling and swearing by turns with the idle swarms there.

One day the bugles proclaimed a truce, and a herald bore a message to the countess inquiring if the Baron Clare were within her walls. On giving an answer in the affirmative, she was assured that the earl would never have imagined it, yet requested him to mount the outer wall, that he might be spoken with. This Clare did not hesitate to do, and in a moment more his tall, slender figure, attired in a style of costly magnificence distinguishing the courtiers of that period, was visible upon the ramparts; he leaned on a long sword, and the gentle winds blew all the short fair curls round his handsome, pale face, while with large Galway-gray eyes, he surveyed the horror-inspiring throngs below. He presented the appearance of an Apollo, God of the Lute and Bow; but however skilful at the former, he certainly drew his longest bow in the boast with which he had erst assailed the enemy.

The contrast between himself and Blackrocks was not but evident, the latter, with the gigantic thews and symmetry of the Anakim, so dark and strong as an impersonation of war itself, and wearing in bold relief the stern and rugged points of his character; yet still, as Clarice beheld him, she recalled the tenderer guise, momentary as it had been, in which she had once seen it.

"Baron Clare," said Blackrocks, "since we both contend for the honor of the Countess of Ulster's hand, I challenge you to descend to fair field, and in single combat with me, prove our rights—the unsuccessful combatant to withdraw his suit."

"I should be weak, surely," said the other, "to risk what is certain. You can do nothing with the fortress I defend, and so presume I will meet you on terms never before demanded. Mine is the right to propose conditions—not yours. It was not according to my own wish that I am here; but being here, certainly I shall not place myself in your hands."

"You defend the castle? a mistake. Both the castle and you are defended by a woman! Truly, you are not there by your own wish, for I took care that there should be a man in the fortress I attacked; but I find I have placed there only a coward. You are afraid, Baron Clare! Come down, man! Take your squire and a knight, and I alone will meet you three."

"I do not choose to place my fortune with the lady on such hazard."

There was a stir on the inner ladder, as he spoke, and in a moment Clarice sprang up and stood beside him.

"False, ingrate, timorous!" she exclaimed. "I will have no more of my noble followers slain. I will occasion no further massacre. Go down and end it with your sword, or I dismiss your suit!"

The baron paused, leaning more heavily on his weapon, and gazing down at his heroic rival. Finally he looked up, bowed and replied:

"As you will. I resign all claim to the hand of Countess Clarice!"

The earl saluted him with a smile of the keenest sarcasm, while the whole camp below echoed with a tempest of contemptuous laughing.

"Blackrocks," cried Clarice, "you have accomplished half your object! You have revealed to me the valor of our friend, in its most diminutive proportions! And you shall hear me assent to so much of the league you made with my father, that I never will wed with the Baron Clare! And you yourself see that his own words have made it impossible."

As she spoke, the baron would have given all his worldly possessions to have dared recall them; but again courage failed him, and he was silent.

"And the rest of the league?" asked Blackrocks.

"That is not my affair," she replied. "It belongs to Earl Lawrence to fulfil his own engagements!"

It was a strange mistake of the earl's that he assumed her words to be satire.

"Do not think he despairs," he cried. "If the castle cannot be stormed, wind and weather and God willing, there are other ways to capture the Countess Clarice!" And he retired to his tent.

The next morning, not a vestige of the enemy was to be seen. Like the stars stealing noiselessly from horizon to horizon, they and their tents had forsaken the region, the siege was raised, and Clarice was victorious.

Great were the rejoicings thereupon, and notwithstanding the violent storm that had set in that same night, troops of the neighboring peasants thronged the gates with congratulations and offerings; but as for the countess, she soon found herself missing the accustomed sights, and half lost at the sudden withdrawal of the enemy whose vigorous perseverance and determination had acted upon her like a fascination. This her mother also divined; and while still affording Clare all the honor due a guest, laughed at the abrupt termination of what she denominated her brace of singular courtships.

"And which of the lovers will you wed?" she asked.

"They are both foes now," answered Clarice, sadly.

"If Blackrocks should see her again," thought the Lady of Enniskillen, "the last Bride of the Ulsters would leave me for no barony of Clare."

In a day or two, scouts having returned who pronounced the roads safe, Clare prepared for his departure, and, strange to say, notwithstanding his public renunciation of the lady, not without a hope that he might yet win her by more peaceful means; and his first steps should be towards that part of the kingdom where Lord Arthur Grey, that stern disposer of justice, was remaining, that he might secure so powerful an influence in an affair whose last development his tact was insufficient to perceive.

The Countess Clarice seldom appeared to him now; but her mother, pleased at his failure, showed him more than customary civility, while he continued delayed by the long and bitter storm, and from this he drew fresh confidence.

On the night previous to his departure, Clarice stood in the hall where she had been rewarding several of those who had distinguished themselves in the siege, when a great cry and tumult became audible from below, and a flock of servants rushed up into the hall, crying—"The sea! the sea!"

"What is it?" exclaimed Clarice, springing forward.

"It is coming in!" they cried. "It has burst the doors! The dungeons are drowned in it already! The sea is coming in!"

"Some one has unlocked the doors!" she said. "Hasten! all the caverns are not flooded, and there is the long passage! We can at least secure three doors!" And she snatched the keys from the wall.

"Let the Baron Clare and the seneschal go!" cried the Lady of Enniskillen.

"I do not know the way," replied he, hanging back.

"Ha!" she exclaimed, with scorn; and seizing a torch, sprang forward herself down the passages and out of sight, followed only by the seneschal and warder.

In an instant she comprehended that it was the work of the earl, and all the admiration of his unsuccessful efforts were now curiously mingled with a resolution that she would not be baffled, and a sentiment of anger that she had already half yielded her heart to so bold an assailant. The roar of the waters resounded in the caverns beneath, the tumult of the storm was audible, beating on the coast without, while the great rush of air swept in even along the upper passage, which she was traversing before the advancing waves.

Far beyond the other two, she bounded along with eager speed. If she could only reach the second gate before the waters were so far within! She knew it must be unlocked; a moment more, and she was beside it. The other was but a few yards distant; it would be so much stronger could that also be closed. She dashed towards it. Already her hand was on it, and all her power was exerted to draw it together; yet the ponderous gate resisted every effort, and the cold, icy breath and mighty wind of the sweeping current chilled her—its noise was in her ears—it was in vain to endeavor—she left it and dashed back to the inner one. But faster than she the great waves tumbled in, with the force of the ocean compressed in the narrowest tunnel. The crest of the foremost broke over her head while she ran, and in another instant its great arms snatched her backward as she tore at the chains of the lifted gate, and buried her in the roaring depths. The torch fell hissing into the brine, and the great iron slide fell with a muffled clang between the sea and the other victims."

Seething in a whirlpool, the great mass swayed an instant, then burst the iron with a terrible explosion, and surged on. But a hand stronger than iron, a grasp equalling a giant's, had seized her in the first moment of her fall and drawn her up through a broad fissure of the rock, the waters spouting after her in vain, and when she awoke from her insensibility she was lying like a bruised flower in the arms of Blackrocks.

Meanwhile the Lady of Enniskillen and the household waited in an agonized silence for her return. But almost before they could have expected to see her, a messenger from the earl announced that she was safe and all the inner gates closed, the last statement being corroborated by the frightened seneschal and warder, who told what they knew of the loss of their mistress, and declared that a dozen men had sprung from the sides of the passage, assisted them in closing the gates and had passed up before them into the hall. Upon inquiry it was found that they had mingled with the servants and by one of these very individuals the message had been given. From him the lady now drew a relation of the whole affair, which in nowise displeased her, since she believed her daughter to be in good hands, and entertained a sincere respect for the earl. Not so the Baron Clare; on the instant he ordered his horses and followers and departed for Lord Grey's to demand restitution of a stolen child to her mother and a lady to her lover.

When Clarice had sufficiently recovered, she was taken into a neighboring cottage where her women sent by her mother were in attendance, who robed her in dry garments, after which she stepped boldly into the next room where Blackrocks walked to and fro, and demanded to be allowed to return. Her loveliness at the moment was more apparent than ever, greatly heightened by the excitement consequent on the peril she had just escaped, and the earl pausing to look at her could scarcely withhold the wild expression of love and admiration that rose to his lips. To her demand he returned no reply.

"You have saved my life where you endangered it," she cried. "Do not believe I feel myself indebted to you for saving yourself from the guilt of murder. You have no right to detain me; suffer me to go."

"Clarice, I assured you I would yet fulfil my promise to your father. I have you now in my power to command. Again I condescend, as I thought no woman could have compelled me, to ask you to become my wife. Little wild-wood fairy, airy sprite, is there nothing in so true a love to tempt you?"

She stood before him so doubtingly, so uncertain, as if half melted by the fervor of his passion, that he moved towards her with open arms. But as if blown by his breath, she flitted backward, exclaiming:

"Never, never your wife by compulsion! I promise nothing; but send me home—suffer me to go."

"Clarice, do you wish to go?"

It would have been a fortitude more than mortal that longer refused to confess a corresponding passion, and Clarice still remained in his charge. Suddenly he was informed that the Baron Clare, with Lord Grey and an immense retinue, were advancing up the country. Nothing daunted at this, Blackrocks prepared to obey the summons that awaited him, for though he knew the part he played was not one of strict justice, he knew also that the die was to be cast, and on the decision of the day, Clarice would be given or lost to him forever.

Never was there known such a day in all Ulster, as that when Lord Grey pitched his pavilion, commanded the earl to appear with his captive, and summoned the Lady of Enniskillen, as the bereaved, with other witnesses. The paraphernalia of justice were produced in their most impressive aspect; Clarice, who had been surrendered at the instant Lord Gray demanded her, sat in a dais chair canopied by dark curtains, her mother beside her; the Baron Clare took his station opposite. The scene was crowded with the nobility of the kingdom, for Lord Grey had declared that unless sufficient reason for the abduction could be given, and he knew none which would be so, the heaviest punishment of the law should fall upon Blackrocks, although he had formerly been his acquaintance and friend. At last Lord Grey entered; a moment afterward, Blackrocks, who advanced coolly, and after saluting Clarice and her mother, took his station opposite the judge, where he stood unsupported, awaiting the accusations, while the sheriff and other officers completed the company. After the usual solemnities the Baron Clare eagerly preferred his charges, and summoned the Lady of Enniskillen for his first witness.

"The Baron Clare is better with his tongue than his sword," said the lady, without rising. "My daughter is not stolen from me, nor has the Baron Clare any authority to conduct this prosecution. Your lordship sees the countess at my side, yet why we are here, or through what means our family affairs have become the subject of judicial inquiry, I am at a loss to know."

This was an unexpected turn; matters had been represented to the judge in a very different light. Clare, overcome with confusion, was unable to afford him any explanation. The Earl of Blackrocks he had known in England, and had previously visited him at his own residence. Somewhat perplexed he turned to him:

"I am at a great loss," said he, "and by no means at liberty to dismiss the case. If you have anything to propose that may assist us, Blackrocks, we shall be glad to hear it."

"I am not aware of any reason my Lord Grey can have for detaining us," said Blackrocks; "and the only suggestion I have to offer, is that he will request the Countess of Ulster to pronounce my sentence."

As Lord Grey courteously repeated the words to Clarice, she rose slowly, stepped down and advanced towards the earl, a look of perfect happiness suffusing her eyes and her smile. The bishop who sat by Lord Grey bent and whispered with him, and a murmur of a ceremony recently performed by him ran round the room, and reached the ears of the thunderstruck Baron Clare, when Clarice, placing her hand in that of Blackrocks, turned quietly to the bench:

"What sentence is it necessary to pronounce?" she said. "My lord, I am his wife!"

A SCRIPTURAL REPROOF.

An eminently Christian lady once administered a very salutary reproof to a minister who was too frequently in the practice of showing a bitter spirit toward his fellow-Christians. He was dining at the table of her husband, also a minister, and dealt out his accusatory and acrimonious remarks to all around him, and at length, with an air and tone bordering on rudeness, turned to her and said:

"Well, now, madam, I am determined to have your opinion."

She very calmly replied, "Why, sir, I had rather be excused from giving it."

He rejoined, "But we must and will have it, for we live in times in which all ought to show their colors."

"Well, sir," she replied, "then my opinion is this: that gentlemen had better keep their razors to shave their own faces, and not employ them to cut and slash everybody who does not think exactly as they do. I also think, sir, that Paul judged the same when he said to Titus, 'Put them in mind to speak evil of no man, to be no brawler, but gentle, showing meekness to all men.'" The gentleman soon after retired.—Christian Secretary.

CONTEMPLATION.

Mount on contemplation's wings,
And mark the causes and the end of things;
Learn what we are, and for what purpose born,
What station here 'tis given us to adorn,
How best to blend security with ease,
And win our way through life's tempestuous seas.

ANTICIPATION.

BY LENA LYLE.

The twilight has departed,
And coming is the night,
The brilliant stars are sparkling,
Those gems of radiant light.
But ah, he oft has told me,
That even starry gleams
Could never, never rival
My dark eye's sparkling beams.

I'm waiting for his coming,
I know he'll soon be here;
O, cease, fond heart, this beating!
How has he grown so dear?
The rose is on my bosom,
The rose he bade me wear,
My tresses are unbraided,
He says it looks more fair.

I wonder why he tarries,
'Tis really very late!
He said at half past seven,
And now 'tis almost eight!
I do declare I'll chide him,
And angrily I'll talk,—
Hark! there, I hear his footstep,
He's coming up the walk.

O, let me haste to meet him,
I cannot chide him now,
For I feel his earnest kisses
On lip, and cheek, and brow.
O tenderly he folds me
Close to his manly heart,
As he whispers, "Would, my darling,
We had met no more to part."

THE FOUNDER OF A CITY.

BY HENRY W. WOLCOTT.

"AND if I make a home in these western wilds, who is there to share the lot of the lonely emigrant?"

"Do you ask who, John Harris? Are there not lonely women here—women who have left their native country, with high hopes of usefulness and happiness here, only to find them blasted on their arrival—women whose ability and energy need but a shadow of an impetus, to make them the ornaments of these wilds as you call them, instead of the clogs which they are now forced to remain?"

"No doubt, no doubt; but you forget that I am even past middle age, that I have no wealth (that is yet to be gained), and moreover that such is my disposition that I would not marry an angel who did not love me—I mean love me truly for myself alone, and not to escape from these ills which you say women unhappily experience here."

"Certainly not; I would not counsel such a proceeding as that. I am as strenuous in favor of love marriages as you can be; and sincerely hope that you will not marry ~~one~~ of these stray damsels, unless you can declare unequivocally that you prefer her to all the world."

"I never saw but one such, Esther, and she, alas! is far beyond my hope. On the passage from England, I did hope that she regarded me with something like friendship; but since our landing, she treats me with the indifference of a stranger."

A blush, like the rosy dawn, lighted up the features of the lady, and then gave place to a paleness like death. Her companion saw it wonderingly; and he mused in silence for some minutes. Then, as he raised his eyes to hers, he saw there a truth, a sincerity, a nobleness, such as he had once believed rarely, if ever, existed in woman. All at once he knew, just as if it had been revealed to him, that he might rely upon her love for him, and that once given, it would never be recalled.

Little, however, did Esther Say realize this. She had not dreamed that she was the woman whom he had described as showing him more than common regard. On board the ship, she was a ministering spirit to all that seemed ill or homesick; and as John Harris appeared dull and depressed, she extended her cheerful cares to him also; brightening up his gloomy face by a word of cheer, but never thinking any more than now, that she had attracted more than a passing notice from him.

Esther Say was a lonely woman. Brothers and sisters she never had; but from her earliest memory her father had been her sole relative. When he died, England became a wilderness to her, and she gladly became one of the little band who followed the western star. No fixed purpose had she in this. Her only motive was to change the dreary, monotonous life which her father's death imposed on her. From the moment that she went on shipboard, until she landed in America, she was conscious of a strange exhilaration throughout her whole being. Never ill, she was ever watchful of others being so; and her name rang through the vessel as that of a benefactress to all.

That the shy and silent man who stood before her now, should have singled her out from the others whose fresh, young, blooming cheeks betrayed their fair English blood, while hers was pale olive, through which the roses scarcely ever rushed to sight, was something very strange to think of; and if her blush showed that she did dwell a moment upon its probability, her after paleness as truly showed that the thought was transient.

But Esther Say, with her pale cheek and sable garb, had been the daily and nightly dream of Harris, ever since his foot pressed the wild shore; and now he hastened to ask if indeed there was anything to hope. And Esther, with the truth and sincerity which was her great characteristic, accepted the whole burden of his hopes, wishes, and answered him most truly that he was dear to her desolate heart.

They were married; and the strong but unobtrusive sense and judgment of Esther Say wrought marvels in the shy and silent Harris. From this time, he was a new being; unconscious perhaps of the invisible spell that had transformed him, but conscious enough of his new happiness and the treasure that was about his daily hearth.

From Chester County, Pennsylvania, the new tide of emigration carried him with it, to the mouth of Couoy Creek, on the Susquehanna, near the present site of Bainbridge, in Lancaster county. Here, amidst the terrors of a frontier life, Esther preserved the calm dignity which became her so well.

The Indians came to her house, with intentions of mischief in every look and motion. The quiet, peaceful, yet lofty air that she wore towards them, disarmed them completely. They sat at her table and ate her salt, and forever after, she was safe from their attacks. But this was not when her husband was at home; and there was no bond admitted by the tribe, so it seemed, to protect him from their assaults. They summoned him near his house, tied him fast to a mulberry tree, and left him momentarily expecting them to return and despatch him by some horrible mode of death.

With the step and air of a princess, Esther walked through the entire band as they were returning, probably to perform their work upon him, and with her own hands cut loose the cord that bound her husband to the tree, and led him in triumph to the house. A simple kindness to one of them, a glass of wine to a sick girl, brought the whole tribe to regard her as an emanation from the good Spirit.

"When I die, Esther, I—"

"Hush, dear John!"

"Nay, hear me, dearest; it will come no sooner for speaking of it. When I die, let me be buried under that tree where your courage, my precious wife, saved me from a cruel death."

It was mournful to hear her husband speak of dying. Latterly she had had strange thoughts of death for herself. She could not bear to think of leaving the green earth, this quiet, beautiful spot, where two happy years had made her forget her once desolate condition. She looked at her husband, and tears came into her eyes.

Within the last few months, she had lain awake, night after night, thinking of her own death. But until this hour, she had not named it to him. Her saddest thought was that she must leave him. It had been late in life that John Harris had loved at all; but the sentiment once cherished in his heart, death itself could not destroy. Esther well knew this, and she trembled to think how soon death might part them on earth.

It was not thus to be. The next morning after this conversation was one that might herald in some glad event. There was not a cloud in the clear blue, July sky, as it bent lovingly over the Susquehanna, clear and blue as itself. The tree tops bowed to the western breeze that came laden with fragrance on the senses. There was joy and gladness under the roof of John Harris; for on that bright morning the first white child born west of the Conewago Hills, drew its first breath, and now lay by Esther's side.

Soon the star of prosperity shone brightly upon the wedded pair. The Indians, grown friendly to the man whom they once sought to kill, brought their richest and most valuable furs for him to purchase, and in this sort of trade he grew rich. His storehouses were filled to overflowing with these articles, and his whole time occupied in buying and selling them.

Esther was as exemplary in her maternity as she had been in her wifehood. She did not know that she was holding in her arms the founder of a great city like Harrisburg; but so it was. But future honors sank before future goodness in the high-minded Esther Harris. Nothing could give her child so fair a patent of nobility, as to have his father's simple goodness and beauty of life reflected in his own. Such a mother could hardly fail of having a good son. The younger John Harris grew up a rare youth; and Esther may be pardoned if she was deeply proud of his talents and acquirements. He had attained to an age when the allurements of the world are hardest to resist; but they failed, and his youth was as the type of his pure, unsullied manhood.

The older Harris had been long subject to fits of depression. Notwithstanding the perfect harmony and beauty of his domestic relations, the even tenor of Esther's calm and innocent life, and the rare promise of his son, there brooded over the moody Englishman a cloud as from that fated November sky which it is said is doomed to behold the self-destruction of so many of his countrymen. The same feeling of doubt which made him incredulous as to his acceptance by Esther Say in her youth, now troubled him in regard to the continuance of her love. A morbid melancholy pervaded the whole tone of his mind, and rendered him unfit for society and sometimes insensible to the tenderest cares of his devoted wife.

He told her he must die; and from his manner she was led to dread that already he might have decided how and when. But Esther, though doomed to lose her husband, was spared the deeper grief she had feared. Slowly, but surely, John Harris yielded to decay, and just before he left her, his soul resumed its hope. A look of infinite peace and joy lighted up the dying features, and all was over. More than ever the mother and son were now united. He who had been in all to them, lay beneath the spreading branches of the mulberry tree where he had once faced a violent death. This time, Esther had walked with him to the eternal river, but human love could go no further.

With the calm dignity of his mother engrafted upon his manners, and his father's rectitude of purpose, joined with his own indomitable perseverance and energy, John Harris, the younger, was well fitted to become the founder of a great city like Harrisburg. This destiny he fulfilled while his mother lived to hear of her son's well-earned fame. An aged, but still capable and energetic woman, she accompanied him to the site of the new city, saw the work of his hands, and blessed him as the staff of her declining age. Then she returned to lay her bones beneath the mulberry tree, beside the husband of her youth. The elder Harris died in 1748; but of his wife's exact time of death we have no reliable record.

JOHN MILTON'S FAME GONE OUT.

So says William Wistanley in his "Lives of the Poets from the Conquest to James II." The whole passage is a literary curiosity. It will at least serve to illustrate how different an estimate the world has placed upon the immortal poet, from that of the fawning sycophants of royalty. It is as follows:

"John Milton was one whose natural parts might deservedly give him a place among the principal of English poets, having written two heroic poems and a tragedy, namely: "Paradise Lost," "Paradise Regained," and "Sampson Agonista." But his fame is gone out like a candle-snuff, and his memory will always stink, which might have ever lived in honorable repute, had he not been a notorious traitor, and most impiously and villainously bely'd that blessed martyr, King Charles the First."

DEACON BRIGGS.

Old Deacon Briggs is as remarkable for his closeness as was Dickens's man Barkis. His name had come to a proverb in our region for such an economy as ever makes a man the subject of ridicule and contempt. One bitter cold morning a few falls ago, he bade the boys drive together all the pigs that were to be fattened for the market, in a little yard just at the corner of the house. A pig was caught by one of the youngsters; the deacon with a pair of pincers in one hand, and a sharp knife in the other, seized the unfortunate by the tail, and cut it off, close up. So on through the whole herd, leaving not a pig with even the stump of a tail. Cort, who worked for his grandfather stood by in amazement—his hands in his pockets, his toes turned in, his old fur cap over his ears, his body warped into a crescent by the cold, and his teeth jawing about the outrage with an incessant clatter. At last he stuttered out:

"Grandpa, what are you cutting off those tails for?"

Sober and solemn was Deacon Briggs as he replied:

"You will never be a rich man, for you do not know what it is to be savin'. You ought to know, my child, that it takes a bushel of corn to fatten an inch of tail!"

Cort has gone to the West, and in the corn-growing bottoms of Michigan, has taken to raising tailless porkers.—Berkshire Gazette.

AN UNREASONABLE PROPOSAL.

An Irish servant, who was in the employment of an English gentleman residing in Ireland, was, on one occasion, about going to a fair, held annually at a neighboring village, when his master endeavored to dissuade him from going. "You always," said he, "come home with a broken head; now stay at home, Darby, and I'll give you five shillings." "I'm forever, and all obliged to yer honor," replied Darby; "but does it stand to reason," he added, flourishing his shillelagh over his head, "does it stand to reason that I'd take five shillings for the great big bating I'm to get to-day?"—Irish Anecdotes.

THE SABBATH.

Apart from vanity and sin,
How calm the Sabbath stands,
As if our Father held it in
The hollow of his hands.

How calm! a vestibule before
Of work-days and of care,—

THE WRECK OF THE PIRATE SHIP.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

"HARK, Abel! is not that a sound of distress?" asked Miriam Hinckley, of her young husband, as the gust swept fearfully around the corner of their little sea-side home, the very next evening after their wedding.

"I hope not, dear; I would not wish to leave you so soon, to see such dismal sights as I have witnessed on this shore sometimes. I will just go to the door and listen."

He opened the door which led directly from the room to the little front yard, and Miriam hastily followed.

"Stand back, Miriam; the cold wind will freeze you. It is snowing so thick that I can see nothing, but I think I can hear a sound at the beach. I must run down, and see what it is."

"Not in this storm, Abel. O, don't go alone! Let me go with you, please?"

"You go! Why Miriam, I would not let you step across the yard. Go in to the fire, and mind and keep up a good blaze, for I shall be wet when I come home."

The terrified little woman clung tightly to her husband's arm, entreating him not to go; but he turned upon her almost a look of rebuke, as he said:

"Then if I should be driven ashore, and in danger, you would not wish any one to go out of a comfortable room to help me?"

"O, what have I said, dear Abel? Yes, go, dear, and do all the good you can to the poor souls. I did not think."

"Well, it is not strange that you should not think. This is a new life to my little country-bred wife. There, hand me my sou'wester, and don't cry; I'll be back soon."

Miriam did as he told her, and went back to the blazing fire; but her knitting-work, although it was for Abel, was not touched, and every two minutes she opened the door to see if he was coming. At last, she sat perfectly still, but looking into the fire with a troubled gaze. Then her eyes wandered to the shelf above the fire-place—so high that she could not reach up to it—and the bright, beautiful shells that adorned it, the great shark's jaw that hung beneath the shelf, and the model of a fishing boat on the chest of drawers, all told of the sea. Then she thought of what had hardly been realized in her mind before, that on that very sea—treacherous, destroying, cruel as it was, her Abel would soon—nay, often, be sailing; and how dreary all these things would look then—how should she watch every storm, which in her country^d home had scarcely occupied her thoughts at all. O, how dismal she thought it would be thus living ever by the stormy waters. She wished that Abel and herself might be in the loneliest village in New Hampshire, where she was born and bred, rather than living here.

It was very sad for the young girl, not yet twenty-four hours a bride, to have all these thoughts of wreck, and danger, and death; and moreover, as she turned her hour-glass for the second time since Abel went out, she began to tremble and weep. At one time she sprang to the door, resolved to brave the storm, and follow him; but the snow blew in so heavily that she was nearly covered, and she went back shivering to the fireside.

It was full three hours when Abel came in, and his face was ghastly pale. Miriam met him at the door, but when she saw that look, she fell lifeless to the floor, overcome by her previous terror. When she revived, he had changed his wet suit for another, afraid to touch her while she was yet dripping with the melted snow; and had laid her upon the bed in the little bed room adjoining their only other room.

She now crept to his side near the fire, and he sheltered her with his arm, while he told her what had happened. A large ship had been wrecked so close to the shore, that already the dead were lying almost in heaps upon the beach. Two men only were saved, and these had been taken, perfectly exhausted, to the homes of the oldest fishermen. Abel, and indeed all the men who were out, comprising all who lived near the shore, could only stand upon the beach, and hear the "cry of some strong swimmer in his agony," as he made unavailing attempts to reach the shore in the darkness to which the lanterns held by the men could hardly impart a gleam of light while the snow fell so heavily. As they plunged into the boiling waves from the side of the fast-breaking ship, they could hear the heavy plash, which in most cases was followed by a silence, deep and profound, save for the rolling and surging water, as if they had dropped at once into the lowest depths of their fearful grave. Then one or two would struggle up to the surface, hold a brief strife with the waves, and they too would sink.

The young wife shuddered at the narration, and wept afresh at the thought of some night watching for Abel, and his dead body thrown upon the beach.

"Now, I am going to test the courage of a seaman's wife. I am sorry to try it so soon; but you will have to get used to it. We take turns and watch when such a thing as this occurs, and I join the next watch. I must be back to the beach, in half an hour, and you must lie down until I come back. See, I shall put on a stouter jacket than before, and this log will burn until I come back: No one will harm you, and it shall never be said that Abel Hinckley's wife had not courage to stay alone, even in a storm."

Poor Miriam tried to be very brave, as she took down the heavy jacket, but she broke down before Abel had opened the door. He found her up, with a fresh fire, and a bowl of hot milk porridge when he returned, which was just before dawn. He had no more news to tell, except that the bodies were still being cast upon the shore.

The sun shone brightly upon the snow the next morning, and the beach at Wellfleet was covered with people who thronged to see the spectacle of death. A hundred dead bodies lay there with ghastly upturned faces. Goods of every description were being constantly thrown up; boxes, bales and cases of all kinds and sizes. Even the women came down to look—all excepting Miriam and two or three others, who could not bear to see the terrible sight. Some reckless beings were carrying off the goods, without offering to assist those who were endeavoring to prepare the bodies for as decent a burial as could be obtained.

Abel's father, an old and experienced Cape fisherman, remarked to his son the singularly ferocious and terrible look of every face that was presented to their view as they passed across the beach:

"I have often seen men thrown on the shore thus," said the old man, "but I never saw any that looked like these. Most of them that I have seen had a quiet kind of resigned look on their faces, as if they had struggled hard at first, and then all at once given up the battle, and laid down peacefully."

One of the dead was a very large, powerful man. His hands were clenched tightly together, and the mouth was compressed until the teeth had pierced the lip deeply. Something glittered in the sun, and Abel stooped down to examine it. It was a large gold breast-pin, in the form of a dagger, and was marked "Bellamy" on the reverse. Abel put it back again quickly, and asked his father if it could be the pirate, who had been cruising about the West India islands so long.

"Why not?" asked the old man. "Surely these faces look like such a crew as might have belonged to him."

"Here is his name at any rate," said Abel.

"What on that pin? Then take it out, before those thieves steal it. You must give it to Squire Preston. It may prove a good deal when they come to look into this matter. Now, Abel, look out for some other mark or proof."

But there was nothing but the pin that bore any name; and their attention ere long was turned towards a fishing smack which was rapidly making Wellfleet harbor.

"To think of that craft living out such a storm, and this ship unable to stand off! Abel, if my old eyes don't deceive me, that is the Lady Bird, Captain Pond, who went out last month."

"Your eyes are right this time, father. It is the Lady Bird."

The little craft came in with not a sail torn. She had found a safe cove for the night. Captain Pond, a capable, intelligent man, had been so intent upon arriving, that he had hardly cast a look towards shore, until the vessel was secured. Then, with even more of horror in his countenance than had rested on the others, he surveyed the scene before him. A crowd gathered around him, for some anxiety had been felt for his safety. As he looked narrowly at the faces remaining on the beach—for some of them were already removed—he exclaimed to his mate:

"Good God, Barton—here is Bellamy's whole fleet!"

"What do you mean?" asked a dozen voices at once.

"I mean that probably the whole piratical fleet commanded by Bellamy, was near the Cape yesterday. He captured my vessel last Friday; but offered me the prize back again, if I would pilot him into Cape Cod harbor, so that he might clear his ship at Provincetown. I knew, or suspected at least, who was my captor; and just at dusk I brought him so near the land, knowing that his intention was to plunder, that I fancy he must have struck the outer bar while I was trying to get safely on shore. It was dark when I got sheltered, and the storm rising suddenly, the snow prevented me from seeing any of the vessels again."

Abel showed him the gold dagger, and the captain identified it as the one he had noticed upon the pirate's breast. The pirates had met their fate then, but in a most terrible manner, without warning or preparation. As might be expected, it was long before the excitement subsided in Wellfleet. With Miriam, the images suggested by that night were long a source of unmitigated disturbance. With many others it was a matter of deep interest. It was believed that some of the smaller vessels of the fleet were not wrecked; and of course, there was deep anxiety lest they were still cruising near the eastern shore, or at least not far from the course pursued by the vessels bound to the western islands.

Meanwhile, quantities of copper coins—William and Mary coppers, and pieces of silver, called cob money, were thrown by every troubled wave upon shore, for the remainder of that year (1717).

'On the outer bar, the violence of the sea moves the sand; and long after the shipwreck, an iron caboose was seen when the tide was lowest. Gradually the fears that had been awakened, were lulled, and the hardy fishermen, and those who traded at the West India ports, made their voyages untroubled by the vision of pirates.

Good old Abraham Hinckley had passed away, and slept with his fathers, and his son Abel had succeeded to the possession of the family homestead, which promised to be a more convenient dwelling for Miriam and her fast-increasing army of little ones, than the small cottage by the seaside, with its two contracted apartments. Their present abode was roomy and comfortable; having any number of queer nooks and irregular hiding-places. Abel had given up the sea for Miriam's sake, had hired land in addition to his own, and was now quite a flourishing farmer. Miriam, country-bred as she was, was perfectly at home on a farm, and her advice upon outdoor matters proved as valuable as her indoor work. All her little nervous ways evaporated in the broad sunshine of her husband's continual presence, and their home exhibited a degree of comfort and hospitality that was truly pleasant to see. The poor, and often wasteful and improvident fishers' wives never lacked a helping hand when their resources ran low. Miriam's heart and larder were alike open, and a little timely help from her often saved many a despairing mother the grief of seeing her children starve before her eyes when the "bread-winner" was taken away.

Miriam was a fine specimen of a good, capable, industrious, New England wife. Handsome she was not, except through her rosy, healthful color, which never grew paler. Her hair, which could not, by any stretch of imagination, be called anything but unmitigated red in color, was still soft and abundant, and her short, stout figure, although not exactly modelled on the line of beauty, was yet indicative of health and strength, and so far, was preferable to that of the delicate beauty of those willowy forms, that make no shadow on the ground when they walk. Abel and herself were, for a wonder, sitting alone one spring evening, by the kitchen fire, which was heaped with great logs as in mid-winter, to meet the wants of the immense kettle hanging over it, as well as to obviate the chilliness that pervades the sea-shore towns, sometimes even in the summer nights. The children had had their supper, and the weary little limbs were all lain down to rest. The bright flames danced out upon the broad hearth, and threw great shadows on the ceiling, while Miriam's eyes were fixed upon a huge underbed of coals that lay underneath the burning brands.

"What do you see there?" asked Abel, laughing at her earnest look.

"Churches and steeples, and great ships of war, and wrecks. O, I cannot tell you half I see."

Abel turned his loving, good-humored countenance full upon her, and laying his hand caressingly upon her shoulder, he said:

"Speaking of wrecks reminds me that we have not spoken of the great shipwreck for a long time. I have been so busy—so happy too, with you and the children, that I have not thought of anything unpleasant. How quiet and happy we live, Miriam—so happy that time does not change you a bit."

"Ah! Abel, turning flatterer?"

"Indeed I am not. I should be sorry if I could not praise you openly, when my heart is so full of you."

There was a tender silence between them for some moments. Then they spoke of the old story of the wreck, and of how pleasant it was to be at home, and never to go to sea any more. It was pleasant too, to have an evening to themselves. Always there were hired people around, or the children absorbed their attention, or something occurred—a neighbor's visit, or a meeting of some sort—to keep them from being alone. Now, it was agreed upon between them that this hour should be their own, and that nothing but sickness should keep them from being together, either sitting or walking. A slight knock at the door disturbed their conversation; and on Abel's calling to "come in," a tall, stout man entered. There was only firelight; but that showed a face, dark, weatherbeaten and deeply scarred. Abel proffered the stranger a chair near the fire, but he seemed to prefer a darker corner, and sat down in the shadow.

"Have you travelled far, friend?" asked the farmer.

"I have been on the Cape a few days only," said the man, in a deep, harsh voice, that made Miriam rise quickly and light a candle. Thinking the unknown guest might not have eaten supper, she set out the table, and transferred some of the contents of the kettle to a large dish, inviting him to partake of them. He sat down at the table, ate heartily, and drank a mug of cider. Then, turning to Abel, he asked him if he could accommodate him with a bed.

"I have money to pay for it," he said, "and I wish to remain here several days, perhaps a week or two."

Abel conferred with his wife, and then told his visitor he could have a room if he would be willing to step across the yard to get to it. It was a room adjoining the corn chamber, that had been built for one of their hired men, and at certain times of the year was occupied by an extra hand, but was now empty. If that would suit him, he was welcome to use it as long as he pleased.

"Nay, I am not without means to pay," said the man, showing a belt around his waist, which he said was full of gold pieces.

"Well, well, put up your money to night, my friend," said Abel. "Time enough to pay, when I present my bill."

By the time this conversation had ceased, the farm and kitchen hands assembled in the long kitchen for prayers. Abel laid the great Bible on the table, and prepared to read. The moment he took his seat, the stranger started up and asked if he could be shown to his room, and a boy was despatched to guide him. He stayed there the next morning until he was called to breakfast, and after that he wandered off by himself.

He was at the farm-house several weeks, and when he went away offered to pay, which Abel positively refused. The man seemed to accede, but two or three broad gold pieces were found in little Robert's pocket, which he said the sailor had put there. Towards autumn he came again, exhibited the same reluctance to stay in the room while the Bible was read, and wandered still longer away by himself. It was still warm weather, and the windows were open all night. The first night was one of horror to the family. The most awful shrieks came from the room across the yard, and Abel, supposing the guest to be ill, went up to his door, awoke him, and asked him if such was the case. Sternfeldt, as he called himself, apologized for disturbing him, and begged him to believe that it was only an attack of nightmare. But as long as he stayed with them this time the shrieks were nightly repeated, accompanied by profane, blasphemous, and quarrelsome words, which were heard by every one in the neighborhood.

"That lodger of yours seems to have a hull legion of devils, squire," said one of the old fishermen to Abel, who had now arrived at the dignity of a justice of the peace.

"Poor man, yee! He has the nightmare badly," returned Abel.

"Nightmare!" said old Ben, contemptuously. "Come down in the Stevens pastur, with me, will ye, squire?"

Abel went, and the old man led him to a spot where he had seen Sternfeldt digging the day before, and at the same time putting something carefully in the leather belt which he wore round his waist, and which he never attempted to conceal at any time.

"Now, look here, squire," said Ben, "this ere man is beyond all doubt, one of that Bellamy's crew, and he is hunting up the gold that they used to bury hereabouts."

Abel started. There was indeed, some reason to think so; but his unsuspecting nature had never dreamed of this. He had fancied him a heart-broken, disappointed man—an infidel perhaps, but not so bad as he might be. His feeling and Miriam's towards him had been one of sincere pity. While he was thinking what to do or say, Sternfeldt sent for him and his wife, to step across the yard to his room. He was in great distress—dying apparently. He uttered but a few words, but they were sufficient to show that the dying man was what the old fisherman had conjectured—one of the crew perhaps of a small vessel belonging to Bellamy's fleet, that had escaped the fate of the larger ship. Indisputably he had known that treasure had been concealed in various places on the Cape, and hence his wish to remain. His terrible night sufferings were from dreams, in which, probably, were repeated the scenes through which he had passed. Byron says:

"The mind that broods o'er guilty woes
Is like the Scorpion girt by fire."

ELOQUENCE OF THE BAR.

A man was charged in one of the Brooklyn criminal courts a few years ago with having stolen his neighbor's pig. A young lawyer, a gray-haired old man now, we know him well, was appointed to defend the prisoner. The evidence was clear and conclusive, but the young limb of the law so wrought upon the feelings of the jury, picturing the desolate home of the prisoner, and the agony of his wife and children, should the husband and father be convicted, that many of the jurors were in tears, and without leaving their seats returned a verdict of not guilty.

"There now, run home," said the counsellor, "and never be caught in such another scrape."

"And am I clear?" asked the culprit.

"You are," replied his lawyer.

"But," said he, loud enough for judge and jurors to hear, "what shall I do with the pig?"

"O," replied his friend, "cook it and eat it. The jury on their oaths, declare you didn't steal it."

STORM AND STARLIGHT.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

Low, leaden clouds, with trailing edges,
Drift slowly past the mountain's side;
A chill wind shrieks among the sedges
That fringe the black and sluggish tide.

Not now the sounds of harp and cittern,
No more the gay and dreamy tune;
I hear instead, the booming bittarn,
And the harsh screaming of the loon.

Like fluttering hearts the ash leaves quiver;
Blue flashes light the craggy tops,
And, where no ripples dim the river,
'Tis circled o'er by sullen drops.

Darker and darker! How the thunder
Reverberates through gorge and glen—
As though hell's gates were burst asunder,
And tortured hosts hailed earth again!

Aslant, the arrowy rain descending
Half hides the grass with sudden mist:
'Tis gone! O'er earth an arch is bending
Of sapphire—topaz—amethyst;

And ruby—violet, and vermillion,
And purple—backed by skies of dun;
While in the west, a cloud pavilion,
Heaven's pageantry—receives the sun.

Faint and more dim;—with twilight blending,
Fades the last lingering amber bar;
But heaven's new light to earth is lending,
Lo! in yon blue, the evening star!

THE WAYSIDE CROSS.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

We left the hostelry at an early hour—my guide and myself—and although the pace of the mules which we bestrode only through necessity, was provokingly slow and deliberate, in less than an hour all signs of civilization were lost, and we found ourselves surrounded and hemmed in on every side by the rugged and stupendous masses of rock which skirted the narrow path. In these wilds, ages gone by, some awful convulsions must have occurred; but whether these frightful chasms and deep gorges were caused by the sudden bursting forth of the hidden fires of the earth, or by the upheaving and rending of several mountain peaks, it is uncertain. The causes are unknown, and so they must remain.

Interested as I naturally was in the awe-inspiring spectacle, my attention was soon drawn from the contemplation of these evidences of the power of the Creator. At irregular intervals along the way, rude crosses were erected, two or three sometimes occurring in the space of half a league, though in some instances this number was doubled. Several of these crosses that I noticed, were painted black, relieved by the letters I. H. S., in white; others were roughly constructed, being evidently put together hastily, but all had a strangely forbidding appearance, and impressed me with an undefined feeling of discomfort even before I had become acquainted with their true and fearful significance.

That travellers are generally thus affected by these monitors, I know to be true; and their object is quickly made known to them, assuming that all of the mountain-guides were as voluble and communicative as was ours upon the occasion referred to. He was a dark-complexioned, well-favored fellow, spite of his rags and dirt, the possession of which among the lower classes of Spain might be well esteemed a necessity. Since our departure from the inn, he had kept up a running fire of description and commentary, speaking in English, a tolerable knowledge of which he had obtained by frequent intercourse with travellers, but varying it occasionally, and reverting to Spanish, as necessity demanded a greater display of superlatives.

Becoming at last aware that his words were lost on me, and observing the objects which had fixed my attention, he ceased his chattering and we rode onward for some moments in silence. As we passed another cross, to my surprise Matteo reverently removed his tattered sombrero. He noticed my inquiring glance, and drawing rein, observed:

"I always do so at this spot, senor. This spot marks the place where a man once died."

"And is that the meaning of all these crosses which we have passed?" I inquired.

"Yes, senor; each has its history. The one we last saw is placed where Tomaso Gaspachi fell. You have heard of him?"

I replied in the negative.

"What! not of Tomaso, the brigand?" Matteo rejoined, in astonishment. "He was the terror of these mountains for many years; and I well remember when my father—Heaven rest his soul!—fell into the hands of Tomaso and his cut-throats. Jesu! Mercy on me! but he was a sight after he had escaped them. The villains robbed him of everything, leaving him hardly a rag to his back. But Tomaso could not always be in luck. After he had flourished for years, and robbed hundreds of travellers, of all degrees and nations, the government soldiers tracked him to his cave in the rocks. Most of the brigands were killed at once; but Tomaso and a few others managed to escape down the causeway. The soldiers pursued them closely, and Tomaso was shot; and where he fell, they buried him and planted the cross over his grave."

"When did this happen?" I asked.

"Many years ago, senor. Perhaps you observed that Tomaso's cross is much bent over and decayed; it has stood long in the wind and rain. The one before that, if I remember rightly, is raised over the bones of a poor fellow whom the brigands murdered and robbed. The next—"

"No matter about the next, Matteo," I interrupted. "Tell me about this one." And I pointed to the cross before which we had stopped. "I am sure there is a story connected with it."

"This one? Ah, yes; you are right, senor. It has a strange history, and you shall hear it as we ride on. But first dismount, if you please, senor; this way—carefully, slowly. Now look down."

With these words, he led me to the verge of the precipice, grasping my arm firmly. I looked down, as he bade me, and notwithstanding the instant dizziness which almost overcame me, remained dumb with wonder. Far, far below—so far that it seemed as if the wearied eye needed rest to reach the whole distance—were spread out the fields and forests through which I had lately journeyed. Lying to the right, like a mere dot in the vast landscape, was the little village which we had left in the morning. The fearful precipice, at whose highest elevation we stood, was nearly or quite perpendicular, although its escarpments and rocky projections were very numerous.

As I gazed with indescribable emotions upon the scene, Matteo directed my attention to a bird which was sweeping the air in large circles, so far below us, that its form was hardly distinguishable.

"What is it?" he asked.

"Some small bird," I replied, carelessly. "A hawk, perhaps."

He shook his head with a strange smile.

"Senor is mistaken," he said. "It is the largest bird of the mountains."

"What—the vulture?" I asked, with unfeigned astonishment.

"Yes, senor—it is the vulture. We are far above his nest, and there is almost as great a distance between him and the prey he is now marking, as between us and him. Mark the place well, senor, that you may remember it."

His advice was needless; it was not of a character to be easily forgotten, even with a slight inspection. After we had remounted and continued on our journey, Matteo narrated the story connected with the pass. I give it substantially as he related it, suppressing his peculiarities of speech and narration. The occurrence which forms the basis of the tale is known, he informed me, as THE TRAGEDY OF THE PASS.

"In the little village which lies at the foot of one of the loftiest peaks of the Pyrenees, lived Maria Estoval, a woman somewhat higher in rank than the herdsmen and vineyard planters of the neighborhood, her husband having been a colonel in the army during the peninsular campaigns. He fell at Badajoz, and at the conclusion of the war an ample pension was awarded to his widow, which, with her husband's previous possessions, rendered her quite wealthy.

"Her family consisted of but two persons, in addition to herself—Pedro Estoval, her son, and Carlos Estoval, an orphaned nephew of her husband. The contrast between these two was marked and striking. Both were young and handsome, possessing the rich olive complexion of the sons of Spain, and between them there was a certain degree of resemblance. This, however, was slight, and only existed so far as outward form and features were concerned. Pedro was frank, honest and brave, and a general favorite as well with the men as with the maids of the village; Carlos, on the contrary, was dark, moody and revengeful, and was hated and shunned by the whole village, with the exception of a few chosen spirits of his own ilk, and as evil in heart as himself.

"Maria Estoval had adopted Carlos, fully resolved to consider and treat him as a son, and this benevolent intention she would no doubt have fulfilled, but for the malignant disposition and bad qualities of her nephew, which seemed daily to increase. It mattered little to him what manner of treatment he received; kind words and harsh ones were alike answered morosely, and those who would have been his friends, were repelled by his ferocity and thanklessness.

"But although his treatment of all his acquaintances seemed to be marked by distrust and aversion, there was one in particular towards whom he cherished a bitter antipathy, or hatred, as it might better be called. This one, strange as it may seem, was his cousin Pedro. Even in the petty strifes and rivalries of boyhood, this sentiment was evident in Carlos Estoval, and manhood increased and confirmed it.

"This was the state of affairs at the time of the death of Maria Estoval, which event happened when the young men had respectively attained to the age of twenty-two. After the last offices had been performed to the dead, the notary, with whom the will had been deposited, summoned the cousins before him to hear it read. It was brief and conclusive; without mentioning the name of Carlos, the deceased bequeathed all her possessions to her son Pedro.

"The face of Carlos turned alternately red and white with anger, and he gazed furiously upon his cousin, whom the reading of the will had affected with painful surprise. As he became conscious of the emotions of Carlos, he approached him with a conciliating air; but his cousin motioned him away with a stern gesture.

"Do not approach me," Carlos Estoval said, in a tone of bitterness. "Think not to insult one you have so deeply injured; smooth words and hypocritical looks cannot serve you now."

"You are rash and unjust," Pedro replied. "It is you who are striving to injure me, and that, too, without the slightest cause. But listen to me: I will divide equally with you this property which is now legally mine. Does this content you?"

"No," cried the other, passionately. "I will not take a gift from your hands—and one which should be mine rightfully, and not yours."

"Then go your ways," Pedro Estoval rejoined, suppressing with difficulty the resentment which the last words of his cousin aroused. "Go your ways; let us separate, for I see you will not be conciliated."

"I will go; but do not flatter yourself that you are now rid of me. I tell thee, Pedro Estoval, I have a feud of blood with you, and our differences can be settled by nothing short of my death or yours. I give you fair warning, then; remember that wherever and whenever you find me, I am still your bitter enemy."

"With these words, Carlos Estoval rushed from the house, and shortly after, disappeared from the village, leaving no clue by which he might be traced. His parting threats caused his cousin a momentary uneasiness—not that he feared Carlos as an open enemy, but because he knew that his bitter enmity might lead him to any act of treachery. But time passed on, and still there came no tidings of Carlos Estoval.

"There was one other who had moved the hatred of Carlos, and whom he had threatened in much the same manner as he did his cousin, before his departure. This was Nina Corbon, who, although the daughter of one of the poorest vine dressers, was the acknowledged beauty of the village. Both the cousins had devotedly loved the fair girl, and each ardently pressed his suit. But Nina was too well acquainted with the character of her two suitors to hesitate long in her decision, and it was speedily known that Pedro Estoval was the favored lover. This fact in a measure accounts for the rancorous enmity exhibited towards the two by Carlos.

"Very soon after the departure of the latter from the village, strange reports began to be bruited about. A traveller had been robbed on the mountains, and his description of one of the brigands coincided almost exactly with Carlos Estoval. But all doubts were put to flight by an occurrence which happened the following week.

"Some distance outside the village, and nearly at the foot of the nearest mountain slopes, there is still a spring of pure, clear water, where from time immemorial it has been the custom for the maidens of the village to resort, with large goat-skin sacks, to obtain a supply of water for the following day. Upon the day in question, as usual, about the hour of sunset, the young women repaired to the spring. One, Nina Corbon, remained a few moments after her companions had departed homeward. The sound of their laughter had almost died upon her ear, and she was about to hasten after them, when she was detained by a man who suddenly rose before her from his concealment in the grass. A cry of alarm came to her lips, as she recognized Carlos Estoval! It was certainly he, although his usual dress had been replaced by a wild costume, which strangely resembled that of the mountain brigands.

"Stay, pretty Nina," he said, placing himself directly before her. "I must talk with you. How fares your lover, Pedro?"

"If he were here, he would soon teach you," the young girl replied, recovering her usual courage and firmness, although the manner of Carlos filled her with dread. "Come, senor, stand aside at once, and let me pass; I have nothing to say to you."

"By no means, Nina; you cannot escape so easily. Do you remember my words when I last left you?"

"Nina Corbon turned slightly pale, but returned no answer.

"Well, let me repeat them," Carlos continued. "I said then that when I next came to you, you must be prepared to follow me. Are you ready?"

"To go with you? Never! Carlos Estoval, my sentiments towards you cannot change—and more than this, if your dress does not belie you, you have lately increased in villany. Go: I wish to hold no parley with brigands."

"Brigands!" replied Carlos, with a sinister smile. "You are harsh, Nina. But no matter; what if I confess that I am one of Tomaso Gas-pachi's trusty followers? The knowledge will not give you greater strength to resist me, for go with me you must, and immediately. It is a part of my revenge upon Pedro Estoval; the remainder will follow quickly.'

"As he spoke, he raised her suddenly in his arms. A succession of frightened shrieks broke from her lips, which Carlos adroitly muffled with his scarf, and then hastened to ascend the rocky side of the mountain. But his way was barred by the unexpected appearance of his cousin Pedro, who had been descending the mountain when the well-known voice of Nina Corbon called him from the path to her rescue.

"Carlos dropped his burden and started back with an oath. At first, he seemed inclined to use violence to prevent the interference of his cousin, but the stern, determined mien of the latter, as he placed the rescued maiden behind him and turned to confront him, with a carbine in his hand, intimidated him.

"'Come on, villain!' he said. 'Give me the chance to rid the neighborhood of you—for I would not murder you. Stand where you are, and we will fire together. Dare you encounter me, Carlos—brigand?'"

"But the latter was evidently not prepared for this reception. Surveying his cousin with a countenance inflamed with rage and hatred, he replied:

"'Not now, Pedro Estoval. You have won again; but mark me—this is your last victory over me. Nina Corbon shall yet be mine, and you will not long stand in my way. You have conquered at this meeting—beware the next!'

"Shaking his clenched hands at his cousin, before the latter had time to reply, Carlos Estoval sprang up the rocks and hastily disappeared.

"Nina had by this time revived, and Pedro accompanied her back to the village, recounting on the way the circumstances of her rescue and the threats of his cousin.

"'He is a fearful man,' she said, with a shudder. 'I hate him more than ever now, and of course my fear increases with my hate. The Holy Mother protect me!' she added, devoutly. 'I cannot help thinking he will bring some terrible misfortune upon us yet.'

"'Nay,' replied Pedro, 'do not fear him. There is certainly one way by which your safety can be secured.'

"Nina looked at her lover inquiringly.

"'It is this,' he continued. 'Give me the highest right—a husband's right—to protect you, and we can laugh at this braggart and his threats. Will you do this, dear Nina?'

"The maiden blushed and hesitated, but very little persuasion was necessary to make her aware of the pressing necessity of an immediate union.

"In Spain, even when no such necessity exists, affairs like these, when once agreed upon, are speedily consummated. Simon Corbon, the father of Nina, was made acquainted with the true state of the case; and upon hearing of the daring attempt of Carlos Estoval to abduct his daughter, made no objections to an immediate marriage. So for once, at least, the proverb that 'the course of true love never does run smooth,' seemed about to be falsified. But it was not; no, not even in this instance, when everything seemed auspicious. At the last moment, upon the very morning appointed for the marriage, it was discovered that Father Antonio, the good curate of the village, was gone upon an absence of several days.

"This discovery filled the trio with dismay. What was to be done? Simon Corbon proposed to delay the matter until the curate's return. Impossible; the united voices of the lovers overruled this proposition—for what, they argued, might not happen in an interval of three days? Besides this course, there was but one other, and this was strenuously urged by Pedro. It was to repair to the neighboring village, a distance of two leagues over the mountains, and there have the ceremony performed.

"Nina timidly held back from this plan, while her father obstinately opposed it. He insisted that they could hardly escape the brigands on the way, and might possibly fall into the hands of Carlos Estoval. Pedro, however, insisted; and having won Nina over to his views, the matter ended, as might be expected, by Simon's yielding his consent.

"Upon the following morning, therefore, the three set out upon their mission. Simon Corbon was mounted upon a mule, as was also Nina; but Pedro walked by the side of the latter, and guided her beast. The lover could not entirely repress his uneasiness, as they passed several localities rendered notorious by late attacks of the brigands; but as they continued on their way without accident or adventure, his spirits rose, and he laughed and sang with unusual gayety.

"At noon, the party entered the Pass of Terror. As they proceeded carelessly on, unsuspecting of danger, a sharp whistle echoed among the rocks, and instantly the way was barred by half-a-dozen brigands, headed by Carlos Estoval. Pedro quickly turned Nina's mule in the opposite direction; but to his dismay, he found the path blocked by as many more brigands, led by a small, thick-set man, with swarthy complexion and a piercing black eye, whom he at once recognized, from the descriptions he had heard, as Tomaso Gaspachi. Before the lover had time to think of resistance, his arms were seized from behind, and, securely pinioned; Simon Corbon was in the same instant knocked from his saddle and grasped by a huge fellow, beside whom the terrified vine-dresser appeared like a pigmy, while the reins of Nina's mule were grasped by Carlos Estoval, who regarded the terrified girl with an expression of triumph.

"All this happened in far less time than I have occupied in recounting it, so that when the travellers had collected their bewildered senses, they found themselves securely in the hands of the bandits, and, worse than all, at the mercy of Carlos Estoval. The first thought of Pedro was to appeal to the captain of the brigands; but as the latter commenced to speak, he waited.

"Now," said Tomaso, advancing towards Carlos, who still retained his place beside Nina, 'you shall receive justice. Is this your wife?'

"Carlos replied in the affirmative.

"'Liar!' burst indignantly from Pedro's lips.

"Do you deny it, then?' Tomaso demanded.

"That Nina Carbon is yonder villain's wife. I do deny it; he has not the slightest claim upon her," Pedro boldly replied. 'Here is her father—ask him.'

"Tomaso turned quickly to Simon and commanded him to speak the truth. The latter tremblingly asserted that his daughter was not the wife of Carlos Estoval.

"An ominous frown appeared upon the brow of the brigand, as he heard his words.

"So, villain," he uttered, menacingly, addressing Carlos, 'you have deceived me. Malediction! Did you not tell me that Pedro Estoval had robbed you of your wife? Speak!'

"The face of Carlos turned deadly pale, as he observed the anger of his captain. He attempted an answer, but in his agitation he was only able to stammer an inaudible reply.

"It is enough!" Tomaso sternly interrupted. 'No more, lest you utter another falsehood to me.'

"With a gesture, the captain commanded the release of Pedro, and then signed to the latter to lead the mule which bore Nina Corbon further away. This being done, Carlos Estoval was left standing near the brink of the frightful precipice. Without another word, Tomaso unslung the carbine at his back, and placing the muzzle almost against the forehead of Carlos, discharged it. The victim tossed his arms wildly, uttered one piercing cry, and toppled over the precipice!

"Replacing his carbine, Tomaso turned to the horror-struck spectators of this summary punishment. His stern look softened, as he gazed upon the face of Nina, and taking her hand, he said, respectfully:

"Henceforth, lady, let there be at least one witness to testify to the justice of Tomaso Gaspachi. You can best tell whether Carlos Estoval merited his fate.'

"With these words, he drew off his followers and disappeared, having first detailed two of them to accompany the travellers as a guard. Pedro and Nina proceeded on their way, and it was long before they could dismiss the influence of the singular and terrible occurrence from their minds. In due time, they arrived safely at their destination, and were speedily united. Upon their return, a vague curiosity induced Pedro to gaze over the edge of the precipice. He shuddered as he saw the body of Carlos, hundreds of feet below, impaled, by some strange chance, upon a projecting splinter of rock.

"He will become food for the vultures—God rest his soul!" Pedro fervently ejaculated.

"By his direction, a cross was subsequently erected upon the spot where this tragic scene occurred. There it remains, to this day, and the tale which I have narrated will perhaps be recognized by more than one traveller as the same he heard from the lips of his guide in the Pyrenees."

The ultimate fate of Tomaso Gaspachi and his band I have previously detailed in the words of Matteo. His death, like his life, was violent and sanguinary; yet the respect with which his memory was long cherished by the simple peasants of the mountains, amply attests that his nature was not wholly perverted by evil.

TEA.

Tea, with the flowers and scents of the warm East in it, with something hearty, and of a downright domestic quality in its vivifying effect! Of the social influence of tea, in truth, upon the masses of the people in this country, it is not very easy to say too much. It has civilized brutish and turbulent homes, saved the drunkard from his doom, and to many a mother, who would else indeed have been most wretched and most forlorn, it has given peaceful, cheerful thoughts that have sustained her. Its work among us, in England and elsewhere—ay, throughout the civilized world—has been humanizing—good. Its effect has been upon us all, something socially healthful; something that is peaceful, gentle and hearty. The passionate drinker may sit by his fire, watch his kettle, and in the stream of steam rolling away from it, see all the fallen idols of the East tumbling about; the long-eared, long-nailed goddesses unceremoniously bandied hither and thither; the gaudy temples broken up; the priests disbanded.—Douglas Jerrold.

THE RESTLESS MIND.

The sunken cheek and lantern jaw,
Betray the venomous restless mind:
Whose only solace is to prey
Upon the sorrows of mankind.

MY MOTHER.

BY OSCAR PERCIVAL.

Sleep on, dearest mother, sleep,
Thy children mourn their loss;
Around thy silent grave we weep,
That's covered o'er with moss.

Thy voice, that once was soft and sweet
As the summer's gentle breeze;
That taught us Jesus' will to keep,
To him to give our praise.

Yet why should we so mourn and weep,
When God hath called thee home?
Yet it causes us to mourn with grief,
As o'er the earth we roam.

We cherish all thy tender love,
That once thy lips did speak;
As thou art sleeping in the grove,
Thy spirit with the meek.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND:

—OR,—

A Smuggling Adventure in Monte-Video.

BY GEORGE H. BURMAN.

I'll tell you a story about that same, youngster, which may learn you not to jabber too freely in a strange port. And, for the matter of that, not quite so freely in any port, as you green ones are apt to do.

Did you ever hear of old Stinson, who used to sail out of Boston, years ago? He went by the name of Captain Bully Black. He was short, thick set, and about as near a nigger in complexion as a full-blooded white man ever ought to be. He had the name of being a hard customer. In short, he was a good master to a man who did his duty; but to one who didn't, I won't just say what he was—I'd rather leave you to guess. Ordinarily, he was a person of few words. But when his dander was up, I shouldn't like to be the one to bear its brunt, unless the thing were absolutely necessary. He had, like many others of his profession, pretty strong prejudices; one of which was that a Yankee was by nature a little smarter than anybody else on the face of the globe. And another (in which also he was not so very peculiar), that it was perfectly proper, indeed rather obligatory, to smuggle when and where he could, out of the dominions of Uncle Sam, whose revenue laws he acknowledged with as much exactness as could be expected from frail human nature.

In the year eighteen hundred thirty odd, I was in the old Sappho as first officer, Captain Stinson, commander. At the time of which I speak, we lay at Monte-Video, discharging a cargo which we had taken in at Liverpool. The Sappho was an old fashioned ship, built for carrying, and quite full in the counter. In addition to our regular manifest, the captain and myself had a little venture in the shape of some thirty or more kegs of old Madeira wine, which we intended to run ashore free of the heavy duties which a legal entry would have imposed. Ah, I understand what you would say. But, as we sailors used to say, "No sin in smuggling, if you are not caught." That was our doctrine.

At Monte Video, on account of the shoal water close in, ships were (and I suppose still are) obliged to discharge their cargoes into large boats or lighters, which conveyed the goods on shore. We lay off in the stream, in full view from the custom house. As soon as we reported ourselves ready to discharge, an officer was put on board ship, who checked every package as it was unloaded, comparing marks with the ship's list of cargo. The same was done on shore, where the lighters came to the landing place. The regulations were very strict, and deviations therefrom, if known at head-quarters, were severely punished. Rosas was the dictator of the city and province, and he was not a ruler to be trifled with. With him it was a word and a blow; or more frequently, the blow without the word, when his own people were found wanting. If one of his understrappers broke any regulation of his, the man would be called on by a sergeant and file of twelve, who would ask him, very politely, to step down the street a little way. In about five minutes after, one might hear some old muskets go off, and that would be the end of the poor fellow.

To come again to my story. We reported ourselves ready to discharge, and off came the visite boat, as it was called, and put on board the custom-house officer who was to keep ship. He was a tall, straight, keen-eyed fellow, with a nose like a hawk, and a shining black moustache, which curled like a pig's tail. The captain and myself took a survey of him; and we came to the conclusion that he might be an ugly customer to deal with, though there was no doubt that he would pocket a bribe fast enough, if we could contrive the thing aright.

"Like enough he knows a little English," said Captain Stinson; "most of these fellows do. You must parleyvoo round him, and come the polite till we can get his bearings, and then we can tell better how to manage. They tell me these things are a little ticklish here. At any rate, we can't do anything with the kegs just yet. So I'll leave the man under your care for the present, for I am going ashore to look round."

"Thank you, sir," I replied. "I will use my best endeavors with the chap; and as for the polite, I can beat a Frenchman at that, when I really try."

"I never saw you try, then," growled the old man, as he turned to go over the side.

The coast being clear, I began to make my approaches to the Spaniard. Of course I didn't come straight out; but I edged up to him cunningly, as a cat does to, a yellow bird. I pitied him dreadfully, you know, because he was so lonesome. Says I, "Parley voo English?"

He shook his head, as much as to say he didn't understand, or didn't care about talking, or something of the kind. So I just walked round a while, and thought the thing over. Then I concluded to take him on another tack, for, thinks I, if he will jabber a little Spanish perhaps we can get along together, somehow. So says I, again, "Monsieur cavaliero parley voo Spanish, then?"

He shook his head again, and mumbled over something about nontoudy; I can't spell the word, but it's Spanish for not understanding. So I got pretty well convinced that we couldn't sail together in the way of talk, and contented myself with giving the wink to the steward to make everything right and comfortable for the chap, and to hand him out everything he wanted, without so much as the fiftieth part of a sour look by any chance whatever.

"Yes, sir," said the steward; "but the way he does put into that butter is awful."

"Never mind," said I, "the ship can pay for it." In the course of a few hours off came the captain.

"How do you and that custom-house chap get along?" said he.

"Can't get anything out of him," I answered. "He doesn't know a word of English, and it seemed to me as though he hardly knew Spanish either, for I tried to talk some with him. But I dare say my Spanish has got a little rusty and mixed up, seeing as how I have not been on these coasts for many years."

"No English, eh?" said Captain Stinson. "However, it doesn't make much difference. We can feel a little more at our ease, and perhaps save the hush money that we had intended to pay him. I met the captain of the French bark Louise, which lays off yonder, when I was ashore just now. We had a talk together about this wine of ours, and have arranged that on a favorable night, when we hoist a signal lantern in the foreshrouds, his boats shall come alongside, take the kegs, and work them ashore for us. We shall have to wait, probably two or three nights, till our man begins to get a little off his guard."

We had it all contrived first rate, and felt tolerably easy about getting the stuff clear. It was grand weather—we had plenty of good cigars—and those confounded lighters worked so slow that there was lounging time enough for all the cabin people. In the afternoon, I would have a good long spell on the quarter; and Captain Stinson would come along and get into a talk about the Spaniards, berate their religion, growl about their cookery, and wish the whole country was in the hands of the Yankees, who would be able to make something of it. All this time the Spaniard, perhaps, would be leaning back against the rail, smoking his cigar, and looking as comfortable as possible, never seeming to know that the skipper was abusing him and his nation up hill and down, right within his own hearing. The fact is, as for talking, we got so that we didn't mind him any more than we would a dog about deck.

The captain had always dined on shore; but as luck would have it, he came off in his boat one afternoon just as we were sitting down to dinner. The Spaniard sat with his back to the companion-way, and as Stinson entered he could not help looking straight into his plate. The captain stopped, and his face grew as dark as a thunder cloud. I cast my eye toward Mr. Cavaliero, as I used to call him, and I saw directly what was the matter. He had just taken a warm biscuit in hand, and scooping out the inside, was proceeding according to his usual custom to fill up the shell with the larger part of the contents of the butter plate. This was a very favorite dish with our friend, though his unchecked indulgence in it bid fair to deprive us very quickly of a luxury which we could not easily replace in Monte-Video, where oil is the universal substitute. The old captain could hardly stand it to see the Spaniard fairly lading out his prime butter in that sort of way.

"Steward! steward!" he shouted, in a voice of thunder, "come this way directly. How much butter have we left?" he continued, as that functionary made his appearance in hot haste, and with rather an alarmed countenance.

"Fifty pounds, sir," exclaimed the steward, rubbing his hands in subdued glee as he saw where the storm threatened to fall.

"And two or three days ago we had at least a hundred pounds. Now I want to know if this here blasted monsieur keeps eating it at this rate all the time?"

"O, yes, sir, yes, sir," replied the steward, with the utmost cheerfulness. "He keeps doing so all the time, sir. He's only just begun, now, sir."

Old Stinson seemed ready to choke. He could only sputter it out in pieces.

"Scoundrel, hog, I'll kick him out, bundle him ashore in the boat; never saw such goings on in all my going to sea." Adding somewhat more of a little stronger nature.

Just at this instant I was taken with the most violent fit of coughing that ever I had in my life—purely accidental of course—but it stopped the captain a little; and after an instant's pause, he turned about and tumbled up on deck. His last words were, as he disappeared:

"Steward, mind you don't cook any more warm biscuit, while that fellow is on board."

All this time our foreign friend sat enjoying his melted butter as comfortably as possible, without the slightest change of countenance, though I did imagine that I saw his moustache twitch a very little once. It was plain enough that the man hadn't the slightest idea of what was going on, though he might have been bright enough to have guessed a little by the manner of the thing, if in no other way. We finished dinner, and got on deck; Mr. Cavaliero took his cigar as usual, and the captain disposed himself for a talk.

"I suppose, Mr. Wallace," he said, "that we shall pretty near finish discharging to-night, by what you have told me. It is high time we got that wine started. And, by the way, isn't it rather odd that this rascally officer should have kept up so much later than usual these two or three nights past? Here have the Frenchman's boats been laying off and on, and we can't get any chance to do a thing. You don't think that fellow there has any idea that we have got wine stowed away in our cabin, hey? 'Tisn't possible he can understand a little English once in a while?"

"Not a bit of it. He knows nothing about the wine, nor the English either, for if he did, he must be more than mortal man to stand that broadside that you let off against him at dinner time. Fact is, captain, I think you are rather hard down on these Spaniards and foreigners here. I don't see why one of them isn't just as good as a Yankee, as long as he behaves himself."

"There now, shut up. I won't hear any such nonsense as that," growled old Stinson. "But as for that wine, we must have it out to-night, if possible. I hope to mercy that chap will take a notion to go to bed to-night."

"I think he will," I said. "It is cloudy and rather unpleasant this afternoon, and these last few nights have been pleasant enough to tempt any one to stay up a few hours."

By-and-by the lighters got alongside again, and at it we went with a will, to finish off the cargo, if possible. Just at nightfall, the captain, myself and the custom-house officer were standing about the gangway, when the last package was hoisted to go over the side. In an instant, the Spaniard sprang forward, and caught hold of it.

"I'll stop this, if you please," he said.

Old Stinson started as if he had been shot; and, as for myself, I never recollect feeling just so streaked in my life.

"Hello, Mister Mounseer, let go of that, I say!" roared the old man, as soon as he found breath. "I thought you couldn't speak English, you old snake in the grass!"

"Look here, Captain Stinson," exclaimed our foreign friend, drawing himself up to his whole height, while his eyes glittered like fire-flies in the dark, "I want you to understand that I can talk English as well as you can. I was educated in New York, and spent three years there as clerk in one of the mercantile houses. And now you have had your fill in blackguarding me and my country, and I'll make that wine of yours pay for it roundly, mark my words."

It was in vain for the captain to endeavor to express his inward rage and astonishment by mere words. The occasion was too much for him. He took vent in a long, low whistle, and walked away.

"What shall I do with this fellow?" he said to me. "He'll sell the ship over our heads." Here he stopped short, as if struck with a sudden thought. "Suppose we pitch him overboard?" he added.

"'Twont pay," I replied, choking down a laugh at the half insane coolness of the proposition.

"Don't know as it will," continued Stinson, despondingly. "But that wine shall come out this night." Here he brought down his foot with an emphasis on the deck. "It shall come out this night, spite of custom-house officers, Rosas and the devil."

All this passed in a moment. He wheeled around with a rough sailor-like laugh, and seeing the steward poke his head out of the cabin, asked him if supper were not ready.

"Come," said he to the Spaniard, "let us go down and take a glass of wine over this. If I have been letting my tongue run a little loose, it is no more than fair that I should pay for it, as you say. May as well take it coolly as any other way. However, as for that package you've just stopped, I don't think you'll find any harm in it. You can look at it at your leisure, if you wish."

The old man ordered two or three bottles of wine on the table. Prime old Madeira it was, and came from the self-same lot that we had tucked away so nicely under our berths. Our friend the Spaniard cottoned to it directly; but, bless you, it had no sort of effect on him that I could see. Old Stinson pressed him to help himself, and passed the bottle. Then the old man began to warm up, and got a-going on some of his best stories (for he could set them off when he chose), and our officer too began to thaw a little, and it was full two hours, I think, before we got up from the supper table. Then a proposition was made regarding cigars; and our choicest brands were overhauled. We smoked, chatted a little—smoked, smoked—went on deck, walked about, and smoked; went below and smoked; till finally, when we had made a pretty large hole in the night, we got so sleepy that we were forced to go to bed. As you may naturally suppose, we soon began to snore. Did you ever know a thorough-bred seaman who couldn't snore? O, it's a beautiful art; and I think we gave that rascally don some specimens, that night, which would have deceived the very old gentleman in black himself. First I whistled a tiny note, faint as the music of a far-off bird. Presently commenced a low and solemn base, by my superior's nose. Then "crescendo," I believe they call it, I rose to a clear and silvery larum, like Miss Brown when she gets clear up on the main truck of her voice, and don't hardly know how to come down again. Then I slid away down so softly, and I and old Stinson came in with a full chorus like one of your big organs with all stops off and the pipes in full blast. Ah, it was a glorious performance, and so overcame Mr. Don, that in less than half an hour he also was under the sheets, and carrying on a little song of his own, pitched in the natural key. Politely disposed as we were, we didn't like to interfere with his music. So we gradually wound up our instruments, and turned out of bed very noiselessly, being quite indisposed to interrupt our friend's healthy slumber. As an additional precaution, I slid back my stateroom door, and passed a bit of rope round its handle and that of the adjoining door where the Spaniard slept. The lantern had already been set in the rigging; the Frenchman's boat came alongside, and out came those kegs of wine from under our berths in less than no time. It is true we made as little noise about it as possible, but it wasn't long before our gentleman in the wood got started. Out of his berth he came with a puff, and then such a swearing, rattling, stamping and swearing you never heard in your life. But the door was good mahogany, put together by old Buggins, of New York, and it held him. We worked right on, and paid no attention to him, and in less than fifteen minutes we had all still on our part, and turned in again. Our cavaliero soon gave it up for a bad job; and when he was entirely quiet, I softly slipped off the rope-fastening, and went to sleep like a lamb.

At very early daylight our chap tumbled out, and commenced such a bluster that I felt myself obliged in civility to take some notice of him. I heard his complaints with the utmost surprise. Had heard nothing at all; knew of nothing of the kind. Was he subject to nightmare? Thought it very queer about his not being able to open the door, unless it was merely a dream. Such a thing might be, however, for the varnish in very hot weather would sometimes undergo a partial melting, and cause the slides to adhere. Didn't he eat too much of that chicken pie last night? Indigestion oftentimes caused most horrid dreams. I had an' aunt who was always troubled so after eating hearty suppers. In short, I did my best to soothe him, after my fashion; but his temper was so unchristian that I couldn't mollify him a bit; and the visite boat from the custom house coming alongside, he ordered its crew right into the cabin and had out the bottoms of the berths in a twinkling. Asked what they were making such a stir for; what was it they wanted?

"Vine! vine!" cried a little withered up old fellow.

Told him we didn't keep it there, and brought him some of the article in a tumbler. The Spaniard shook his fist at me, and, finding that the game was up, for the present at any rate, he tumbled himself and a pair of French boots into the boat, and started with his men for shore.

Old Stinson rubbed his hands cheerily as they made off, then looked blank, then took out a prime Havana, and puffed at it unlighted with the big end in his mouth; threw it away for a failure, took out another, went down into the cabin, cocked his legs on the table and his body in a chair, and began studying Coggeshall's Law of Nations with the book upside down. In two minutes, up again on deck, and ordered the boat ready to go to his consignees. He was gone till afternoon, when he showed himself aboard ship with his face as hot as the cook's coppers.

"Do you believe," he exclaimed, as soon as he had got me by the button, "that I hadn't been at the consignees more than twenty minutes, before in came a billet from that infuriated Spaniard, politely asking me to send him two hundred dollars, saying he wanted it right away. Old Mirick advised me to pay it, and I vowed right up and down that I wouldn't."

"Why, you are crazy, Captain Stinson," I replied. "He'll have us in the bilboes before night, besides coming on the ship for at least half she's worth."

The old man growled like an old bear, and I went almost sick at our luck. Couldn't sleep any that night expecting the guard boat alongside every minute. Early next forenoon the captain ordered round the boat again, and told me I might go with him if I chose. I got in, and on arriving at the beach, marched up to the store of our consignees, Mirick & Sangrado. The former was a fine looking old gent, about sixty; his hair was as white as snow, and covered a knowing head too. The old gentleman came forward to us, and, shaking hands with the captain, said:

"Stinson, I am sorry for you. Yours is a bad case. Here is another note come down this morning for a hundred dollars more."

"I told you so," burst out the skipper, "I told you so yesterday; but you would pay the two hundred, and I shall have to father the bill. And now here's some more to come, and so it will be till the whole goes for it, ship and all. Dang it, I say, let her go at once, and make a whole job of it; I won't pay another cent."

"O, yes, you will," said Mr. Mirick, smiling and clapping him on the shoulder. "Yes, you will. Come, Stinson, take a glass of good wine with me, and you'll feel more reconciled."

"Not a cent, the rascally villain! I was a fool that I didn't pitch him overboard in the place. I would have done so, if it had not been for that pretty wife of his that he has just got married to. Was afraid it might make some trouble to her. Might have got somebody to pitch him under when he sneaked ashore to see her—Hello! Good Lud! why haven't I thought of that before?"

Knocking his hat jam down on his head, the old man made a single spring through the door, and rushed in the direction of the plaza, and I after him, for I had no idea what was going to happen. I overheard Mirick, in a surprised way, saying something about broken regulations; but what that meant, I knew not. Just about the moment that I caught up with the skipper, we came chock up face to face with our friend, Don Filipe, the customs officer. The Spaniard looked as pleased as a cat with a pitcher of cream

"Have you brought the money?" said he.

"No, you rapsallion," roared old Stinson.

The Spaniard wheeled right about on his heel, his face as black as thunder.

"Any commands for President Rosas?" he hissed out between his teeth.

"No, sir-ree, I'm bound straight there myself."

The Spaniard cocked his eye round with a stare, as if he thought the captain out of his senses. To tell the truth I had a slight thought of that kind myself.

"What expect you to do there, senor?"

"Expect? I expect to have you shot, you old heathen scoundrel! Don't I know that you left the ship twice without permit, three quarters of an hour each time, contrary to the express regulations of President Rosas? Thought we weren't posted up, eh?"

The Spaniard turned deadly pale, his legs shook under him, and he almost went down on his knees in the dirt. He well knew that he was in our power.

"Spare me, Senor Captain," he cried, with an abject look.

"Hand the two hundred," cried the skipper.

Senor Filipe, with a trembling hand, counted out the gold.

"Hand out another hundred for our trouble," added Stinson, with a stern and piercing look.

Our friend essayed to murmur, but his countenance quickly sank, and out came the money. Stinson carefully examined the reckoning as before. Then, turning with a low bow to the Spaniard, he addressed him as follows:

"My dear friend, I find that I have been a little prejudiced against your countrymen, and, as I wouldn't like to injure your feelings, I would explain that I had erroneously judged their character by the example of two or three such precious scamps as yourself. I am happy to find your countrymen, on the whole, a very honorable people; and hope for your sake that they will soon be induced to offer you a passage to Guinea, or somewhere else, where you can be more at home than it is possible for you to be, here among decent people. And, before I part with you, please accept a bit of advice. Never again attempt to take the advantage of a Yankee, unless you wish to fare worse than you have done to-day. Good-day, sir, and wish you well. And now, Mr. Wallace," he continued, turning to me, "there's 'diamond cut diamond' for you; and as we've made a pretty fair speculation to day, I think we can afford a ride up town. What say you?"

THE FLOWERS OF THE FIELD.

BY ROSWELL RICE.

The verdant flowers are blooming,
In ample troops appear,
Their golden buds are breaking
On landscapes far and near;
The meads and gardens waving
With these rich gems of God,
Cheer up the soul that's mourning
Under affliction's rod.

These starlit flowers are bending
By every gentle breeze,
O'er earth's broad circle smiling—
The feast of toiling bees;
From sunlit waving oceans,
Lake, vale and mountain sod,
These gems in all their beauty
Display the works of God.

They come with full-orbed glory
In summer's genial rays,
And on earth's dreary surface
Console man's eager gaze;
They fill each heart with wonder,
King Solomon outshine,
From all the sweets of nature
Rich odors they combine.

If God on flowers is shining,
And gives them every hue;
How much more bless the faithful,
That in his truth pursue!
Sweet gems immortal waving,
Shall grace the ransomed soul
Of every saint in heaven,
While streams of mercy roll.

Thou Son of God! Redeemer!
Who did the lily grace,
Thy word of power has quickened
Queen Flora's blooming race;
Yet they are frail and fleeting,
Each year they pass away,
But thy unfading glory
Shall live when flowers decay.

THE ROCK OF CASHEL.

BY WILLIAM D. OLIVER.

FOURTEEN miles from Clonmel, in the county of Tipperary, Ireland, is the town of Cashel. It is built round the southern and eastern sides of the celebrated Rock of Cashel. There is a prophecy extant, of St. Columkill, that when there was a fall of this rock, there would be a revolution in England. Not long since, a considerable portion of this rock slipped down, recalling the prophecy to many minds.

The rock of Cashel rises in a rich plain, in the very heart of the finest soil in Ireland. The summit of the rock is crowned with picturesque buildings. Here is an ecclesiastical Round Tower; Cormac's Chapel, built by Cormac M'Carthy, king of Munster, in the twelfth century; a grand cathedral, built by Donal O'Brien, king of Limerick; two towers in the Norman style, executed in the eleventh and twelfth centuries; and a strong castle built for the archbishop's palace. The summit of the rock of Cashel commands the most extensive and picturesque view in all Ireland. The Bay of Dublin can be discerned, and the rich beauty of the county of Wicklow lies beneath it like a soft picture. On the west, the Shannon winds its lazy course like a huge serpent, until it loses itself in the Atlantic; and on the east, the Nore mingles with the Barrow, watering the rich plains below. On this rock, too, dwelt the kings of Munster, each of whose lives was in itself a brilliant poem, but whose fame is passing away from the nation, as the ancient Milesian blood grows thin and weak.

Years ago, a young girl, in whose veins a portion of this very blood was said to flow, and who resided with her widowed father on the eastern declivity of Cashel, was beloved by the son of Maurice Heath, a man of a respectable but decayed family, and now living in a miserable, tumble-down sort of place, at Clonmel. The house itself had been one of the better sort, and the land showed here and there evidences of having been laid out with taste, as a gentleman's pleasure grounds. But these traces were mostly effaced, and the soil was used now only for planting potatoes, except the small portion devoted to the pasturage of a single cow. Here had lived Maurice Heath's ancestors, however, for all remembered time; and here, although he had not a penny to keep it in repair, and it was falling to pieces about his ears, he continued to live, too proud to exchange it for a decent cabin, or to pull down any part of it to mend the leaky roof and gaping stones of the rest.

Early in life, he had married Ilda Heath, his third cousin; for which offence against the established rules of the country and religion, he was banned and excommunicated. They had but one child, Donald, on whose young life this separation from all society pressed very heavily. Fortunately, the child had engaged the attention of the priest of Clonmel, who, taking a fancy to the boy, and urging that his parent's faults should not peril his immortal soul, nor even his earthly interests, had invited him to come to his house for instruction. He found Donald an apt and willing pupil, and, proud of his progress, Father O'Brien initiated him into the elements of other studies besides that of the catechism; so that the boy at fifteen was advanced far beyond those who had attended regular schools, and could even compete with the youths who had left Clonmel to reap the advantages of the university at Dublin.

But Maurice Heath, whose spirit was broken down by poverty and the desertion of friends, hardly appreciated this act on the part of Father O'Brien, and often reproached his son for spending so much time over his books, when it was needed for work. After these expostulations, poor Donald would sit moping about the house for days, apparently without any object in life, when his mother would urge him back to his beloved books once more, and promise intercession with his father in his behalf. But Ilda Heath's life was now in a doubtful state. The desertion of friends, while it made her husband moody and irritable, had preyed upon her inwardly until her health declined, and when Donald was in his seventeenth year, she sunk gently into the grave. From this time Maurice Heath was insensible alike to pleasure or pain, life or death, solitude or society. The being for whom he had perilled loss of caste, perhaps loss of his soul—for so did the Clonmel bigots construe it—was taken away from his eyes, and thenceforth life was a burden. No solicitations of his son could rouse him to any exertion, and the land would have been wholly untended, and the means of subsistence would have utterly failed, had not the boy seemed suddenly endowed with a new spirit. He laid aside the books he loved so well, and devoted himself to draining bogs, building stone walls around the land, and brightening up the aspect of their possessions. Only the house itself was let alone. On that, his father, though deep in his utter abstraction to all other things, resisted all innovations. Where Ilda lived and died, not a single thing must be touched; and so they lived on in its decay. Still, they were more comfortable than formerly, Donald imperatively requiring old Aileen, a woman who had taken care of his mother, and had remained at the house ever since she died, to prepare his meals regularly, and to see that his father's clothes were clean and well mended, on pain of being dismissed. Having no settled home, she was desirous of staying, and her efforts to get Maurice to dress himself decently were sometimes ludicrous enough. Her only way of success was to steal his clothes from his room after he was asleep, and substitute others for them, so that her anxiety to please Donald was generally rewarded.

After the latter had made all the improvements which he was able, he returned to his books with fresh relish, and the priest of Clonmel received him joyfully. Still, he could only recite to his teacher on account of his anxiety to be with his father, in his present low state of health and spirits. Maurice Heath came in a very few years to the verge of insanity. He was very gentle, except at times, when the old irritability would flash out upon the first person who happened near him. Donald was now twenty-one, but with no profession, no means of living, save in the scanty way in which the family had always lived, and which now his taste and intellect as well as his ideas of comfort rebelled against sorely. But he saw no way at present to revive their fortunes, and almost he wished that his eyes had never been opened to any new view of life, through the books that had been his only solace, since they had given him at the same time a craving for another life than the one he was forced to lead. Musing upon all these things, he was walking home from the priest's house one day, and when near his own gate he heard the irregular clatter of a horse's feet, and almost instantly they passed, almost overturning him in the path. The rapid flight only gave him time to see that a lady was on the horse's back, and that her saddle was loose, with the straps hanging. He sprang after them, and, thanks to his wild and fearless training, he was enabled to seize and turn the horse, and rescue her from being trampled upon in the narrow pass into which the horse had entered. A sprained ankle, not yet quite strong, had alone prevented her from jumping off before, and as she reached the ground it was again strained, rendering her in a degree helpless.

To calm the frightened horse, and put him in safety, arrange the broken straps of the saddle, and set the lady upon it once more, was the work of a few moments. The glance of thanks from the sweetest eyes that had ever met his own, was ample repayment of his services. But long before he reached the gate of his own house, and at which he did not intend to stop, impelled to pass it from a sudden feeling of shame in letting the strange lady know that he lived there, the hurt foot began to swell and grow so painful, that it seemed absolutely necessary that something should be done to relieve it. Stiffing his pride at sight of her extreme suffering, he entreated her to suffer him to lead the horse up the pathway to the door, and try old Aileen's sovereign remedy for strains and bruises; and moaning with pain she consented. He carried her in his arms to a long, narrow room, which had once been a picture gallery, and where yet hung a few straggling fragments of paintings on the time-stained walls. Donald blushed painfully as he laid the lady down on an old, moth-eaten couch, and then, with the heightened color still burning on his cheek, he left her to call old Aileen. The good creature came with an array of bandages, cups and boxes that would have served the army at Sebastopol, on the day of battle, besides cold and hot fomentations; and Donald, charging her to be gentle and tender, left her with the beautiful invalid.

"And it's himsel' that's the gintle one," said Aileen, delighted for once to have an auditor for "Misther Donald's" praises. "Sure, it's as tender as a lamb that he led me up to mees bid the other night whin I had the rheumatics upon me. Och! I sometimes think he is as good as St. Anthony himsilf, and sure the poor young mashter is full as lonesome as the saint himsilf. But look at your poor little foot, my lady!" continued Aileen, taking up the swollen limb tenderly in her hands, and placing it on a cushion.

It had evidently been bruised as well as strained, and the young lady remembered that the loose stirrup had struck incessantly against it. The fomentations partially relieved the pain, and Aileen wrapped it up carefully, but not a moment could the patient bear her own weight upon it; and when Aileen went out to find Donald to tell him of it, and ask what was to be done with the young lady for the night, although he was already wild with the thought of that beautiful face that had laid on his shoulder, he was annoyed to feel, that with their scanty accommodations, she would be forced to stay all night. When he went to her again, he asked where he should go to give information to her friends.

"Nay; I can go home, surely. My brother is doubtless even now seeking me, and I must ride on to relieve his anxiety. I can reach Cashel to-night."

"Cashel! dear lady," returned Donald, "it will be impossible for you to ride fourteen miles to night, with that ankle, which Aileen tells me is so bruised. Every step would but aggravate it. And as for remaining here, if you could submit to our poor accommodations, we will make you as comfortable as we can without removing you from this room. I will myself ride to Cashel, and tell your friends where you are."

The lady looked earnestly at her deliverer, as if she would have read his character in his face. Apparently the look was satisfactory, for she gave him her hand, and said:

"I am sorry that you should have this trouble for me, but if you will go, my brother is at the archbishop's palace, and will accompany you back. The archbishop is my brother's godfather, and is now studying in his library. My father is too infirm to come for me; and as I was not expected home to-night, he will not be alarmed at my absence. Inquire at the palace for Templeton Moore, and relate to him my accident. Take my horse; he knows the way, and will carry you safely. Templeton will come in a carriage."

Charging Aileen to fit up the young lady's room with everything she could find to make it comfortable, and to take her a nice supper, he departed for Cashel. As he sped along on the fleet white horse, he strove hard to banish from his mind the beautiful face that he had left in the old picture-room. She was evidently no common or obscure person. Her dress, her manners, the circumstances under which he found her, riding out upon her own splendid horse for pleasure, her evident acquaintance with the archbishop, all showed her to be in a degree of rank far above his own. What then, had he to do with that face? But although he seriously asked himself this question, and arrayed his poverty, his father's almost imbecile state, and their dilapidated old dwelling all before him, still the face haunted him throughout the ride, gazing upon him with its sweet eyes, like the face of an angel, and tempting him to bestow a malison upon the poverty that kept him from seeking the love of such a being as she who wore it.

The beautiful horse took Donald to Cashel in a shorter time than he could have imagined. He sought and found Templeton Moore at the palace. He was a very counterpart of his sister; the same soft, gray eyes, dove-like in their expression, shaded by just such long, dark lashes as to give them almost a mournful look.

"I am ready to go with you this moment, Mr. Heath, as my sister informs me you are called. You have a carriage with you?"

He paused, for Donald's cheek colored painfully.

"I have none. I rode your sister's horse hither, and she thought you would take a carriage to go to Clonmel."

"Certainly; I might have known she would wish to send Lily back. Thank you for bringing her. I shall keep her here, so as not to alarm my father by sending her home."

Donald repeated what Miss Moore had said about her father not expecting her home.

"Ah, now I remember. Matilda did intend staying here to-night, and the archbishop was just wondering why she did not come back from her ride, when you arrived."

At that moment the archbishop entered the room. Templeton Moore explained it all to him, and finding that Donald had ridden from Clonmel, he insisted on his taking some refreshment, and had a table laid immediately. Donald was impatient to get back, however, and could not be prevailed on to stay for a long repast; and the archbishop's carriage was at the door, into which the two young men entered and were driven back to Clonmel.

Aileen had surpassed herself, in order to give pleasure to her young master. She had kept carefully from Mr. Heath that a stranger was in the house. She had brought in every comfort which she could think of for the young lady, and was now intending to remain with her through the night to attend to her ankle. Templeton Moore therefore insisted on going to the inn where the horses and servant were to be quartered, Donald feeling a bitter sense of mortification, that he could not urge him to remain.

"I shall be quite able to go by to-morrow noon," said the invalid, as she bade them good-night.

Aileen's work that night was not without effect. The young lady, although not able to step, was free from pain, and could be easily removed; and she was lifted by Donald and her brother into the carriage. A cordial invitation to their host to visit them at Cashel, a generous gift to Aileen, a grateful acknowledgement of kindness, and they were gone.

Gone! How desolate the old house looked when Donald turned back to it. That night he never left the room that seemed to him hallowed as by the presence of an angel. He paced the floor with rapid steps, dwelling upon every look she had given him, or lay upon the couch she had pressed, dreaming of the future which might have been so bright, had fortune been more kind.

Donald had known little of women. His mother stood to him for the impersonation of the whole sex; but Ilda Heath, in the mournful isolation of her life, was not like this glad, joyous girl, who seemed to fill the whole air with sunshine, even when suffering physical pain—whose smile seemed but the reflection of her own happiness, and whose gentle, kindly manner towards himself had filled him with an inexpressible emotion.

Not many days passed away, before Donald was invited to Cashel, to the house of Mr. Moore. A note from Templeton, worded in the kindest manner, conveyed the invitation, and the day and hour were fixed. Donald remembered his scanty wardrobe, and hesitated; but the desire to look once more upon that face decided him. It was accepted. He would take one more gaze, and then fall back into the dull life which this vision had so beautified and brightened for a brief and fleeting moment.

"What are you doing, Aileen?" he asked of the old woman, as he saw her busily steaming, pounding, brushing and rubbing something in a huge tub, two or three days before the appointed time of his visit to Cashel, and over which her face was growing still redder under her exertions.

"Faix, ye'll see sometime," she answered shortly, "there, go away now, mather dear—I hear your father call."

Donald turned away shaking his finger good humoredly at her; and on going to his room the next day, he found the solution of her little mystery. There lay his clothes, thoroughly renovated by some process which Aileen said she had learned of an old Jew clothes man at Dublin, and darned almost invisibly in places, while accompanying it was linen whose whiteness a king might envy.

"Thank you, Aileen," he said, as he came down on the appointed morning; "you have been very skilful here." And indeed, he looked what he truly was, a gentleman.

Templeton Moore met him at the door, with a warm welcome, and introduced him to his father, then took him to an inner parlor, where Matilda's ankle still chained her to the couch. If she had looked beautiful to Donald's eyes, in the close dress which she wore on horseback, she was still more so in the delicate, floating gauze dress that was falling around her like a mist. If he came here for a last look, it would be to carry the arrow more surely in his heart. There was company at dinner, but Donald was considerably seated by Templeton. Matilda did not appear, but he was rewarded for her absence, by a whole hour passed by her side alone. She drew him on to tell of himself; and before he was aware of it, he was telling her of his early life, his hopes, his disappointments, his poverty; but here he paused.

"You will carve your own way, I am certain, Mr. Heath," she said. "With a heart and mind like yours, the world must have some place for you yet. We can sympathize with you on the score of poverty. We, too, are reduced, but I do not think degraded by our poverty."

Donald sighed. He felt there was a difference between their stations, even though she appeared to be insensible to it. It was hard to tear himself away from her presence, but, although urged to stay through the night by Mr. Moore and his son, he could not think of leaving his father so long.

"A very good, sensible young man," remarked

Mr. Moore. "Fine looking, too. My little girl must not lose her heart to him, however, for Templeton tells me he is poor."

After this, Matilda and her brother called twice in their rides, upon Donald, and so far from taking his last look, he was often drinking in the sweet poison of that love which he did not now strive to repress. Something told him there was yet hope.

He was called away on business one day, to a small town beyond Cashel, for Father O'Brien, who could not himself attend to it. He was detained until late in the evening, and when he reached Cashel, the inhabitants seemed to have retired for the night. Weary with his day's work, he would have given anything to have stopped for a few moments at the house of his friends. But the clocks were striking out eleven chimes, and he rode on hastily. As he ascended a hill from which he could look down upon Mr. Moore's house, a bright light seemed to flash in that direction, which, at first, he thought was lightning, as the night was dark and warm. Pausing a moment on the brow of the hill, he saw that it was fire; and quick as thought, he spurred his horse down the other side of the hill, and reached the street in which his heart told him there might be danger. Placing his horse under a rude shed where he could not see the fire, he ran to Mr. Moore's house under dropping brands and cinders that scorched his hair and clothes. That was indeed on fire too, and as yet there seemed to be no effort made to check it. A sight now met his eyes that almost took the breath from him. At an upper window stood Mr. Moore, calling wildly to a few persons who had assembled below to bring him a ladder. The lower part was wreathed in flame that was rapidly ascending. No one heeded him, until Donald sprang forward, and placing one which he had snatched from a man who held it, against the window, he called to Mr. Moore to come down. Faint, dizzy and bewildered, he lingered until Donald sprang up the ladder, and assisted him down.

"Where are your children, sir?" he asked, eagerly.

"God knows!" he answered, not yet recognizing Donald. "Templeton sleeps just above me, Matilda on the garden side, near me—but I called, and they must have escaped, for they did not answer."

He said these last words to the winds, for Donald had dragged the ladder round to the garden, and was already half way up. There lay Matilda on the floor, the flames already near her, and she was unable, from her ankle, which she had again injured, to get out of the room. With a shriek of grateful recognition, she uttered his name. He took her in his arms, and again descended the ladder, but dropped senseless with his precious burden at its foot. He knew nothing more, until he awoke in a splendid room, with Mr. Moore and the archbishop seated beside him.

"Thank God, you are alive, Mr. Heath!" said the latter. "Our good friend here would insist that you were dead; but I have felt too many pulses not to know that there was life under yours."

"And the fire—was that a dream?" asked Donald.

"Nay, it was a reality, and a very sad one. All is gone—but the lives of all were saved. Mr. Moore tells me that you saved him and his daughter."

"And Templeton?"

"Is injured slightly, and must have rest. One of us will stay with you—the other will attend to him. Your horse is safe, Mr. Heath. He was found in the shed by the church, and as he was known to belong to the priest at Clonmel, we concluded that you must have come on his back."

Donald started up from the bed where he had been lying. It was broad daylight; and the mention of the horse recalled to his mind how long he had been absent from home.

"I must go now," he said, but as he spoke, he fell back upon the bed.

"Indeed you cannot, my young friend," said Mr. Moore, kindly. "You are very ill, and have been bled. I have despatched the horse and a note to Father O'Brien, who will inform your family where you are. Now, I will go to my son, and send his attendant to you."

A moment after, Matilda entered the room in the arms of a stout servant-woman, but Donald was already insensible. A severe fever followed, and for six weeks his life seemed to hang suspended by a thread. Good nursing and a good constitution restored him.

"Can you bear to hear sad tidings?" asked the archbishop one day.

"Perhaps—I do not know how strong I am."

"Mr. Heath, I tremble to tell you that your father is no more."

Donald turned his face to the wall, and wept.

"You have paid dearly for helping me, and saving my daughter," said Mr. Moore. "I have felt it very deeply. Depend on it, however, that your father lacked nothing but his beloved son's presence."

"And where is Alleen?"

THE OLD TIME.

BY GEORGE H. COOMER.

The sea for the billows that sink with its sweep
Rolls billows exactly as blue;
Thus man in the ages now old and asleep,
Was ever like man in the new.

E'en then there were heartaches and longings to die,
Simplicity, beauty and tears;
And hopes for that future, which, hurrying by,
Has slumbered for hundreds of years.

The heart was the heart, under helmet or hood,
In castle, in cloister and hall;
Though joyous or sorrowful, evil or good,
'Twas always man's heart, after all.

And dreaming the dream that for them were unfurled
The glories of sunshine and shade,
Men fancied that scarce could the world be a world
When they in the dust should be laid.

Yet bright were the skies when they went to their rest,
The roses bloomed even like these;
The robin dropped noiselessly into her nest,
The brown sparrow sang in the trees.

And now the old time is a ship that's afar,
That ever seems smoothly to sail;
We hear not the creaking of cordage and spar,
We feel not the rush of the gale.

Yet varying e'er from the bright to the dark,
Our fathers had sunshine and showers;
That tempests and terrors beleaguered their bark,
We guess from the tossing of ours.

OLD JOHN BRADBURY'S SON.

BY MRS. MARY A. DENISON.

"He's a good son."

"Ay, is he! as good to us as if he were our own," replied the old farmer, placing his pipe over the shelf.

"He is just the same," and the farmer's wife wiped her eyes with the corner of her apron.

"We have done wrong, John."

"Wrong! I should like to know how?"

"In not telling him."

"Well, I don't know," the farmer rubbed his hands, and looked straight into the fire—"I don't know!"

"Now he will be getting this great fortune. He is not fitted for it. He will blame us."

"Ay, there may be truth in what you say. But, wife, show me a boy that writes a better hand, or casts accounts more neatly. You can't do it."

"He was always smart—that's natural, John."

"Ay, shows what a stock he's from. Well, we can't help it—he must know. What will he say?"

"Sure enough, I wonder." The dame took the coffee-pot from the fire.

It was a December morning. The windows were done in white arabesque. The trees waved naked branches, but the sun poured some warmth on the poor, shivering things. The old farmhouse kitchen rejoiced in a blazing fire on a hearth the size of a wooden basement dining-room. Already the oven was heated; how it roared! One could smell the winter-pears baking, and the fresh, warm steam of bread filled the place with a sweet odor. The loaf was smoking on the table. Everything was ready. The door opened; John Bradbury junior came in. He was a handsome young man. His forehead was like that of a poet, so broad and white; under that the sun and wind had done their work. The clustering hair curled in thick, shining masses above his brow. His features were straight, and elegantly shaped; his form was like that of Adonis. His whole presence was strikingly noble, strikingly intellectual. He hung his cap on a peg—rubbed his hands vigorously in a pan of cold water, and drew his chair to the table.

"I tell you, father! but it's a keen, bracing air outside—" beginning to eat with a relish.

"Ay, a fine morning, my son. What were you out so early for?"

A bright red crept along his cheeks.

"O, I'm at that desk for Mary."

The farmer and his wife glanced significantly towards each other.

"How is the dominie's wife?" asked John, the elder.

"Much better; getting along nicely, I was told last night;" and the flush broke out again.

Breakfast over, John sat down by the fire to read his paper. He seemed very nervous about it, shifting the pages continually, and watching the clock. At last, he sprang up as the hands pointed to eight, put on hat and coat, and hurried out.

"He has not seen it, mother," said farmer John, with a sigh of relief.

"He was thinking so much of Mary," mused the good wife. Her face was clouded.

THE DOMINIE'S DAUGHTER.

Little Mary Worth. You would have said she was the sweetest, the most airy, fairy creature that ever breathed. The predominant expression of her beautiful face was purity. It enveloped her whole person. The clear, truthful eye—the childish lips, and the dimples in the cheeks, all suggested the same. Mary was called an angel. The light of her sweet presence made a paradise of her father's home.

Her mother was an ethereal, delicate creature, with a spiritual impress, and she had dowered Mary with her own priceless graces. Dominie Worth was a happy, because a good man. A slight personal defect but enhanced the glory of his intellect. Everybody loved him, for he won love by his urbanity, courtesy, and gentleness. His sermons were remarkable; his fame had reached more than one city, and golden offers had been made him. But, as he said, he loved his little pine pulpit; he loved his little white meeting-house—he loved his dear parish best of all. The gilding and the damask of the more splendid “courts of the Lord,” were not suited to his taste—the stifled city air—its smoke—its thunder—its crowds—no, no; they were never meant for him. The birds and the trees, the flowers and the sweet country air; the scent of hay and roses in summer, or the open white wild in winter—these he loved, they were necessary to his existence.

The same morning on which we have seen John Bradbury, Mary arose—not exactly with the lark, for there were no larks in Medway—but exactly at the hour that larks would rise, did they sojourn in this pleasant land of ours. Her first duty was to call the old housekeeper. Katy, the girl was already up. She was bringing a pail of water from the mossy well. Then, attired in her winter dress of plain pearl-color, she went into her mother’s room. The invalid (she was just recovering from a tedious illness) greeted her with a beautiful smile, and a warm kiss, while Mary, with a soft touch, smoothed the pillows and the bed, and bathed the pale face.

“You are up very early, my love, and I fear you did not retire as soon as you should.”

“It was only ten, mother,” said Mary, her cheeks growing rosy. “Mother—I—”

“Well, Mary, speak on.”

The bright head was hidden in the pillows, close to her mother’s face, and a faint voice murmured: “I will tell you to-night.”

A smile, and then a look of pain crossed the features of the invalid. But the smile returned again, and remained there. Mary raised her head at sound of her father’s step, and hastily left the chamber. A moment more, and she was busy with her geraniums. They stood on the broad window-seats, a beautiful variety. The dining-room was always warm, and the plants were well cared for. Many a scarlet bloom crowned the rich, green stems, rewarding Mary’s love and attention.

“Why should I feel so awkward whenever I speak of him?” she whispered to herself. “Do all who love feel thus, I wonder?” and the innocent cheek rivalled the crimson petal over which she bent.

“Breakfast, my child,” said her father.

They sat down together, with the good but deaf old housekeeper.

“One week ago,” said the dominie, stirring his tea, “I could not sit here with a light heart as I do this morning. O, Mary, thank God with me that your mother is spared!”

“I do,” said Mary, gratefully, wondering if anywhere in the world these tender brown eyes with their long lashes could be matched.

“We may have her with us in another week,” murmured her father, his face lighting up with a rare smile.

“Yes, father.”

“By-the-by, wasn’t young Bradbury here last night?”

“Well, he’s a fine fellow, and I like him. Another cup of tea, little Molly.”

Mary was glad of this order, for she felt flushed up to her very temples. Perhaps her father did not observe it; perhaps he did. Fathers are not generally stocks and stones.

“And now you are off to your school, I suppose. Give me a kiss, Molly. To-day is my lazy Monday, so I shall sit with your mother—or, perhaps—I think I will though. I’ll come over to the school, and give your scholars a little talk.”

“Thank you, father, I shall like it above all things. Good morning.”

“Good morning—God bless you, darling.”

Mary looked prettier than ever in that tasteful hat, with the white lace around her face, and the chestnut curls straying out on either side the white, pure complexion. O, but Mary was a little beauty! Perhaps as she glanced shyly around sometimes,—perhaps she expected somebody. And so she did, but not so soon; not the somebody she did meet.

THE LAWYER.

Why to be sure, he was a lawyer, if he did look so green, with his thin legs in tight trousers, and his tall hat shooting up like a steeple. To be sure he was a lawyer, if he did have hair of a certain color and whiskers to match, the former very thin and straggling, the latter very thick and bandit looking. Didn’t he wear an enormous gold chain? and I should like to know if that isn’t one of the signs of a professional man? Seth Bobbin was no handsomer than his name, but he was rich. Yes, rich!! “Seth didn’t need to do nothing,” as his mother eloquently averred every time she spoke of him, for Josiah Bobbin, who had kept an immense variety store for three and thirty years, had obligingly taken very narrow quarters, and left Seth all his money—thousands upon thousands.

So, it was Seth Bobbin who bobbed upon her path before she gone three rods from the sun-gilded parsonage, and with many bows and more "ahems," said that it was a delightful morning. Mary responded with a vexed look that it was.

"Going to school, I suppose," said Seth.

This was easily answered.

"It must be very pleasant to keep school."

Seth was offering his arm, but Mary was affected with a sudden blindness, she did not see.

"Very pleasant sometimes," she responded, looking the other way.

Now Seth had been repulsed so often and with such spirit by this fair young girl, that if he had been a man of moderate sense, he would have kept out of the way. The reason why he did not was very plain; he was not a man of moderate sense. After this, they walked on silently for a quarter of a mile, Seth carefully pointing out such places as he did not think should be honored with the little tripping feet at his side—and then they were met by handsome John Bradbury. He did look so handsome—lifting his hat from the thick curls, bowing with such natural grace, his eyes alight, his brown cheek so richly colored—that the lawyer could have knocked him down just for looking handsome and brave.

There was no mistaking the flush that flew all over Mary's beautiful face, or the manner in which she said "good morning." O, it was so different from the icy salutation that Seth Bobbin had received! Seth bit his thin under lip, and then laughed a little, turned on his heel, and was off sauntering so easily, so carelessly!

"Confounded fool!" he muttered, when he was some way beyond. "A brute of a farmer, and smelling of stables—ugh! Poor as a church-mouse, too, and pretend to like her. I'll—I'll shoot him, upon my word I will, just as sure as I get roused, I'll fire right through his head, if I have to be hung for it! A common farmer—dirt shoveller—hoe-picker—ugh!"

Mary and John were moving on though, just as contentedly as if Seth Bobbin had never been born, or having been, had never blest that particular locality with his legal presence.

"I have almost finished your desk, Mary," said John.

"Have you?"

"It will be a very pretty thing, and I—I met you this morning to ask you what color you would like it lined with?"

"O, blue, if you please."

"Yes—is blue your favorite color?"

The beautiful eyes looked upward, first to the clear, calm heavens, then in his face. "Yes, I think I do like blue best," she answered. And there was silence for a few moments.

"I told you I was reading 'Plutarch's Lives,'" he said.

"Yes;" she smiled as though she were proud of him.

"I have not told my father of my plans yet, I shall very soon though. He does not dream that I am pursuing such studies, and when I propose to fit myself for college, I am not quite sure that he will be pleased, for he is growing old, and wants me to work on the farm. But as you say, if providence intends me for another sphere, providence will open the way."

"Yes, John, of that I am sure."

"Well, good morning," and the hand was held with a loving pressure.

The children came crowding about their young teacher, all anxious for a smile, for a sweet word, and supremely blessed by a kiss. Mary paused a moment—turning her blushing, radiant face once, strangely enough to encounter his turned over his shoulder, and then went in the pleasant school-room.

A VISIT.

"Dear me! there's the black bonnet of Mrs. Bobbin," exclaimed Dominic Worth. He had just risen from his knees, in which posture he had been playfully talking with his wife.

"She will come in; she won't take no for an answer," said Mrs. Worth, smiling a little anxiously.

"But you are not quite well enough, love—shall I tell her so?"

"No—pray don't—it would be all over the village before night that I was dead and buried."

"So it would; she's the greatest tattler—but a good woman—a good woman. I'm sorry I spoke so hastily. She's a good woman, I hope."

"I'm glad you give her the benefit of a hope," replied his wife. "I question whether to keep the tongue within bounds is not as much a Christian duty as to honor God."

By this time, Mrs. Bobbin was heard deliberately puffing her way up stairs. She came in—she sat down—she untied her bonnet strings—she took off her gloves—she hung her "ridicule" on the corner of a chair—all before she spoke.

"La! you are now reely better, dear." And then she put on her spectacles, and took a survey.

Mr. Worth had hastily left the room before she entered, because—well, it was about time to visit his daughter's little school. After a few commonplaces, Mrs. Bobbin spoke of Mary—asked after her health with a full, flushed face and laboring breath, as if that was by no means the end of it.

"Well, now they do say, (but I don't believe it) she lowered her voice marvellously in this parenthesis—"they do say that that John Bradbury is after your Mary. I thought I'd come right over airly this morning, and see if I couldn't stop the talk—for says I, Mrs. Worth is a lady-like woman, and Mary Worth, though she's a little too easy in her manners, is a lady-like girl, and the dominie is more of a gentleman than either; and says I, they couldn't give their only child to a poor farmer's son, who isn't worth the first cent—I reely don't believe a word of it; and I don't, Mrs. Worth—I don't," shaking her head, and the large, stiff, white frill that was gathered around it.

Mrs. Worth was smilingly silent.

"Now that John Bradbury, as everybody knows, is a stuck-up fellow, with notions a good ways above him; and as to work, I don't believe he earns his salt. I used to say—"

"O, Mrs. Bobbin, don't talk so of John—Mr. Bradbury. I think he is a very fine young man."

Mrs. Bobbin was struck dumb. Even the borders of her cap ceased to quiver as she looked fixedly at the dominie's wife.

"You think John Bradbury is a very fine young man!" she ejaculated, after a moment of awful silence.

"Yes, I certainly do." Mrs. Worth was a little excited, her cheeks were very becomingly flushed; she looked like Mary now.

"Well, I must say!" Mrs. Bobbin took her spectacles off and looked at them, turning them over and over. "You don't mean that Mary is reely going to have that John Bradbury, when there is men who would dress her in gold if they could have her."

Mrs. Worth did not seem to be elated by this consideration at all, and when Mrs. Bobbin repeated her question whether Mary was reely going to have that John Bradbury, she replied:

"I don't know, I'm sure. Mary may have anybody she wants. I have no fear of Mary's choice—not the least fear of Mary's choice," she repeated softly.

"Dear me—well, well! I did hope! But Mary is a schollard, and he is only a poor, hard-working farmer—a clodhopper."

"No matter, if he is upright and honorable."

"But I tell you there is men, professional men, that would give Mary a better home, and lift her up to a high proposition in society; professional men!" Mrs. Bobbin nodded twice, as if to clinch the assertion, and her features were strong enough to clinch anything, while Mrs. Worth put her hand over her face and arranged her cap with both hands to conceal a smile.

"Now, there's my Seth," (the smile grew broader, but the face was partly turned to the shadow,)—"Seth would worship that girl—he'd make a real lady of her, he's a lawyer, Seth is, and having a fortune had left him, which is enough to set up any young man, of course, don't you think she wouldn't by any means, favor Seth."

"I hardly think so," said Mrs. Worth, keeping her eyes from the ludicrously anxious visage of the lawyer's maternal pleader; "I don't think she and Seth were ever very good friends."

"And would you let your Mary marry that John Bradbury?"

"Why yes, if she wanted to, to be sure I would. I have a very high opinion of John Bradbury."

"Mrs. Worth,"—Mrs. Bobbin looked awfully impressive—"I've ben a good friend to you, made you gruel, given you two quilts, a pepper box, and a mustard-pot, that was as good as new except the stopple was broken. I've always taken your part, though I maintained that you had peculiarities, and I always shall maintain that you, and Mary, and your husband, and your housekeeper has got peculiarities. But if you go for to let your Mary marry that low farmer, I shall consider, Mrs. Worth, I shall consider our friendship as it never had been."

Having thus lucidly given vent to her offended dignity, Mrs. Bobbin deliberately put on her bonnet, tied the strings, drew on her gloves, took up her "ridicule," giving ample time for the minister's wife to protest. But the poor little soul was almost choking with inward laughter, though she would have given worlds for the power of self-command just then. She did try to say "Mrs. Bobbin," but her bodily prostration would not admit of control over will or tongue, and she burst into a paroxysm of laughter that was almost hysterical.

Mrs. Bobbin arose, drew herself up, turned slowly about with a glare of tremendous import, as if all the anger she had ever felt in her life was now concentrated in her final farewell to that unfortunate woman, and giving vent to the cutting declaration, "well I must say!" she stalked out of the room. That afternoon poor Mrs. Worth was feverish.

THE DISCOVERY.

"Well, John, now you've read it, I'm easier."

"Why! what is it to me, father? I see that a certain Sir Robert Irving has lately died in England, leaving an immense fortune to his nearest of kin—the child of Robert Henry Irving, if he is to be found. This is all nothing to me."

The farmer's wife sat near trotting, trotting with both feet on the broad hearth; she always did this when she was in trouble. The farmer awkwardly took his pipe from the mantel, let it fall, kicked the fragments into the fire, and then blurted out:

"Well, it's got to come at last. John, you aint John; in other words, you aint old John Bradbury's son. God bless you!"

"Who, in the name of heaven, am I then?"

He said this slowly after a pause during which he had turned from one to the other—from the aged wife wiping tears away from her eyes with the corner of her apron—to the old farmer pursing up his lips, and thrusting his hands in his pockets, as if he would never find the end of them.

"You're who that man's after; that's who you are," said the farmer pointing to the paper. John threw the paper on the floor, took it up again, knit his brows, exclaimed, "I believe we are all crazy," and fell to reading the notice again. "What does it mean—what do you mean?" he asked again, still in a maze.

"I tell you you're the man they want, you're the one they advertise for, you're to have all them millions of dollars; ha! ha!—to go—to leave us, to forget we ever lived—O, dear me!" He pursed up his mouth again, and tried to dive deeper into his pockets. The old wife was sobbing.

"You see," said Farmer John Bradbury, "a fine young man, and a very genteel, came to the place where we used to live in Ohio, twenty-one years ago. Folks said he had run away to get married, and that he was an Englishman. Angelon, she was a beauty, that she was. Wasn't she a beauty, wife?"

"As handsome a creeter as eyer I see," said his good wife, wiping the tears away.

"Well, she died soon after she came—when you were born—and he, poor man! poor man! he loved her desprit—he made away with himself, because he said he had nothing to live for."

"Good God!" exclaimed the young man, turning pale.

"Well, now, if you go to feel like that, I'll stop," said the farmer, looking worried and nervous.

"Go on—go on—pray go on!"

"Well, my wife was in the midst of it all; we were young, married people then."

"Yes, yes," said the good dame, chokingly, "I was in it all."

"They left some papers telling who you was, telling who they was, telling, too, that they had got the everlastin' displeasure of some big folks in the old country—some relations—and their marriage stifticate. It's all up stairs."

"You was such a purty little thing," said the farmer's wife, yearningly.

"Yes, you was a nice baby, and we wanted you bad enough to keep; but thinks I, I'll get some letters writ and sent on to England. And we did, we writ letter after letter, or got Lawyer Bizzel to write them, but we couldn't get no answer. After waiting three year, we began to give it up, and my wife loved you, I guess, better than she did the Lord; I used to tell her so then."

"I did love you," murmured the farmer's wife.

"So, we reckoned we'd move away to another part of the country, and say nuthin' about it, knowin' you'd grow up a good, honest lad, if we raised and nurtured you in the fear of the Lord, as we've tried to do."

"And how do you know this means me?" asked the young man, tremblingly.

"'Cause in them papers I'm going to show you, that ere Sir Robert Irving's name is there, and he is called your grandsir, and he's the one I writ to, and never got no answer."

"Let me go by myself, and think," said the young man, uneasily; "I am bewildered now. I—I seem hardly to know myself."

"John, you wont—you wont feel hard agin us," cried the poor old woman, sobbing and moving towards him.

He threw one arm about her. "Feel hard towards you, my mother,"—he kissed her faded face—"hard towards you, who have loved and cared for me, and reared me an honest man, when my own kin threw me off—if this is indeed true, threw my poor father off too—forgot—disowned us? Never, never!" There was inexpressible love—inexpressible tenderness in his voice, in his manner.

"I knew he was my own dear boy!" exclaimed the farmer, gazing after him. "Wife, he'll never forgit us, mark me."

It did indeed, take a long, long while for John to realize that he was an independent man—a millionaire. Perhaps I should say that he did not, could not realize it at all. At first, he did not want to; it was rather a painful feeling.

THE CONFESSION.

That same night Mary Worth told her mother that John Bradbury had proposed for her hand. That the noble, handsome farmer already possessed her heart had been for some time apparent. The ingenuous girl could not, nor did she try to hide it from those who were nearest and dearest to her.

"I have only one objection, Mary," Mrs. Worth said gently, "and even that shall not be in the way; I fear you are hardly adapted to be the wife of a farmer."

"But John does not intend to be a farmer, mother," Mary said, hurriedly.

"Indeed! That's news to me. What will he be?"

"A physician."

"But, my child, he has not had the benefit of a good school education."

"He has had the benefit of a clear mind, mother, good judgment, and resolute will, and a splendid intellect. He has been studying these many years, mother; you have no idea how much he knows."

"I might have seen it in his superior manners, his correctness, even elegance of diction," murmured Mrs. Worth, looking away from Mary. "And does this prodigy of yours intend to go to college?"

"I believe he does, mother."

"I wonder if the old gentleman can afford it?" Mrs. Worth spoke musingly.

"Whether he can or not, John will go," said Mary, "he will find some means to pay for himself—I know he will."

Her resolute manner caused her mother to smile. "Must we then," she said playfully, "give our only, our darling daughter to a poor man?"

"But, mother, you married a poor man."

"So I did," said her mother, laughing, "and would do it again to have such a husband. But, Mary, think what a sacrifice! I never had an offer from an admiring and wealthy Seth Bobbin; if I had—"

Mary ran, or rather danced from the room. John met her at the foot of the stairs; he looked smiling, but still anxious. In his hand he carried a folded paper. Half bashfully, and wholly earnestly she greeted him, and they went into the sitting room of the parsonage together. She rallied him on his quiet manner—his strange mood, and he answered by repeating a case similar to his own, and earnestly asked her what, supposing he were that young man, she would do? Would she retain the same sentiments—regard the vows the same? What would she do?

Mary did not know. She thought that then she would be no fit match for him.

"You! you would adorn a throne!" he said earnestly—so earnestly that Mary blushed and laughed. But when he told her just how it stood, repeated what, his father (as he still called him) had divulged to him, and what probably his expectations were, she shrank back overwhelmed, exclaiming: "You must not think of me."

"Then perish the money!" exclaimed John. "I will never seek for it, nor establish my claim. There are, it is probable, those in England belonging to this family, who would make no extraordinary efforts to find me out. I will live as I am, happier in your love, than to be the possessor of millions. I will renounce all this for you, gladly, freely, willingly."

"No, you must not; I dare not take the responsibility upon myself. I believe you love me; yes, I believe you would renounce this great gain for me. But you shall not. One year from to-day, if you ask me to be your wife, I will not say no. In the mean time, you will travel, and meet those titled relations; you will see the world, dear John."

"But I shall not find another through all its length and breadth like my love, my own Mary!"

Of course, this was all rhapsody, but nevertheless it was said, and a great deal more like it, only more fervid, more glowing.

What Mrs. Bobbin's sensations were, when it leaked out that John Bradbury was not John Bradbury after all, but entirely another person; that he had gone to England to get a great fortune left him by a titled grandfather; that if he pleased, he could be a titled grandfather himself, some of the days to come (though he would have to stay in England for it); and what were the emotions of the round-eyed Seth, at finding that some people had more money than some other people, I will not undertake to describe.

And Mary was going to be rich after all! "That is," Mrs. Bobbin suggested, "if Mr. What's-his-name ever came after or thought of her again. She didn't believe he would. But he did, and Mary is his wife to-day. Dominie Worth still delivers his eloquent sermons in the little village church, though his daughter married a millionaire.

SIR E. L. BULWER.

THE TRIAL BY COMBAT.

BY ALICE C. BENTON.

THE little brown, English cottage at Albury had been standing vacant for nearly a year. No reason could be assigned for this, except that it was rather a lonely place. In winter, it certainly was so; but in summer, when the green lane in which it stood was fragrant with apple blossoms, or with dropping fruit, there was not such a delicious little nest in all England.

It was not, however, such a spot as a cit would covet, being too far from stage or omnibus accommodation; and there was not sufficient land to tempt an agriculturist. But there was room for flowers; and when it came to be cultivated, it looked like a vast bed of roses. For, in the spring of 1817, the cottage was taken by a young man and his sister, by the name of Ashford, and before they had been there a month, the dwelling and all around it was transformed into still deeper beauty than before.

Philip Ashford was a mere youth, scarcely nineteen years old, his sister being two years younger. They were all in all to each other, having no other relatives in the world. A small property, left by their father, was invested in the Bank of England, of which they drew out enough to purchase this spot which in future was to be their home. To increase their income, Philip proposed that they should cultivate flowers and the smaller fruits, and that he should buy a pretty, light wagon and a pony, which would answer the double purpose of affording them rides about the country, and at the same time of conveying their garden treasures to the nearest market town.

Inside, the house was as neat as the willing hands of pretty Mary Ashford could make it. The simple cottage furniture always looked bright and shining. There was a good fire nearly the year round upon the polished stone hearth in the kitchen, to keep off the damps of the thickly clustering trees; and the clean, white-draped bedrooms and the little sitting-room with its narrow casement, overhung with woodbine, were the cosiest little places in the world.

Then they had brought from London, where they had lived all their days, a very tolerable collection of books, many of which were their inheritance from their father, who was a curate in one of the small parishes of the outskirts of the metropolis, and the remainder were selected from newer publications by the good taste of Philip, whom Mary called a perfect bookworm.

It was true that the young man did love to dream away a good deal of his time over books;

but then he spent but little in other ways, when out of his pet garden. Altogether, the life at the cottage was in the most primitive simplicity and beauty. The brother and sister had no wish for any other society than each other; and their days passed on in a soft quiet, that contrasted strangely with the turmoil of their former existence in London.

A few hours in the house was sufficient each morning for Mary's work; and when everything there shone like polished silver, she joined Philip in the garden, where they wrought until the sun became too oppressive. Then their simple dinner of bread, milk, fruit and vegetables, all from their own resources, and sweetened by their easy toil of the morning, was followed by an afternoon of quiet reading.

They had been here nearly a year, and the spring was again opening in beauty, when, at a rural fair, Mary Ashford was introduced by a passing acquaintance to young Llewellyn Draper. At the same time and place, Philip had somewhat unwillingly complied with a request from a young man by the name of Thornton, to present him to his sister. He had met him several times on market days, and Thornton had proffered a friendship which was peculiarly unwelcome to Philip. There was something in Thornton's appearance that predisposed one to dislike.

He was handsome—eminently so—but there was a freedom in his speech and manners that bordered upon coarseness; and Philip shrunk from allowing him even to speak to his young sister. But he could not refuse without appearing churlish; and as Thornton dogged his footsteps continually, he was obliged to introduce him, not without a secret reservation that he would offend him if he dared to be too presuming.

Llewellyn Draper was just the sort of person whom it might be supposed that Mary Ashford would fancy. He was as gentle as a woman; yet brave when needful, and, if not so intellectual as Philip, he was far from being uneducated. The worst part of the case seemed now to be the unavoidable absence to which he was destined. A friend and relative in Wales required his presence there; and as the person had no children, and had promised to make Llewellyn her heir, his father insisted that he should attend her as she wished.

Now that he had seen sweet Mary Ashford, this condition seemed very hard to him; but Philip represented to him that it was right and proper, and that the obedient son would be likely to win his approbation as a husband for his beloved sister. To Wales, therefore, Llewellyn went; but before his departure, it was settled that on his return, he should marry Mary Ashford.

"Not to leave Philip," said Mary. "I will never marry to leave my brother. If you consent that I shall still live here and take care of him as before, I will be yours; otherwise, I cannot be tempted by any consideration."

"Be content, dear. You shall never leave him unless he wishes it. Your home shall be mine, as long as it pleases you and Philip to have us live together." And so it was settled.

A few natural tears were dropped on Llewellyn's departure; but Mary soon resumed all her old habits, and as she heard often from her absent lover, she did not pine away her beauty in vain regrets at what could not be helped.

But one thing did trouble her; and that was the frequent presence of Abraham Thornton in their house. On the most trifling errands, he would come, post haste, on horseback, and for hours his horse would be tied to the gate. Mary avoided him, and generally turned him over to Philip's society; but he always asked for her, and not always could Philip make a reasonable excuse for Mary's non-appearance.

Besides, the hour of dinner or tea was almost always included in his visits, and common hospitality made them invite him to the table; so that gradually he became a frequent guest, and conducted himself on the most familiar terms. Still Mary, though annoyed, was not unhappy, and she waited patiently for Llewellyn to return and free her from her pertinacious lover.

The second summer was wearing away, and her lover wrote confidently of his return before harvest, or at least by that time; and Mary was making her simple preparations for the event which was sure to follow. Thornton had declared his love for her, and pretended not to believe her, when she told him that it was impossible. She referred him to Philip for her truth in the matter, and her brother told him, very gently, for he never would injure any person's feelings, that his sister was already engaged.

For some days after this, Thornton did not make his appearance. When he did, there was a wildness and haggardness in his look that betokened extreme suffering. Mary declined staying in the room with him; which excited him so much, that Philip entreated her to come down stairs and speak to him. After this, she frequently saw him in the garden, in Philip's presence; and he acted the part of a disappointed and heart broken lover with such extremity of grief and affliction that showed that his part was overstrained, and excited rather mirth than anxiety in Mary's heart.

Another letter announced Llewellyn's almost immediate return; and Mary, full of some work that she wished to execute before he came, omitted to accompany Philip on his usual ride to the market town, and he set off without her. On the way, however, he met Thornton, and in the course of their conversation, he happened to tell him that Mr. Draper was expected daily. Thornton received the news quite coolly, and rode on. As Philip turned round to look after him, he saw that he took the road leading to Albury; and he checked his horse with a vague feeling of restless uneasiness that he in vain tried to subdue.

"He will go and annoy Mary all day if I am not there," he said, somewhat pettishly for Philip's usual gentleness. "Well, never mind; I can go and get back in a few hours."

But destiny comes to us in strange freaks sometimes; and this day Philip was worried and bothered by fifty little aggravating circumstances, which were nothing in themselves, but collectively they were sufficient to detain him in town all day, so that the light was fading when he rode up the lane. He was not surprised that there was no light, for he knew Mary loved the soft twilight hour; and he pictured her sitting at the little casement, with the tea table awaiting his arrival, and watching for the sounds of Dapple's hoofs on the green herbage. Then came the glad thought that, although she had given her heart's deepest love to another, he should have her still with him. His home would not be darkened by her absence.

"She is a darling sister," he said, aloud, and as he spoke, his horse suddenly started aside. "There, now, did I speak too loud for you, Dapple? Poor fellow, afraid of the dark, are you?"

It was dark in the lane with its overhanging trees meeting above; but still Philip saw some moving object beneath them, and as the person moved stealthily along, he was reminded by the size and gait, of Abraham Thornton. He called his name, but the rapid footsteps were all he could hear. The few moments passed before he reached the door were spent in wondering whether indeed he had been hovering about Mary all this long day, and fancying that she must have been greatly annoyed by his presence.

He took care of Dapple, and went into the house, which seemed strangely silent. No one was at the casement where he thought to find Mary. He called, but she gave no answer. An indefinite dread came over him. He lighted a lamp and went to every room. She was not there. To the garden he carried the light, looking carefully lest he might find her in a swoon at his feet, and as he went he kept repeating, "Mary! Mary!"

He was at the bottom of the garden now, where the little brook ran softly by the wall. He held the light close to it, and there—merciful heavens! what a sight for a loving brother!—there lay Mary in the water, her face downwards, and the shallow stream running scarcely less rapidly than when her slight figure was not there. To draw her from thence, to bear her into the house, to try every known restorative, and to continue for hours in the attempt to recall life, was all that saved Philip from going mad. When he ceased from the fruitless work he fell down in a long swoon. For a moment, after he recovered, he thought that he had only dreamed this great woe; the next moment he saw Mary's chill white face, and motionless figure, and knew that it was only too bitter in its reality.

Then he laid the image on her little white bed, and sat down to think what could have caused Mary, happy and blissful as she was, to commit self destruction. He gazed at her with awe and terror, and as he was gazing, he saw what he had not seen before, the mark of fingers upon her neck, just beneath the ear. The terrible truth burst upon his mind. Some one had done this. Ah, how the thought of the man whom he had met came with it. This then was Thornton's work; for he was now positive that it was he whom he had met.

Locking the door hastily, he ran nearly half a mile to the nearest magistrate, and related his suspicions of the perpetration of this terrible deed. The magistrate was a kind and friendly man. He saw the excitement under which Philip was laboring, and carried him home in his own chaise, followed by the necessary officers. A desire for vengeance seemed to pervade every bosom, as the gazers looked upon the lovely sister of Philip Ashford; and before morning Thornton was arrested. When found, he protested that he had not been at the cottage since the previous Wednesday, and, in fact, no one could be found that could testify to having seen him there, or even near it. He was tried, but failing in evidence to support the accusation, the court was obliged to acquit him. It was then—1818—lawful for a relative to prosecute by an appeal of murder, and Philip took advantage of this law, and made a private accusation. Upon this, Thornton made use of a right, the existence of which had been long almost forgotten—the summoning the accuser to a trial by combat, instead of submitting to a trial by jury. No one could question this right; and the court reproved Philip's counsel severely for calling it barbarous and unreasonable.

Philip Ashford was a slight, weak and delicate youth; Abraham Thornton strong, sinewy and athletic. A contest between them would have been simply suicidal on the part of the former. The first blow with a club—the prescribed weapon—would have inevitably despatched the boyish accuser. And, maddened with grief, and defrauded of vengeance, Philip returned to his lonely home, where Llewellyn soon joined him, and together they could only bewail their mutual loss.

Thornton was again acquitted; but the public feeling was so bitter against him, and the belief so full in his guilt, that he was obliged to flee to America. He did not live long, his death being probably accelerated by remorse; for, dying, he confessed that he had destroyed Mary because she would not consent to give up Llewellyn Draper, and become his wife. This event caused the right of appeal to be abolished by an act of parliament in 1819, it being the last case where a trial by combat could be called for.

Philip and Llewellyn heard of Thornton's death, in their retirement. Dwelling always together, each loves the other for the sweet sake of her whose grave is beneath the tree that she most cherished; and although forty years have passed away, the brother and the betrothed still weep upon the consecrated spot that covers the gentle Mary—still strew there the fairest and most beautiful of the flowers she loved.

HOW TO MEET TROUBLE.

We should brave trouble, as the New England boy braves winter. The school is a mile away over the snowy hills, yet he lingers not by the fire; but, with his books slung over his shoulder, and his cap tied closely under his chin, he sets out to face the storm. And when he reaches the topmost ridge, where the powdered snow lies in drifts, and the north wind comes keen and biting, does he shrink and cower down beneath the fences, or run into the nearest house to warm himself? No; he buttons up his coat, and rejoices to defy the blast, and tosses the snow wreaths with his foot; and so, erect and fearless, with strong heart and ruddy cheek, he goes on to his place at school. Now, when the fierce winds of adversity blow over you, and your life's summer lies buried beneath frost and snow, do not linger inactive, or sink cowardly down by the way, or turn aside from your course for a momentary warmth and shelter, but, with a stout heart and firm step, go forward in God's strength to vanquish trouble, and bid defiance to disaster. If there is ever a time to be ambitious, it is not when ambition is easy, but when it is hard. Fight in darkness; fight when you are down; die hard, and you won't die at all. That gelatinous bodied man, whose bones are not even muscles, and whose muscles are pulp, is a coward.

EDWIN TO ADA.

BY W. FELIX TIMBER.

'Tis vain, alas! 'tis vain to sigh,
'Tis vain to dream of thee!
A boding marmur ever nigh
Bids thy loved image flee.

When thy fair, radiant light of love
O'er my charmed vision stole,
Soft strains of music from above
Thrilled sweetly through my soul.

The light of heaven was on thy brow,
And round my form divine,
My love-lit eyes beheld the glow
Of God's own glory shine.

Thou art a lily gemmed with dew,
Fairer than earthly flowers;
More pure, more bright, than those that grew
In Eden's holy bowers.

God made not man to dwell alone!—
Sweet spirit! tell me why
The roses of thy cheek are gone,
The diamond of thine eye.

Thy name, thy fame, thy beauty's spell,
Thy utter loveliness;
To me peal out a warning knell
Of long and deep distress.

Full oft, at twilight's stilly hour,
While falls the pearly dew;
Fond memory culls from every flower
Remembrance sweet of you.

O, bliss it were, could I but cheer
Those dear, dark eyes of thine;
Ere sorrow culls the jewel there,
Or dims its glow divine.

Far, far on glory's wings I'd fly,
To realms of light above;
I'd weave a strain of melody,
And crown thee queen of love.

ORIANA THE CREOLE.

A ROMANCE OF THE SOUTH.

BY MRS. H. MARION STEPHENS.

"Come closer—closer to me, Esther. It is growing dark; I cannot see you in the darkness. Where are you? Where is your hand?"

"Here, mother—here!"

"O, Esther! never, never forget! Guard her as you would the apple of your eye. Be to her parent, sister, friend. Do not let the air of heaven visit her head too roughly. Shelter her from ill, from sorrow, from the grief and shame—O, Esther! are you listening?"

"Yes, mother—yes."

"Let no knowledge of human weakness and human depravity bow her young head in humiliation. In you I trust—to you I confide. O, Henry—husband in heaven—is my duty accomplished? Have I kept your trust? Does aught remain to be accomplished before the fleeting moments land me by your side?"

There was a pause in the darkened room—a silence broken only by the fluttering breathing of the dying woman, and the quick, half-stifled sobs which came from a dark figure kneeling among the shadows at the foot of the bed.

I looked in Esther's face; it was stern, calm, and very pale, but not a tear disturbed the brilliancy of her beautiful eyes. She was looking, not at her dying mother, not at me her betrothed lover, not at the passionately sobbing slave woman, who dwelt among the shadows, but far out upon the dying sunset lying so bright on hill and tree. Yet there was no speculation in her burning eyes. She saw neither the sunset in its purple beauty, nor the broad river whose merry ripples had toned down into quietude beneath its warmth of sunset glory, nor the vast hills rising higher and higher in the dimness of twilight; but there was an absorbed, patient, far-seeing look, which seemed to be searching into the future as if it would rend the curtain of fate and see what lay beyond.

"Esther!"

She came back with a start and a sudden flushing of the face, and bending nearer her mother, waited her wishes.

"Is the lawyer still here?"

Yes, he was there. Esther could hear his impatient tramp, tramp, tramp, up and down the floor of the next room. At a motion from Esther, I summoned him. He came, treading lightly, cringing and wringing his hands as if the only friend he had in the world was dying. I had gone back to the bed, and was standing by Esther, trying to restore warmth to the cold little hand which had hung so listlessly by her side.

"You will excuse me," whimpered the lawyer, drawing his handkerchief from his pocket and applying it to his wicked-looking eyes. "They were the best friends I ever had in the world—Mrs. Lascelle and her husband."

"Mother," whispered Esther, bending over her, without taking the slightest notice of the lawyer, "he is here—"

"He! Who?"

The mind had evidently wandered.

"The—lawyer."

"O, yes! O, yes! Tell him to be sure—"

"If I might be allowed to suggest," crooned the lawyer, "I do not think your mother would like a third party in our conference."

"Sir!" exclaimed Esther, flaming up as I had never seen her before. "This gentleman, Maurice Stark, is my betrothed husband. I have no secrets from him!"

"What—what—is it? I—I—Esther—Esther—don't leave me in the dark!"

The dying woman, with most unnatural strength, raised herself in bed upon her elbow. In doing so, her eye caught that of the lawyer.

"I merely suggested that you might not like our business talked over in the presence of this young gentleman; but as he is to be one of the family—"

"Not for the world! not for ten thousand worlds!" screamed the dying woman, in a frantic voice. "He would never forgive me. Esther, tell him to go!"

I left the room, but not before I had seen the flashing glance which passed between Esther and the lawyer. On the face of one was written dark, stern, fearless determination; on the other, mockery, defiance and triumph. It needed no more to tell me there was a fierce battle to be fought—a battle wherein woman's strength and resolution were to be pitted against low cunning and unscrupulous meanness.

What was the battle? and would Esther win? or should I ever be allowed to aid her in whatever extremity lay before her? A low scream broke in upon my imaginings; I entered the room hastily. My forebodings were true—Mrs. Lascelle was dead! It was Esther's hand that closed the lustreless eyes; Esther's hand that gathered the clothes away from her and folded the thin palms, as if in prayer; Esther's hand that bound up the thin face and drew the sparse hair around the marble brow, that her mother might seem as little repulsive as possible in her dead slumber.
